Cater announces resignation

by Susan Di Leo
Editor-in-chief

President Douglass Caer announced his intention to esign after this year at an unexpected meeting of faculty members and student leaders on Monday.

His decision was prompted by health reasons; in a statement, Cater said he and wife Libby had hoped "that a full decade of service might not be so wild a dream. Now my cardiologist has blown the whistle."

Cater became the President of Washington College in 1982.

When he assumed the presidency, the former reporter, author, and aide to President Lyndon B. Johnson found an institution struggling at once to survive and maintain its smallness.

"Survival for the independent small college will not be won by betting the odds. Instead, we know that we must win our way by distinguishing ourselves from the other small institutions...by the continuing pursuit of excellence," Cater said in his inaugural address.

In keeping with his vision of a distinguished Washington College, Cater embarked on a campaign which sought to improve the College financially, academically, and cosmetically.

He crusaded vigorously and profitably for financial support for the College, attracting funding from such luminaries as Alonzo G. Decker, Jr., former chairman of the board of Black and Decker and namesake of the recently christened Decker Science Center.

Washington College now ranks in the top 25 colleges and universities in alumni contributions, and Cater's Campaign for Excellence has raised more than $40 million for everything from scholarships to buildingrenovations.

Such high-profile campaigning has paid off in increased awareness of graduating high school seniors of the College. "Student applications have reached a new high," Cater said. Indeed, applications have doubled in the last seven years, as has the academic quality of applicants.

The Master Plan is perhaps the most visual and controversial reflection of the Cater presidency. Buildings have sprung: the Decker Science Center and the Casey Swim Center are among the finished, with the Constance Stuart Lar-

College tightens reigns on alcohol policy

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

A change in the College's alcohol policy has alarmed several returning students this semester.

Dean Maxcy of Student Affairs explained this week that the alteration is meant to "prevent problems caused by serving heavily intoxicated students as well as those obviously underage."

Page twenty-eight of the Washington College Student Handbook outlines a list of regulations for "social events sponsored by student organizations or by individual students."

Number five on this list is a new regulation: "The organizers of any party which is open to the campus MUST hire college approved bartenders through WCDS, if approval for beer or wine is to be given."

Maxcy stated that legal pressures in addition to those exerted by parents and Chestertown residents have facilitated the change in policy.

The new regulations hold all members of the sponsoring organization responsible for damages and for the observance of state law.

KA President Mike Jenkins has mixed feelings about the new restriction. Representing the views of many students, he commented, "It's just another chip off of the historically liberal stance that the college has taken."

However, Jenkins views rule five as a helpful provision to the student organizations holding parties. Having Dining Service bartenders will "take some pressure off of fraternities, sororities or any other social group" when sponsoring a function. At the same time it will cause them to hold parties by invitation, as the regulation only requires them to hire bartenders for functions open to the entire campus, he stated.

Jenkins was reluctant to predict if the College's social life will be adversely affected.

"A lot of the biggest parties on campus, for example Homecoming and the Birthday Ball, have bartenders and no one hesitates to attend them."

Dean Maxcy defended Washington College's new regulations, stating that the measures are necessary in order to maintain the institution's "liberal" policy.

"We are trying to protect the establishment from lawsuit. This is a responsible way of trying to allow students to have these kinds of events on campus."

As cooperation of student leaders is needed, Dean Maxcy plans to "talk to student leaders. It's going to take the support of all organizations."

Students choose off campus housing

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

Enrollment projections and rising costs of obtaining a college education have forced many students to move off campus this year, says Dean Maxcy, Associate Dean of Students. Over 300 students are currently living in Chestertown and elsewhere rather than in college housing.

The Admissions office projected a 1989-90 freshman class of 250 at the end of last semester; Student Affairs expected to allocate rooms to the freshman class in concordance with that number.

For the first time in the history of the College, Student Affairs could not guarantee on-campus housing for every returning student. At the time, they issued a memo stating that a number of students should find off- campus housing.

According to Kevin Coveney, Director of Admissions, 232 freshmen are now enrolled, more than fifty students short of last year's projection. If those 68 freshmen were to have lived in double dormitory rooms, they would have occupied a total of 34 rooms.

Thus, 34 rooms were allocated to nonexistent incoming freshmen.

In addition, approximately 345 upperclassmen have moved off campus.

According to Coveney and other administrative officials, the discrepancy between last May's projection of incoming freshman and current figures could not have been predicted. Said Cove-

Master Plan progresses

by Ed Schroeder

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, stated this week that recent construction at Washington College will come to a close within the next few years.

Over the summer, work crews vigorously attempted to continue the Master Plan. While rain seemed a hindrance at times, it was not a setback for what Clint Baer and the Development Office team had in mind.

"Rain was our only real concern," Baer said. "Our team was pretty much on the ball. We kept up with our schedule except for when we hit a problem in a water main pipe in College Lane."

Currently, College Lane, known as the "fire lane", is marked off while plumbing problems dating back to 1950 are repaired.

Benches will be installed so that this avenue can be used as a gathering place for activities and functions.

To authenticate College Avenue, "eventually we will have all the walkways done in brick," Baer stated. "This is just a stepping stone for us to accomplish that."

Cater established basis for realizing visions

Whether you love him or hate him—and unless you're brain dead, you have a definite opinion about him—there's no denying that Douglass Cater has Done Great Things for Washington College.

What Cater found in 1982 was a small, independent, institution struggling to stay small and independent, lacking in a number of basic elements necessary for survival. Underenrolled, financially unstable, apparently stagnant, this school had but a leg to stand on.

OK, OK, you say, Cater raised a lot of money for Washington College. Big deal.

It's more than money. It's ideas. By raising the College's profile, finances, enrollment, and credibility, Douglass Cater has returned the ability to imagine great things to the College community; arguably, you and I would never have known nor cared about Washington College if not for the high visibility he brought to this school.

Indeed, Cater has pursued his own visions for Washington College with great passion, and several of his expectations have been realized. He has implemented innovated curricular programs such as the Freshman Common Seminar and the President's Forum, and honors seminar courses. The sophomore writing obligation he instituted has not been an overall success, but now has been revamped into a more workable format. Additionally, faculty salaries have improved, and the College is attracting students of high academic profiles.

Perhaps the most controversial of his visions is the Master Plan, the project he has fought hard to see to its completion. It looks as if it's finally coming together.

The buildings that constitute the Master Plan will certainly stand as a Cater legacy, tangible representations of his accomplishments from 1982-1990.

For years, however, certain members of the College community—be they in the minority or otherwise— have damned the Master Plan, especially since construction began on the Casey Academic Resources Center. No one seems to know exactly what it's for, other than to provide a formal entrance to the College.

Opponents of the Plan say that pretty landscaping and big, impressive buildings have taken precedence over academics.

This may be true. Seniors in the upper academic echelons of their high schools want to come to Washington College; are our academics challenging enough to meet the rising standards of incoming freshmen?

We will soon enter a new era, and it's time to decide where we're headed. A search committee is in the works to attract candidates for president, and that committee will include student representatives, which by no means implies that two students should make such an important decision for the entire student body.

It is every student's obligation to voice his or her notions of who our next president should be: do we need another Douglass Cater or is it time to shift priorities? At any rate, Cater has laid down superb groundwork for realizing whatever visions are in store for Washington College.

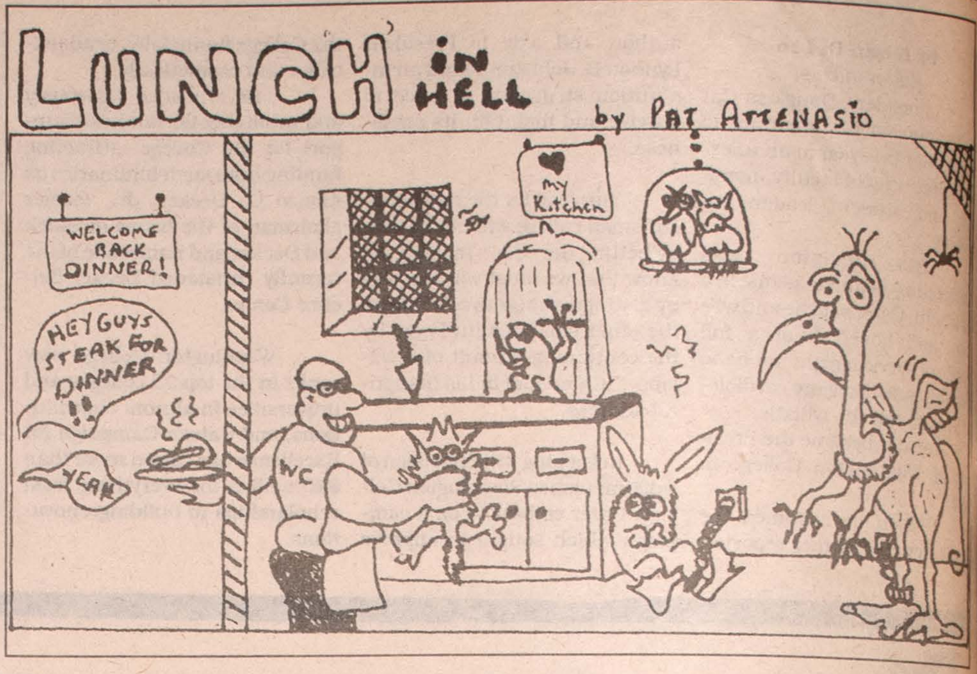
The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief with the assistance of The Elm's Editorial Board, and may be considered the opinion of the staff. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Editorial Board.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.



Welcome from President Cater

Welcome to a Major Work in Progress.

You may be asking yourself by your first week's end: What am I doing here? Is there room for life and mental growth on a construction site?

My answer is— read our plans and not just our lips. You will discover that this year will be remembered as the year of the Transformation and that you are in the midst of it.

Don't just watch it. Help make it happen. Creativity can be at its highest in the midst of change. Use your imagination to make the most of a college on the move. I hope this will be a productive and interesting time.

The student body faces challenge. You can go down in college history as the discoverers. The new world of the campus is waiting for you to explore as it comes into being.

Libby and I hope this year which culminates our own happy career at Washington College will bring our community closer together.

With best wishes,
Douglass Cater

Both students and faculty were taken aback by Cater's decision to resign in the midst of a successful presidency which has put Washington College back on its financial feet, attracted more students, and increased its profile.

Sherry Magill, Vice President and Deputy to the President, commented in a personal statement, "It saddens me greatly to hear the announcement of Douglass Cater's retirement. He brought with him a national reputation which has benefited Washington College greatly."

Steve Attias, President of the SGA, said that he and many other students were "surprised" by the announcement. "I personally have mixed feelings, as I am sad to see President Cater leave, yet excited to see a new president who can become more active with the students."

A search committee, overseen by Chairman Al Goldstein, is in the works to attract candidates for the presidency, Cater said. This committee will include student representatives.

There has been some speculation as to whether Cater's imminent departure will touch off a domino effect in the new president's office.

About the speculation, Magill said, "It varies from institution to institution."

"Meanwhile, I am determined to prove that Washington College will not have a lame duck on its hands during the year ahead," Cater said.

"There are promises to keep before I step down from this high office. I devoutly hope you will share my ambition that the 'home stretch' of the Cater Presidency will sustain our pursuit of excellence to be passed on to the twenty-fourth President."

CAMPUS VOICES

ISSUE: How have your impressions of Washington College changed since you were a freshman?

" I will leave this school with new perspectives."

I was raised in a big city, accustomed to the nightlife, culture and unending opportunities that those places offer. Washington College was a bit of a shock to me.

My high school senior class was 800 students large, with an 80% ethnic majority. WC's "traditional atmosphere" threatened to stifle me.

Learning to respect all cultures and people regardless of their differences has been a lesson I loved to learn. It frustrates me that this twentieth-century college can exist with such a gross underepresentation of minority students. I find it difficult to forgive this flaw and this difficulty has created resentment in my attitude towards the College.

However, one day during my sophomore year I stumbled upon a tiny, dusty department with a little sign out front which read, "Student Affairs." I went in and and told them of troubles with my roommate.

They listened to me sympathetically, treated me like a human, and then fixed it. The discovery of such caring people committed to student happiness raised my opinion of the College immensely.

My junior year, I suffered a setback which arrived in the form of Convocation. The problem: students did not attend Convocation.

The College administration sent out letters to all campus leaders assertively "inviting" them to attend. Not only were they expected to attend, but they were to bring the members of their group to be introduced during Convocation. Flyers were posted in all the dorms with statements like, "Come see Washington College Baseball team at Convocation!"

Convocation came, attendance higher than ever. At some point during the proceedings, President Cater said "Thank you," read off a list of campus and athletic groups, then continued with regular Convocation proceedings.

This flagrant misrepresentation infuriated me because it implies that the student body's physical presence is more important than their actual involvement in the proceedings. It was a sad statement on the relationship between the administation and the student body.

Elizabeth Rollins

Strangely enough, all this summer I craved to come back here.

I am graduating this year and it occurred to me that I did not want to leave, despite all my gripes. I conceded that all my problems were caused by the administration, and I moved on to discover the origin of my newfound love for WC.

I found it, of course, in the classrooms. I am a student of literature, but have taken a variety of courses and I have discovered that the words exchanged in those high ceilinged rooms between students and professors have served to change my life.

I will leave this school with new perspectives that have sculpted and polished my approach to living. Even that nasty old maid, Distribution, by forcing me into dread biology, has opened my mind to the rhythm and pattern of my blood beating through my veins.

The literature I have read here has reinforced that idea of good old "Carpe Diem" until I find that I am actually living my life in accordance with these words.

"I can't even get a set of good impressions."

I passed more McDonald's than Burger King would like to admit exist. Then cornfields. Then Money's Truckstop. Then more cornfields.

Finally, I came upon the pearly gates and tipped my hat to the somber honor gaurd who called himself Suds 'n' Soda. Our car slowed as we reviewed the 4x4's standing at attention on the banks of Route 213; and within minutes I found myself sandwiched between the Literary House and a big red box that was to become my home.

So far, my college experience was unfolding as I had thought it would. Everything remained copasetic for the next few hours. I stood in some lines. I signed my name a lot. And I met the stranger I'd be living with. Now what?

At this point our hero is supposed to have all his delusions and fantasies about college — whether they be academic, athletic or sexual— about college either shattered or fulfilled. Everyone is supposed to have daydreams about going to college . I couldn't even muster up a simple little fanatsy.

Chris Deri

This lack of scenario as to what my college career might hold for me was probably the hardest part about going to WC. Even toward the end of the summer before my freshman year I still knew nothing about the school. I soon realized that this was in large part due to the fact that no one else seemed to know anything about WC. Whenever the subject of any other college came up, everyone always had a blanket, characterizing statement about a school. "Oh, UVM? Party school. American? J.A.P.'s. J.A.P.-Central. Bennington? D'you how much that place costs?" Then when I would bring W.C. into the conversation, my fellow conversants would hush and look around the room uncomfortably like puppies who couldn't fetch.

Despite constant collisions with this wall of ignorance, I was determined to find some shred of information— true or false at this point— from someone who had a brother or sister or parent or pet that went to WC. So whenever I found myself with a self-proclaimed college adviser I would mention WC. Usually this was followed by a blank look from them, and then the all-too -familiar, "Oh, in St. Louis." After I made the geographic correction, I'd spend the next few minutes explaining the Eastern Shore's proximity to places like D.C. and Baltimore. Then, I'd look into the eyes of whoever it was I was seeking an illuminating stereotype from, and I'd get a response like, "— Never heard of it." If I had the energy, I'd spew off some facts and figures about the lacrosse team and the Sophie Kerr Prize, but usually I would just walk away frustrated.

I wanted to know about this mysterious place. Part of me also wanted others to know about my school. I wanted them to say, "Washington College, isn't that where they...?"

When my parents roared off in their mini-van, I still didn't have any prejudices or preconceptions about Washington College. Was it a jock school? Was it full of hippies? Was everyone a hick? I spent my first semester trying to find out which of these catagories Washington College filled. I was like this aimless traveler straggling through Miss Dee's, Bill Smith and Kent. My quest was to find anything— a clique, group or induvidual— whose traits would allow me to form a misconceived, cloudy innacurate judgement about this place. Of course all I came upon were these hoards of normal looking people. I thought maybe I'd have something to go on if I could figure out what L.A.X. stood for, but I soon gave up on that.

Now by this time I was developing a real failure complex because, not only couldn't I get a hold of any real strong pre-judgements, but here I was at the damn school and I still couldn't find a bonding stereotype. Some people did sports. Some people got stoned. And some people had uncles named Jed.

So how have my perceptions changed about Washington College? I can't even get my hands on a good set of first impressions.

Chris Deri is leaving WC this spring.

Eastern Europe: the first fifty years

by Laura Hopper
Perspectives Editor

In the early morning fifty years ago today, German tanks rolled across the border into Poland, signaling the start of the Second World War. Only a few days earlier, on August 23, 1939, the foreign ministers of the Third Reich and the Soviet Union signed the infamous Soviet-Nazi Nonaggression Pact and agreed to divide Eastern Europe between themselves.

With two signatures came the end of the independent states of Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia. Six years later, the Third Reich was a ruin and Soviet puppet governments ruled Eastern Europe.

Change comes much slower to the area today. On August 23, 1989, the Polish Parliament condemned the Nonaggression Pact of Ribbentrop and Molotov as a violation of the rights of the free state of Poland. And on the same day in the three Baltic States, protesters joined hands to symbolically unite the three countries in a human chain that stretched from Tallinn in the north to Vilnius in the south.

But it has taken fifty years for the citizens of these countries to be able to perform such acts of conscience. And following the bloodbath in Soviet Georgia earlier this year, they are performed with an ever watchful eye on Moscow.

In Poland there are fears for the new non-Communist government. The state of the economy and Communist control of the military and police forces could undermine any chances of success. In Moscow, the Communist Party condemns the nationalist movements in the Baltic States, and protesters for Baltic independence in Moscow are quelled by police. These are not the signs of a government willing to be generous and grant freedom to very economically important region. The industry rich Baltic States will be held onto by the Soviets, perhaps even at a high cost.

The collapse of the Soviet economy will cause a great change in their political system, but it may not be for the better. All of the effected countries have limited experience with more democratic forms of government. And then the question arises of the willingness of the people to suffer great privations while a new government is trying to sort out the mess of the economy. Will they believe rapid inflation and shrinking incomes are worth personal liberty? Their exposure to democracy and its benefits is limited. They see our culture through our television shows, and the few visitors who come to the West each year.

Our democracy however was not built in one, two or even three years, and it was built on the centuries old British tradition. The most experience these states have is twenty-one years of democracy. Twenty-one years, in some cases, of housing and food shortages, and fear of the new, powerful Soviet state forming under Joseph Stalin. But the countries have changed so much in the past fifty years that even that halcyon period may prove to be an insufficient example.

Changes will come to these places, and they will be as great as the one begun on that September morning on the German-Polish border. They may not be for the best.

In the World

United States:

Walt Disney Corporation Michael Eisner has announced the purchase of Henson Associates. Analysts estimate the purchase, which will include the Henson film libraries, creature shops, and some of the Muppets, will cost Disney between 100 and 150 million dollars.

Former PTL evangelist Jim Bakker will be in court in Charlotte, N.C. on Monday where he will face fraud and conspiracy charges.

Bakker's lawyers hope to present him as a true believer led astray by underlings while the government plans to show how Bakker used money given by PTL supporters to finance his extravagant lifestyle.

Soviet Union:

The Communist Party in Moscow condemned the nationalist movements in the three Baltic States just days after protesters for independence linked hands to form a human chain that stretched from Tallinn to Vilnius. The Party also condemned a recent report in the Lithuanian parliament declaring the Soviet annexation of the Baltic states illegal and immoral.

In a phone call to Lithuanian Communist party chief Algirdas Brazauskas, Mikhail Gorbachev stressed that Lithuania should not consider succession.

China:

Chinese officials say that Deng Xiaoping is suffering from complications from prostate surgery. Although reports of the 85 year old Chinese leader's condition are varied, none suggest he is terminally ill. He is currently recuperating in the beachside resort community of Beidaihe.

Chinese college student Zhang Weiping became the first student to be given a prison sentance for his part in the student protests in Beijing last spring. Mr. Zhang, a senior at the Zhejiang Fine Arts Institute, was sentanced to nine years in prison for calling the Voice of America, and drawing anti-government cartoons.

If a picture says a thousand words...

Katherine E. Absher
Features Editor

The fan cuts the steam in the bedroom, and the night shadows mix with the steam and the heat of the room. The sheets lap the sweat of the body in bed who is turning the pages of Albert Camus's The Stranger .

The reader and Meursault, the protaganist of The Stranger, feel the same heat together. The heat that hypnotized Meursault into commiting a criminal act pours off the reader's fingertips onto the book until Meursault's Algeria is the reader's bedroom; Meursault's summer is the reader's summer, and Meursault and the reader combine.

This affinity between Meursault and the reader shows the difference between summer reading and academic reading. Summer is a season for vacations to the beach, the mountains, and abroad, but it can also be a vacation for the mind through literature. Tickets to Spanish bull fights or steam boat trips down the Mississippi are sold at the local library or nearest book store.

And books always heighten a summer's intensity. The Sun Also Rises or The Stranger are not the same when read in winter. As summer is three months of pleasure, summer reading should be a relaxing hobby.

June, July, and August are three months where Washington College's faculty can immerse themselves into novels that are not course-related. They can relax and read without pondering the use of tone, symbolism, or point of view.

"I have this absolute impatience with anything not perfectly written. I'm a notorious half-reader."

After returning from two years in Paris where he taught at the Sorbonne, Professor Tom Cousineau walked the cliffs of Newport and perused such "light eading" as Shakespeare's history plays and the Japanese writer Mishima's Forbidden Colors whose hero disembows himself by committing hari kiri. "I ust go to the library and pick out books that strike me— usually writers that I haven't had time or. I don't read junk. I never do. 'm just not that way. I have this absolute impatience with anything not perfectly written," explained Cousineau.

But most of Cousineau's summer entailed reading the proofs of his soon-to -be published book on Samuel Beckett's play Writing for Godot , out in December.

Jackie Collins and Danielle Steel are not on Kathy Wagner's summer reading list. This summer Wagner explored the connections between the visual arts and literature by reading Apollinaire on Art: Essays and Reviews 1902 -1918 and Writings of Marcel Duchamp. She first became interested in "writers writing on art" when she team taught a course on that theme two years ago. The summer gave her a chance to continue her interest in the subject.

After teaching the course Southern Voices last spring semester, Dean Baer, like Wagner, continued her interest in her course by reading more books about slavery and the South in general. Her summer reading consisted of A Turn in the South by V.S. Naipaul, Best Intentions by Robert Sam Anson, and My Folks Don't Want Me To Talk About Slavery , edited by Belinda Hurmence, which was an anthology of ex-slaves interviewed in the 1930s by employees of Roosevelt's Work Progress Administration.

G.W. Cable's Grandissimes also catered to Baer's preoccupation with the South, describing black life in New Orleans.

Baer also read novels in preparation for her women's literature course next spring semester. Three women novelists she concentrated on were Chinese American women writing about Chinese immigration and adaption to the United States. Amy Tan's The Joy Luck Club is narrated by four mothers and four daughters describing their experiences as Chinese immigrants on the west coast.

Maxine Hong Kingston's Trip Master Monkey—His Fake Book "looks hard, surprisingly enough, at the experiences of a Chinese American male character and all the influences that come to war on minorities," commented Baer.

The third novel she read about Chinese Americans is Jade Snow Wong's Fifth Chinese Daughter, so named because Wong was the fifth Chinese American woman to publish a novel in the U.S

Of course, summer being the season of fun and sun, Dean Baer also enjoyed some light reading such as Amanda Cross's A Trap of Fools. Cross has "written nine murder mysteries all set on college campuses where the major detective is a Professor of English at a large urban university in New York City," remarked Baer. "In this novel a professor is found dead below his office window...These novels give a lot of interesting insight into higher education. It is almost a subgenre of murder mysteries— academic murder mysteries," explained Baer.

Unlike Baer, Christine Pabon did not find summer an ideal time for reading. "110 degree heat in Spain made reading a struggle," sighed Pabon. But in the cool hours of the morning Pabon did manage to read many of Shakespeare's and Cervantes' works to prepare an essay comparing the two.

Pabon, however, opened up her summer by reading Anne Tyler's The Accidental Tourist on the plane to Madrid. "I wasn't reading it to teach. I was reading it as a best seller and just enjoyed it," stated Pabon.

Dr. James Locker, assistant professor of chemistry, obtained his summer adventure not from seeing The Abyss or Ghostbusters, but from reading science fiction such as Anne McCaffrey's Dragon's Dawn.

Locker, however, also listens as well as reads his science fiction. During his interview, he pulled down a well-filled cassette case of taped books. While traveling during the summer, he listened to Tom Clancy's Red Storm Rising, about a Soviet submarine commander who decided to defect to the U.S.

He also listened to Ursula LeGuin's The Left Hand of Darkness, which he had read in novel form and later bought on tape.

Dr. James Siemen, associate professor of psychology, relaxed this summer with Acute Effects of Aerobic Exercise on Mood. "I clocked in some hours at the beach in Cape Cod and read journal articles...it's not the sort of thing you curl up with, with a dog by your side, and a cup of coffee, but it brings you up to date on the scientific research in your field," laughed Siemen.

Although summer is a time for tennis matches, rainbow sherbet, and reading Gone With the Wind on the beach, members of the faculty do not rest when it comes to reading; most of their reading is course or research related.

Dr. Nathan Smith does little recreational reading; his summer reading consisted of pouring over works on witchcraft, the French Revolution, and Imperial Russia. "My recreational time was spent doing work around the house....although I did enjoy Parenthood with Steve Martin."

Dr. Emilie Amt, who researched her medieval crusades class this summer, summed up most professors' problems, explaining, "We professors are awfully busy, and we don't have time for much light reading."

Stephen King and Clive Barker did not haunt these professors shelves this summer.

Soccer team looks promising in '89

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

After an inconsistent 1988 season and a summer of learning in England, the Sho'men soccer team is preparing for the upcoming season. This year's team is loaded with talent and experience, and coach Tom Bowman is excited about the prospects for 1989.

"I think this team has the potential to be the best soccer team this college has ever had," Bowman stated in a recent interview.

Coach Bowman has good reason for such optimism. All but three players return from last year's 7-10 squad. The 1988 team displayed flashes of greatness, but it took most of the season for the players to adjust to each other's abilities.

This year's team benefits from an abundance of talent as well as an unselfish attitude that should make the team one of the powers in the Middle Atlantic Conference.

The team's nucleus of players is led by All-MAC selections Mike Bishop and Tom Bowman. John Thomas is back in goal after missing a year due to illness; Coach Bowman says he has been terrific since his return. John Seal, Benjy Ward, Peter Van Buren and Scott Smith are other key players who return for this potentially dangerous team.

Most of the talk on the team, however, centers on the addition of forward Enrique del Prado. A transfer from Universidad de Mexico, del Prado has displayed soccer skills that has Bowman drooling.

"I talked to him all spring and was aware that he had been accepted here, but I was under the impression he was not coming. Then he showed up last week, and he has just been amazing."

The team also benefits from the unselfish play of Bishop and del Prado. "Both Mike and Enrique are content to give the ball up, and this has been a positive influence on the squad."

Another positive influence was the team's summer journey to England and their exposure to European soccer. The team developed both a physical and mental toughness on the trip, but Bowman says the biggest bonus of the visit to England was that it brought the team closer together.

"I would say that team unity was the biggest benefit. The players hung around together while we were over there, and we came away a friendly and cohesive unit."

Armed with a confident coach and a close-knit group of talented and experienced players, the WC soccer team appears ready for an exciting season and a possible MAC championship.

Injuries pose problems for volleyball

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

The 1989 women's volleyball team is facing its toughest opponent before the season has even started: injuries have decimated the squad in the preseason and may put a damper on what coach Penny Fall thinks could be a strong season for the team.

"If this team gets healthy and stays healthy, we could have the best year we've had in a long time," Fall stated. "We've suffered numerous injuries prior to and during the summer, and we have to remain healthy to be successful."

One of the major setbacks for the team has been the slow-healing wrist of Sharon Orser. She was injured during softball season, and what was originally diagnosed as a sprain was eventually found to be fractured. Fall hopes that Theresa Sganga can pick up the slack for Orser during her absence.

Orser is one of four seniors who make up the nucleus of this year's volleyball team. Fall expects big things from Debbie Cohn, Valerie Williams and Ann Urban. These seniors are needed to display leadership for a team missing a number of key players at the start of the season.

ARTS

Artist /Writer Snags Coveted Kerr Prize

by Stephanie Hess
Arts Editor

It's safe to bet that most students who graduated from Washington College this past May received graduation gifts. Family and friends showered graduates with gifts in the forms of watches, stereos and money. Probably, a few lucky students received cars.

One very talented graduate, Michele Balzé, received $26,767 dollars. No, the money was not given to her by a rich uncle. Balzé is the latest recipient of Washington College's Sophie Kerr Prize.

The Prize is awarded annually at Commencement to the graduating senior who shows the greatest "ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor."

Balzé is the 22nd recipient of the Prize.

Balzé says that she invested part of the money, and used some of it to live for a month in Austria, where she studied German. Though she had plans to travel before she won the Prize, she admits that the money made the trip easier to finance.

Balzé majored in Art and English; these creative forms were reflected in the portfolio she submitted to the Sophie Kerr Committee, which included her senior thesis, ten poems, and several art reviews.

Dr. Nancy Tatum, chairman of the English department when the Committee chose Balzé, commented, "Michele's work showed unusual expertise in more than one art form."

Creative writing instructor Kathy Wagner noted a "large amount of creativity and maturity of intellectual pursuit in [Balzé's] work."

Her thesis advisor, Dr. Richard DeProspo, praised the unconventional approach to William Faulkner Balzé took with her thesis. "[She] applied feminist principles to an unlikely subject in a very sophisticated way," he commented, adding that her approach to Faulkner was "radical" without being overly feminist.

DeProspo says that Balzé will "do interesting work as a theorist," in and beyond graduate school.

Bennett Lamond, the current Chairman of the English Department, agrees with his colleagues: "Michele was a terrific student. She has a wonderful future ahead of her."

Balzé's immediate future includes graduate studies at the University of Rochester in New York, where she will work in Rochester's unusual interdisciplinary program. The program will allow her to obtain a doctorate in English and take art classes at the same time.

This innovative program seems to be ideal for Balzé, a writer, artist and photographer who received departmental honors in both Art and English.

In addition to capturing the Sophie Kerr Prize, Balzé shared the Clarke-Porter Medal with fellow senior Andrea Kehoe. The medal is awarded to students "whose character and personal integrity most clearly enhanced the quality of campus life."

Balzé admits to being shocked by both honors. "I was physically numb after Clarke-Porter...when they announced my name for Sophie Kerr I became really tired."

Immediately after Commencement, Balzé was swamped by reporters and photographers. "They yanked me out of the line and asked me if I wanted time with my family before I started interviews...people from newspapers were calling my house, but I was still in Chestertown...a guy from the Sun called every dorm on campus trying to find me."

Despite all the hoopla and media coverage, Balzé asserts, "[winning the Prize] never really hit me too much." Apparently, Michele Balzé is still very much like any other talented writer/artist/photographer who has recently graduated from college—the only difference is she's $26,000 dollars richer.

College welcomes new professors

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

Fifteen new professors were appointed for this academic year, 1989-90.

Dr. Sylvia Lahvis, Visiting Assistant Professor of Art, has replaced Janson-LaPalme in that department. Janson-LaPalme is on leave for the Fall Semester 1989.

Gerald Walsh has been appointed Assistant Professor of Business Management. Walsh will teach in the fields of Accounting and Individual Income Taxation.

Dale Daigle, Assistant Professor of Drama, will be a valuable asset to the Drama Department. He has experience in directing, producing, lecturing, and lighting design.

Dr. Bonnie Sachs has also been appointed a Visiting Assistant Professor with interests in Prose Literature, Literature and Society in the 19th and 20th centuries, German Culture and Civilization and the German Language on all levels of difficulty.

Suzanne James has been appointed to lecture in French. She brings twenty one years of teaching in public junior and senior high schools to Washington College.

Dr. Richard Striner is Assistant Professor of History. His teaching areas include The Civil War, New Deal and World War II.

Dr. Ellen Kline is Visiting Professor of Philosophy. Her areas of interest include Epistemology, Logic, Feminist Theory and Philosophy of Science.

Dr. Satinder Sidhu has been appointed Assistant Professor of Physics. His areas of research include condensed matter theory and design.

Drs. Robert and Shireen Hunter, joint recipients of the Goldstein Chair, will both teach one political science course this semester. Robert Hunter is current Director of the European Studies Center for Strategic International Studies and will teach "Making U.S. Foreign Policy". Shireen Hunter is Deputy Director - Middle East Project at Georgetown University Center for Strategic and International Studies . Her course will be entitled "Introduction to the History of Politics of the Middle East".

Dr. MaryAnne Baenninger is Assistant Professor of Psychology. Her areas of interest include research in gender differences and she will teach in the areas of developmental and social psychology.

Dr. Theodore Kurze will be Senior Fellow for the academic year 1989-90. Kurze will teach in both the Philosophy and Psychology Departments this year.

Dr. John Stewart has been appointed Visiting Associate Professor of Psychology. His areas of expertise range from social development to psychopathology.

The Casey Academic Resources Center is well on its way to completion. The shell of the building is complete and within the next few weeks crews will begin installing a steel roof,

The Center is expected to open in the spring of 1990.

The boiler room next to the Computer Center is undergoing renovations thanks to a grant from Constance Stuart Larrabee, thereby putting to rest the controversy concerning its fund allocation. The Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center will house ceramic, sculpture, photography, painting, and drawing students alike.

Last year, Baer announced plans to build a bridge over the railroad tracks which separate the athletic fields. The project is now in its initial stages of construction.

Renovations on Dunning Hall and Decker Science Center are complete; the Psychology department has moved from Foxwell Hall— which was recently razed to create additional campus parking— into Dunning Hall.

Among the renovations, Queen Anne's and Caroline dormitories have new furniture, and the bathroom facilities in both of these dormitories have been cleaned. Over the summer, work crews turned one battered and used complex into the International Building. The furnishings of East Hall were either removed, destroyed, or repaired in order to better suit its new occupants.

While the Master Plan is not totally complete, it is now on its way to its final stages, Baer said. "We are hoping we have done everything possible where we will not inconvenience students as we build about the campus."

Housing

ney, "It's like [trying to hit] a moving target."

Maxcy cited last year's housing warning as one apparent reason for the exodus of students.

"There's also a second reason. I would guess that if students live together in an apartment or house and they are careful or thoughtful it would be less expensive than on campus."

The current housing situation may turn profitable for students with last minute requests for housing,

Dean Maxcy said. "Some people leave it up to a friend or something to make arrangements and then find out they have no place to live. They call us wondering if we have any rooms left."

Fall remains optimistic that the team can reach their potential for this season. She notes the solid performance by the squad last year, and she is enthusiastic about the freshmen on this year's team.

Amy Rowe heads up Fall's list of talented new performers. Only a freshman, Rowe has cracked the starting lineup and will play primarily at the hitter position. Dawn Manion and Sherry Gallagher are other freshmen who could have key roles in the team's performance.

This year's team also has to deal with their toughest schedule in years. The squad is playing many of the top volleyball schools in the country. They also have a hectic schedule, beginning this Saturday in the U.S. Navy Early Bird Scrimmage.

Despite the rash of injuries and the difficult schedule, coach Fall still believes the team can come together and have a successful season."If this team is healthy, they have the talent to do a lot of good things."

Table Talk

Welcome back, returning students and incoming freshman! I hope everyone had a relaxing and fun summer. Now it is time once again to get back into the swing of things and start another semester that will further prepare you for your future. Good luck with your classes for the fall semester!

The Dining Service has been working extremely hard this past summer to come up with new ideas and new recipes to make you feel more at home. If you have any suggestions at all, please feel free to stop by and speak with a manager on duty or, as always, put your suggestions on the "napkin" board in the main dining room.

Being the newest manager in the Dining Services at this time I would like to introduce myself to those of you who do not know me. I am Theresa Harmon from Millsboro, Delaware. I came to Washington College from Easton Memorial Hospital where I was a trayline supervisor and diet clerk for three and a half years. The main concern at the hospital was ensuring that the patients were pleased with their meals and received the correct meal for their diet.

As a diet clerk, I collected preferences from the patients and corrected the menu according to a predetermined pattern prescribed by the dietitian.

I received a Bachelor of Science degree in Home Economics from University of Maryland Eastern Shore campus.

The special events for September are as follows:

SEPTEMBER:
4TH LABOR DAY DINNER
6TH STEAMSHIP DINNER
13TH EASTERN SHORE SUPPER
20TH PRODUCE NIGHT
27TH ITALIAN FESTIVAL

I hope that everyone will have a good week. Will talk to you then.____________________________"TT"

Notice to all students:

In light of the recent disciplinary action taken against three students for the theft of college property, I feel it is very important to reiterate the College's policy. No one is to remove college property from its designated location and move it to another area for any reason. This policy pertains to lounge furniture as well as room furnishings.

Indeed, this policy applies to all property belonging to the college. Students who violate this policy will be subject to severe disciplinary action.

Students who have inadvertently violated this policy are advised to return any college property in their possession on or off campus immediately.

Presidential search begins with open forum

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

A small group of students and faculty met with representatives of the Academic Search and Consultation Service in an open forum on Tuesday night.

According to one visiting member of the service, Dr. Ronald Stead, the meeting offered "all members of the Washington College community" an opportunity to voice opinions and concerns about the presidential search as well as to discuss "what problems a new president might have to deal with at Washington College." He was accompanied by Dr. Stanley F. Paulson.

Stead opened the forum, stating, "We want to get aquainted with your college so that the right president for Washington College can be found. He or she will have to fit a very unique and special institution."

He then asked the14 students assembled to outline the "needs you see for the College. Things that you would like to see the new president deal with. Give us what you think are the priorities for the new president."

Students and faculty present took the floor of the forum for the next hour, voicing their concerns and criticisms about the College; a main theme was student alienation from the current Administration.

One student said, "A president should be aware that we are not just building blocks." Another stated, "we don't feel that the administration is truly open to us. We need a president to establish that student response does matter."

No one, however, seemed to doubt Cater's sincerity. Many cited the President's availability to students.

Nevertheless, students felt that Cater has not been visible enough and therefore has an inadeqate knowledge of the student's point of view.

Another concern was for the Washington College philosophy, specifically its commitment to an intimate, small school atmosphere. "People come to WC because they expect a small school, small classes. What they find is a faculty and students who like that it's a small school, but an Administration which screams for this to be a 'University of Maryland,'" said one person in attendance.

A brief time was spent for student and faculty praise of the College, at the urging of Stead, who asked, "What would you tell the perfect candidate that would make him or her want to come here?"

Those who commented concurred that the College represents an abundance in opportunities and resources. A new faculty member praised President Cater for his fundraising abilities. "They won't have to worry about paying the rent, so to speak. I think that's amazing for a college."

The Academic Search and Consultation Service is a non-profit organization which aids institutions in their quest for key administration members. The Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors invited the service to assist with the search process. Staed and Paulson will spend two days meeting with board members, faculty, staff and students.

International House reality

by Andrew Diller
Reporter

One of the most important transformations at Washington College this academic year is that of East Hall; the building made the switch from home of the Sigs to the International House over the summer.

The House is meant to provide a nucleus for all foreign interest groups on campus. It will serve as a central and definite gathering place for all students who are interested in gaining an international perspective on life at Washington College.

The creation of the International House was championed by Mariella Ruiz as an outgrowth of the Language Floor, which was formerly located on the third floor of Caroline House. East Hall was picked by the Administration to serve as the new International House because of its ideal and central location on campus.

This will enable the House to become an "umbrella organization for any International Relations, German, Spanish, or French clubs...a focal point for all foreign interests" says Jeff Chaffin, Director of the International House. "We hope that the new House will promote and encourage an international perspective on campus."

The absence of a specific house for students who are interested in foreign cultures and languages was strikingly apparent to the Administration. West Hall, the counterpart to East Hall, serves the same basic function, but for scientifically oriented people. The writers and poets also have a meeting house, the O'Neill Literary House.

With the addition of the International House, the most basic groups on campus (Science, Writing and Language) now all have individual meeting places where they can socialize with like-minded peers.

The International House has space for 22 students, with 14 rooms, and has an ample lounge area, and a seminar room for lectures. There are numerous lectures planned for this year, including some by the members of the faculty who have been abroad for several years.

East Hall's former occupants, Phi Sigma Kappa, were asked to leave the premises last year because of a mysterious fire which occured in February. The Sigs had already been placed on social probation on December 15, 1988 because they committed "a series of violations of stewardship," stated Dean McIntire.

Because of the fire, Phi Sigma Kappa is no longer a rec-

Off campus students at odds with town

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

Local authorities have recently begun to enforce the warnings they issued to off-campus students this summer.

According to Ed Maxcy, Associate Dean of Student Affairs, letters from Student Affairs and Chief Stetson of the Chestertown Police were sent to off-campus students because of citizen complaints.

He stated that the complaints came mainly from residents of Queen Street. "Many were super during daylight hours. But after dark there were parties, loud noise, cars blocking driveways, students in the street." Citizens were concerned about establishing the best relationship possible with students living there, said Maxcy.

Maxcy then asked Chief Stetson to draft a letter to be sent out to individuals living off campus.

The letter, dated August 1, begins by welcoming students to Chestertown. He wrote, "Washington College has always been an asset to our town and the students add to its life and vitality."

Stetson reiterated statements he made last academic year. "I would like to remind you that...with those rights go the same responsibilities that all the community members are expected to fulfill."

According to Stetson, citizens and officers have been leni-

The Buckley loophole

Readers may notice an unusual coincidence in The Elm this week; a police report on page 12 notes that Mr. Cavallaro, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Darcangelo are scheduled to appear in District Court on charges of theft of College property. On this page, a statement from President Cater details the penalties brought against three upperclassmen by the College for the same offense.

Since both incidents occurred on approximately the same date, one can only speculate that the same people were involved in these seemingly separate events. But we can't verify it officially until we attend the judicial hearings, if they are held. In this case, there isn't going to be a hearing since the offenses occurred prior to the formation of this year's student judiciary.

The Elm doesn't have official access to the names of the students in President Cater's statement, and the College doesn't have the authority to issue them to us. All this thanks to a nifty little privacy act known as the Buckley Amendment.

Initially passed in 1974 as an act giving parents accession rights to their children's school records, there's a twist which is the bane of any student journalist's existence: once that "child" reaches 18 years of age, only he has access to his own records.

Simply put, The Elm can't print names of students who are accused of crimes without that student's written consent; even the Administration doesn't have the authority to disclose these names.

There's a problem of accountability here; anyone who's old enough to be in college is old enough to be held responsible for his actions. Students have the right to know if their peers are accused of wrongdoing, and they have a right to know the names of the accused.

You won't read an article in The Elm this year detailing the alleged offenses of "unidentified students." What's the point of printing a description of the alleged offenses of phantom students? To do so would only encourage rumors to fester rather than put them to rest, which is what good journalism sets out to accomplish.

Certainly the Buckley Amendment has its constructive points—for instance, no one has access to your transcripts except you—since it rightly guarantees every student his right to privacy.

However, when any person commits a crime, this is an act against the public, and the public has the right to know about it. Even if you don't care about having, say, one less couch to lounge on, theft of College property is an act against you.

The only reason we can speculate that the aforementioned names are somehow connected with President Cater's letter is because these men happened to have been apprehended by the Chestertown Police. Had this occurred on campus, The Elm would not have been privy to the identity of the accused.

There's been a lot of discourse around here about how the campus is not a haven for illegal and illicit activities, and Washington College is surely not the only institution with this policy.

Why, then, are law-breaking students not subject to the penalty of accountability? For some, the humiliation of knowing that other students are aware of their acts of idiocy inflicts greater pain than the formal punishment. In the "real world," adults are subject to disclosure of their names to the press when they are accused of breaking the law. Why not at colleges?

Why hasn't the Buckley Amendment been amended?

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Editorial Board.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:

Washington College and Chestertown try to provide a caring community for students who attend here. Yet the week before last, three upperclassmen abused this trust. They were apprehended by the city police in the act of stealing furniture and an air conditioner from the Kent House lounge. In addition to dismissal for violating the College's Honor Code and Rules of Conduct, they face the possibility of prosecution for grand theft by the State's Attorney.

I am reporting this dismal episode to serve as a reminder that both the College and the Town are prepared to deal severely with acts of vandalism and violence as well as alcohol and drug abuse. No student should assume that the campus provides safe haven for illegal conduct. Three students in recent years have been obliged to serve prison terms when local law authority found them guilty of trafficking in marijuana.

We have moved actively to provide counseling services for those who seek guidance and help. I remain confident that the College Honor Code provides the best and most effective way to maintain standards of civilized behavior within our small college family.

Sincerely,
Douglass Cater

Landscaping woes

To the Editor:

I have a gripe that needs a-airin'. My knees hurt dammit and I'm derned sure it's the result of landscaping. All these furrows and troughs, bumps and dips, and mudpuddles and such, coupled with the uneven curve of Mother Earth (heh, heh) prevent me from striding properly. Once bumped out of my routine I just can't seem to right myself, causing a nonchalant shamble. Maybe my biorhythms are outta whack, but I'm inclined to believe that it is the result of poor landscaping and slow progress in that the bang up crew doing it didn't start building on last year's dilemma until mid-August. Tisk, tisk. Shabby scheduling indeed. If I get bunions, I'll sue.

CAMPUS VOICES

ISSUE: Recently, the Administration enacted a regulation requiring that a bartender serve alcohol at all-campus events. How will this affect the social life at Washington College?

Policy is a problem of perception, not reality

Mark Stenger

Once again that perrenial question: how do you think the "new" alcohol policy will effect social life on campus? This new policy, as I understand it, will be the nomination of a group of responsible students to attend campus functions. They will be there, not to be narcs at the beck and call of the Administration, but to be concerned and responsible participant/observers.

What's the big deal? We don't have a problem of realities here, we have a problem of perceptions. If you choose to look at it as the Washington College version of "Big Brother," then you do have a problem. This conundrum readily evaporates into that mystical plane of nonsense from whence it came if we see it for what it really is. How can giving the responsibility for our actions back to us possibly hinder our social development?

Wake up and smell the coffee! It sure as hell smells better than stale beer. Some are going, inevitably, to bemoan their perceived loss of social freedom and cry foul. What foul, for heaven's sake! Yeah, let's talk social life. What about the social life of that guy (everyone knows at least a few) who got drunk and made a complete fool of himself at the last party? You know, the one who spilled the gallon mug of god-knows-what on his date's dress. What about his social life? Or his date's social life for that matter? Or his friends—who had to drag him off of the porcelain when he passed out in the can? If you were lucky you didn't have to step in it the next morning!

OK, what about the couple sharing a quiet moment of amorous embrace only to be rudely interrupted be the rowdy and usually offensive caterwauling of the inebriates stumbling blindly back from that weekend's kegger? Is their social life just peachy? Or how about walking into your bathroom in that wonderfully fuzzy state after a good night's sleep only to discover that someone ripped the sink off the wall in the throes of a riotously good drunk? Wonderful social life, don't you think?

Enough already! We like to pay alot of lip service to "responsible drinking." Think about what that means. Responsible. This simple word is synonymous with accountable, answerable, honorable, ethical, rational, sane, etc. ad infintitium. We can protect ourselves from irresponsible drinking. This is one of the ways. And if you're worried about enforcement of the drinking age, you're obviously under age—and should worry about it. That's the responsible way. Instead of screaming about our supposed rights, let's co-operate in creating a more rational environment, a more responsible community. If we have something to prove, it's that we can be responsible. In a very carefully considered and concerned move, the Administration is givivng us the opportunity to put our money where our mouth is. Let's put up—or shut up!

I think that a school-issued bartender is unnecessary. As far as I understand, a form ust be filled out to have an on-campus party. Once the party is registered, the party—and its bartending—become the responsibility of the hosts.

James Myers
Endwell, NY

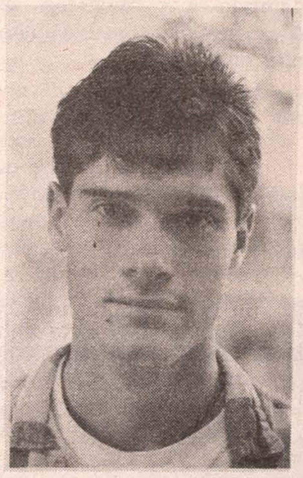
I don't think having a bartender at fraternity parties will keep kids under age from drinking. If they want to drink, they can just get someone of age to buy for them.



Brett McCrea

The bartenders won't solve the problem because if students want alcohol they will find other means to get it. It will also stop students from going to school-related activities, therefore taking money from the school.

Cecile Gutscher

The new policy seems to be ambiguous and inconsistent. By allowing some parties to serve alcohol to students under 21 (invite only parties), but not others, the regulation does not take a firm stance...a rule which is not true to itself is not worth following anyway.

Amy Klamberg
Washington, DC
Freshman

I think that this rule could not work because people will simply have "invitation only" parties (in order to avoide a bartender) and find a way to get more people in.

The alcohol policy: one student's "humble" opinion

Julian Kirtley

Is it just my imagination or has there always been a fairly large amount of drinking going on on this campus? Well, to answer my question, it probably isn't my imagination, because others seem to have noticed it as well, namely our esteemed Administration. Like any group of concerned adults would, they have decided to take drastic action to save us poor decadent youths from ourselves, and popular or unpopular, they will no doubt stick to their guns. The drastic action I'm refering to is, of course, the new drinking policy.

Well, just what is this new drinking policy we've all been hearing so much about? Basically it means, no parties. But wait, says the administration. We didn't say that. All we ask is that if you serve alcohol at your party, you also have an employee of the dining service present to "bartend." In other words, no one under 21 drinks, and that shouldn't be a problem, because it would be illegal anyway, and no one at Washington College would (gasp) break the law! Well, that seems fair.

There's still one thing I don't understand, however, and I'm sure a lot of readers are as confused as I. Why, after God knows how many years of grossly excessive drinking at Washington College, has the Administration chosen now as the time to adopt a strict alcohol policy.

One unreliable rumor is that the College is afraid that with all the lawsuits in this country right now, some poor drunk teenager from Washington College is going to kill himself, and/or lots of other people in a orgy of senseless drunken violence, and the school will be, dare I say it, sued!

Please, don't listen to these rumors. These rumors are spread by troublemakers. As we have already established, the Administration has taken said actions only as a last ditch effort to save us from ourselves. This being the case, however, there may be one or two things that the Administration has failed to take into consideration. Obviously, some one needs to enlighten them, and it might as well be me. Are you listening, Administration?

First, students will ignore it, and they won't be caught and punished and they know that. Second, more students will drink off campus, at places like Newts. Since they can't just go over and pass out on the couch, more students will be driving drunk, increasing the risk of death and mutilation considerably.

Finally, students, deprived of alcohol, their drug of choice, will grudgingly settle for one of the many other drugs available nowadays. Unless I've really been misinformed, no members of the dining service need to be present while marijuana is smoked (although they may be saving that rule for next year).

In short, the Administration won't be saving us from ourselves at all. Why, if you didn't know better, you might think their motives were a little less humanitarian, say more monitary, but hey, not this school. See y'all at Newts.

Harry and Sally try to live in Wheaton

Once upon a time there was an unmarried couple who both had jobs in Chicago, but wanted to live in the suburbs. So the couple, Harry and Sally, decided to do some apartment hunting. They thought they'd found the perfect two-bedroom place in one of Chicago's western suburbs, Wheaton.

But they were wrong.

Harry and Sally's would-be landlady asked them if they were engaged. When they told her they weren't, she refused to rent them the apartment. Harry and Sally took her to court.

The landlady claims she has a moral right to refuse to rent the an appartment to the unmarried couple. Never mind that Harry says his relationship with Sally is platonic. Never mind that they both have jobs and probably would be able to pay their rent and utilities each month. If they were married, they might have been welcomed by their future landlady with open arms. They might have been a credit to, in the words of Wheaton community leaders, a "family-oriented community." Should you ask one of these community leaders, you would find out that the community is "coming together" in defense of the landlady.

For now, the landlady also has a legal right as well. There is an 1827 Illinois law prohibiting cohabitation between unmarried members of the opposite sex for the purposes of fornication. But should the State allow the landlady to deny housing to an unmarried couple on the basis of that law, then they should also take steps to break up all the domestic couples that are living together in the City of Chicago (a city which Mayor Richard M. Daley would probably call Family-oriented.)

California now takes a responsible view towards Domestic Couple. It has passed laws t to protect their rights. It's time the rest of the country followed. There are, after all, groups who watchdog the rights of gay and lesbian couples. Had a black unmarried couple been denied that apartment in Wheaton, the outcome would have been very, very different. There would have been considerably less "community support" for the landlady. She would have been labeled a racist. As it is, she chose to discriminate against Harry and Sally because of their marital status, instead of their religion or skin color.

The upper-income, middle class suburbs that ring Chicago have been insulated for many years against the changes and social turmoil of the city. These suburbs see themselves as small towns where the emphasis is on family and home, and where small-town morality can easily prevail.

But these are not small towns anymore. There is a new type of individual moving to the suburbs. Career-oriented, upwardly mobile, they are moving from the city to suburbs just like Wheaton. For some, marriage is just not in the cards. And they won't get married just to be able to find an apartment in Wheaton.

There are some questions for the town of Wheaton. What's next? What will happen if the legislature fails to change that 1827 law? Will some landlady grasp the initiative and begin to question prospective married tenants on their private lives? On the stability of their marraige? On infidelity? Will she ask two people of the same sex their sexual preferences? Or choose to deny housing to a couple of different religions or races? Discrimination is discrimination no matter what names you use to cover it.

Harry and Sally decided they didn't want to live in Wheaton after all. Neither would I.

United States:

Baseball Comissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti, 51, died last Friday at his summer home on Martha's Vineyard. Mr. Giamatti, a Renaissance Scholar and former President of Yale University, suffered a heart attack and was pronounced dead at Martha's Vineyard Hospital in Oak Bluffs.

In what would create the largest employee owned company in the U.S., the Pilot's Union announced a 6.75 billion dollar buy-out plan for United Airlines. The bid by the Union and United's parent company would include a 15% share to be purchased by British Air.

Hoping to improve the dismal conditions in its schools, the city of Chicago has decided to turn control of the city's 600 public schools over to local parent-teacher councils. These councils, which will be elected in October. will assume some of the administrative functions of the trouble-laden Chicago School Board.

Former Executive Assistant to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, Deborah Gore Dean said in a sworn statement that she had her office files shredded when she left her post. Ms. Dean, who worked for Secretary Samuel Pierce, Jr. from 1984-1987, gave the statement in April of 1988 during a civil case heard in a Federal Court in Chicago. While there is no indication of wrongdoing on Ms. Dean's part, the absence of her office files will hinder Congressional investigators inquiring into favoritism and mismanagement at the Department.

Soviet Union:

As local elections approach, Communist Party leaders in the Baltic States are seeking to distance themselves from the Central Party in Moscow. Mindful of warnings from the Politburo, the heads of the parties are faced with a dilemma. They must, to avoid a total defeat in the upcoming elections, declare some split with Moscow, yet they must maintain a relationship with Moscow or risk possible military intervention.

Poland:

To commemorate the outbreak of the Second World War, the Polish President Wojceich Jaruzelski, Polish Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki, and Solidarity founder Lech Walesa laid wreaths at a momument in Westerplatte, near Gdansk. It was at Westerplatte that the German bombardment of a Polish garrison opened the six year war. The same day as the wreath laying ceremony, the Polish press published a message from Soviet leader Gorbachev urging strong ties between the two countries.

China:

In an effort to limit the western influence in Chinese society, the Chinese government announced Saturday that it would limit the number of Chinese graduate students permitted to study abroad. Stressing that efforts to modernize China must come from students educated inside the country, the government has instituted an "ideological re-education" course for all college students this fall. They will be studying the speeches of Deng Xiaoping following the stiffling of the Student movement last spring.

Hong Kong:

A Vietnamese man was killed and eleven others wounded when a riot broke out among Vietnamese refugees. Thirty British soldiers were called in to help police search for weapons in the Sek Kong Detention Center where the riot occurred. This was the second riot by refugees in a week. The first occurred on the island of Tai A Chau where 5,500 Vietnamese refugees are being detained.

Germany:

Police in Bonn said that two British soldiers were shot and wounded at a military housing area by unknown assailants. In a telephone call to a Dublin news agency, the Irish Republican Army claimed responsibility for the shooting and said it would attack the British Government and Army anywhere as long as Ireland remains divided.

After the demonstration: China's future in doubt

by Laura Hopper

Perspectives Editor

The Chinese Government announced they will limit the number of students permitted to study abroad. China must, Deng Xiaoping has declared, modernize herself from within, relying on students educated in China only to lead her into the next century. China's space program must now develop its own technology, rather than importing it from the West.

So it appears that China, so recently removed from isolation shall be plunged back into it. And why? Because Deng's regime realized how much of a threat western ideas are. The student demonstrations of last spring would have been impossible without the influx of western ideas such as personal liberty, private property, and free elections that have been brought back to China by people who went abroad. Those students belong to a generation that did not participate in the Second World War or in Mao's Cultural Revolution.

This was a generation young enough to believe that with economic freedom might come political freedom. And for a few weeks, they convinced us that their beliefs might turn into reality. They sat infront of the gates of the Forbidden City, under the very nose of Mao Tse-Tsung. They presented a list of demands to the government and brought their Goddess of Liberty eye to eye with Chairman Mao.

But the regime is not dead. It isn't ready to give up its power. So Deng sent the Army to drive the students away, to hunt them down and bring them to justice. What justice can there be for someone who fights back against tyranny and oppression and loses? Those students who were caught will have many years in prison to think about challenging authority. To regret, the regime hopes, their actions.

For the rest of China, things shall not be the same either. There will be more vigilance, more oppression, less exposure to ideas not Chinese. For the University students who will be returning to classes, there will be a new distribution requirement. Something along the lines of Political Ideology 100 "The Speeches of Chairmen Deng Xiaoping following the Student Demonstration" Deng has decided it is time to reeducate the youth. Let them see by example that the government will allow no dissension among the young. No turning from the chosen path.

Poor China, to be drawn back behind that curtain before having a chance to benefit from what the non-Communist world could have brought you. You have taught the world a valuable lesson at great cost. These governments in the Soviet Union and China are as ready to crumble as we hoped. Their sickly economies have yet to weaken their resolve to rule. If anything, they clutch harder at the people they govern.

Before the countries of the western world merrily sound the death knell of Communism, they should remember that nothing governs a nation quite like fear. China and Eastern Europe can easily retreat behind Mr. Churchill's Iron Curtain, and we would be powerless to stop them.

North American Drug Habits Fuel Colombian War

by Carter Boatner

The recent assassination of Colombian presidential hopeful Louis Carlos Galan on August 18 by drug traffickers began what has been a period of chaos for the Latin American country. Galan's assassination was prompted by his bold platform for combating the drug trade in Colombia.

Following his death, there has been an extended assault upon the drug lords, in an attempt to bring them under the law. Galan was gunned down by death squads hired by drug lords. Along with his death came a bold statement from the targeted Colombian drug cartels, the Medellin and Cali. Their message was "Peace or else."

Efforts by the Colombian Government to round up drug offenders have so far resulted in over 80 convictions with the planned extradition of figures wanted in the United States to begin as early as next month. The Colombian government crackdown is an attempt to curtail and ultimately halt what Colombian president Virgilio Barco has called the "world's largest criminal enterprise," Latin America's multi-billion dollar drug business.

Although recently the violence in Colombia has made the front pages on papers throughout the world, it is not by any means a recent occurrence.

The drug activity being carried on in Colombia and her neighboring countries has been firmly entrenched in Latin America since the early Seventies, and is controlled by individuals brazenly called "Drug Lords." As the name suggests, these individuals are, or were, free to conduct their illicit activities without fear of reprisal by their countries' governments. They were aided in large part by repeated attacks upon representatives of the nations' Government and Judicial systems.

The most recent victim of this intimidation has been the seemingly strong-willed Colombian Justice Minister Monica de Grief, 32. Regardless of mounting pressures, including death threats to herself and her family, De Grief refused to resign, stating that "the law is under siege." Finally, however, she resigned her post after only six weeks, leaving the position open to her successor, who will be the ninth Justice Minister Colombia has had in the past three years. Her immediate predecessor had compared the job to that of a swimming instructor on a sinking ship. Although she had increased requests to the Bush administration for more aid in Columbia's war on drugs, her resignation leaves the justice system in a state of collapse.

The drug-related violence in Colombia is not new. In the past decade more than 50 judges have been slain at the hands of killers hired by Colombia's drug lords, including half of the members of the Supreme Court who were slain in an attack upon the Justice palace in Bogota in 1985. This is consistent with the devaluation of human life which has led to the outburst of drug-related activity among drug gangs in Washington, DC. Over the past year-and-a-half, drug-related killings have escalated to such an extent that they bestow upon the nation's capitol the onerous honor of being the nation's murder capital.

There appears to be no end in sight to the violence in Colombia; drug cartels continue to take responsibility for the most recent outburst of violence, which has resulted in numerous bombings throughout that nation's capitol. Six government owned liquor stores were bombed in retaliation for the government's refusal to negotiate with the cartels.

Also targeted was one of the country's two major daily newspapers, El Espectador, which as recently as last Friday issued a letter of support to the Government for its effort to combat the cartels.

Although the violence in Colombia is the most obvious result of the drug trade, there are other implications founded upon simple economics.

The increase in drug activity has caused the influx of large amounts of cash, called narcodollars. In economies which lack stability such as Colombia's and her neighbors, such large sums of money cause rapid inflation. It is estimated that in 1979 more than $3 billion entered the Colombian economy as the result of drug trafficking. These funds were not invested in legitimate business pursuits, but went largely towards luxury housing.

This occurred in the Peruvian town of Tingo Maria, where the vast number of coca traffickers became wealthy over a short period of time.

With their sudden increase in wealth came an increase in the demand for luxury products; in this case automobiles which pushed the price up astronomically. For example, in 1981 the price of a Chevrolet Chevette reached $25,000, and a Mercedes would command upwards to $350,000.

Another damaging aspect to the drug trade has beeen it's effect upon agricultural economics. With the increase in the demand for coca, many farmers have halted legitimate crop production and diverted their efforts to producing coca. Coca is the only agricultural product whose price has kept pace with inflation, thus posing a dilemma to farmers: either abide by the law and live on sub-standard income, or produce coca so that a comfortable living can be made, and risk imprisonment. As a result, traditional crop production has declined.

Students invade downtown Chestertown

by Katherine Absher
Features Editor

High Street, Chestertown, Maryland U.S.A. is a street that Norman Rockwell would relish in painting. "The Star Spangled Banner," corn bread and cole slaw, and lemonade stands emanate from this neighborhood. This street secretes an atmosphere in which every day is the Fourth of July and a fife player, drummer, and flag bearer will in an instant parade around the next corner. As the ancient brick sidewalks adorning High Street wrap around trees and meander up to houses, the Rolling Stones blasts from the windows, typewriters and computers click clack, and a jolly game of quarters goes on in the kitchen.

Washington College students have invaded middle class America! Lower your flags at half-mast citizens of Chestertown and pray to your colonial forefathers and puritan god that Kent House and Queen Anne will be remodeled!

345 students are living off campus this academic school year. All of course are not traditional students; some are housewives taking classes or graduates working for their teaching certificates.

345, therefore, can be a misleading number. Yet, rooms are vacant in Minta Martin to Reid which does signify that more students have left the campus.

Walking down High Street students can be seen relaxing on the porches of every third or fourth house. In most college towns this is not unusual; the University of Virginia overwhelms Charlottesville, and Ohio University is Athens, Ohio. Only freshmen at U.V.A. or West Virginia University, for example, live in the dorms provided on campus.

Traditionally, Washington College's social and academic activity revolved around the campus itself, but this tradition is vanishing. "It used to be that W.C. students drank their alcohol and did their drugs in the confines of one piece of property. Now the Administration is chasing the students off campus which may cause more fatalities and problems for the local police," commented a former student.

Of the students interviewed, one house on High Street had been fined $100 by the police for a party held on the weekend before classes, and two other groups of students had been warned for excessively loud music. Chief of Police of Chestertown, Mauritz Stetson stated that three noise ordinances have been issued as well as two possessions of alcohol, three for theft of property and one controlled dangerous substance abuse.

Many neighbors are furious with the changing climate of their street brought about by the onslaught of students moving off campus. "I live next to two houses of college students. They think that they are living on their own without their parent's guidance. They are wild cats! They still need mommy's and daddy's overseeing; they have not grown up at all. They're just renting, and they think they own the whole neighborhood. You used to be able to leave your house unlocked—not anymore," argued Jane Alleger. Alleger says there was so much trash in one of the houses next to her last year that the owner called Washington College maintenance and had them haul it away.

When 70-year-old Edward Kenard was asked to name any problems with his student neighbors, he responded by listing "drunkenness, dope, loud music, and screamin' and hollerin', and just all around keeping people up until daybreak." He also added that when he asked his neighbors to lower the volume on their stereo, one young man threatened to beat him up.

Another neighbor on High Street was disgusted with the littering of students: "One morning I picked up 48 empty beer cans and set them on the porch."

Allison Taylor, a former student and resident of High Street, revealed that she is not bothered by the students who live next door to her but admits, "A lot of older people are used to living a quiet and subdued life in my neighborhood and having their own neighborhood to themselves. Now there are a bunch of [students] running around. It's going to make the people from town look down on students from the College."

She further explained parking downtown is more difficult, and there seems to be a shortage of off-campus housing. "The kids that are getting this house after me keep on bugging me on the date I'm moving out. These kids are living with friends until I leave."

Dean Maxcy of Student Affairs, who lives directly downtown, disagrees with his fellow neighbors about off-campus students, "I think it's nice to have students downtown as a resident. As I sit on my front porch, it's nice to see students jogging or on their bicycle and stopping to say hello. The town is more active and lively."

He does acquiesce, however, that there are problems with parking downtown. "My only hope is that the students living off campus will understand that they are citizens of Chestertown. And realize that the townspeople have to go to work at 7 AM—that the townspeople are on a different time clock than most students."

Other townspeople had complimentary things to say about their student neighbors, such as Kevin Langford's (who is running for off-campus dorm senator) neighbor, "Kevin is fantastic. You can't just say a ten, you have to say a thousand. Most of the girls I've lived next to have been outstanding also. It is usually the guys who make the trouble."

Most merchants are pleased with the fact that more students are moving downtown. Andy Goddard, owner of Andy's, commented, "As long as there aren't beer bottles outside the doors and the music isn't cranking until three in the morning, I've not complaints. Basically, it's better for the downtown. They're going to buy more sodas and food."

A local shop owner added that she has no problems with students inhabiting the downtown area, but she suggested, "If the students are going to live off campus they should be aware that they have a responsibilty to the town and to the community. They have to be good about parking, and they can't have large, loud parties. If they do that, they can just pitch them in jail.

Matt Weir, who has lived off campus for three semesters, realizes his social obligation to the community: "Personally, I'm a member of the community. I do not consider myself to be a transplanted member. I'm registered to vote in Chestertown, and I pay taxes here. I've lived in Mexico, Hong Kong, and Venezuela, and I'd rather live in Chestertown than anywhere else."

Jim Doran also feels a comradery with Chestertown: "I like feeling a part of the town; it keeps me in touch with the real world—not banished to dorm and campus life."

Kristy Schiminger continues this train of thought by explaining that she felt her "entire life revolved in one room" when she lived on campus. Now she is enjoying more freedom, although more responsibility, off campus.

Some students, however, feel harassed by their neighbors and townspeople. Jim Doran, Brent Hopkins, and Drew Elbern had one particular experience: "We were practicing yesterday—not past 8 o'clock. An hour-and-a-half later this lady across the street comes snooping around our house with this huge flashlight in her hand. She told us she was the town council representative for our street, and that she thought we were making too much noise. We explained to her that we are all in a band, and we only play in the afternoon, and the people next door have been supportive of us—one of them wants to [jam] with us." After they explained this to her, she became friendlier toward them, but many neighbors are stereotyping students without prior cause.

With more upperclassmen moving away from campus, the community and the students are groping for a happy medium to conduct relations. The townspeople are trying to be patient and understanding, and students are beginning to realize that there are rules governing the community as well as the campus.

The wave of students moving to off-campus housing will probably not stop; too many interviewed enjoyed the freedom of "standing in my pajamas and eating breakfast and not having to get dressed for the dinning hall," laughed Bissett McCurdy.

Dr. Jock: How to enjoy golf despite your score

Golf is a challenging and popular game. However, it's not a fitness sport and since you can play good golf without being in very good shape, many players are not. They are overweight, underflexed, and they have a cardiovascular system that isn't being challenged as it should be, would be, by such aerobic activities as walking, swimming or cycling. Though many golfers do feel pain from time to time when they're playing, they have very little understanding of what they might do to reduce that pain and increase their enjoyment of the game.

MANY GOLFERS FEEL BACK PAIN. Out-of-condition golfers know they can still swing a club, so there's very little incentive for them to get any more exercise than they already get chasing that little white ball in and out of 18 holes. The problem with that is spelled p-a-i-n; more specifically, back pain. According to a recent article in Physician and Sportsmedicine magazine, the major injury suffered by professional golfers is back pain. In the past five years, 80 percent of the injuries sustained by PGA golfers have been back injuries.

WHY DO GOLFERS GET BACK PROBLEMS? There are three primary reasons why golfers have back problems: poor physical conditioning, poor mechanics and overuse. Overuse is caused by a lot of bending over. You bend over to tee the ball and pick it up, you bend as you swing, and you bend in an awkward position as you putt. When you golf three to four hours, you're doing that over and over and over again. Putting may be the toughest on your back. Not only are you bending over, but often you are tense at the same time.

A POOR SWING HURTS MORE THAN YOUR GAME. Most amateur golfers have poor swing mechanics. Most of them swing too hard, sway too much laterally as they rotate, and flex their spines too much as they address the ball for both ground strokes and putting. Keeping the swing compact by cutting down the backswing and follow through should help to reduce stress on the back and might even improve your game. Keeping your shoulders over your hips during the swing reduces lateral bending. Bending the knees rather than bending at the waist minimizes excessive flexing of the spine.

BETTER CONDITIONING, BETTER GOLF. Golf can't get you fit, but a simple program of intense regular exercise, three to four times a week, at least 30 minutes per session will. And the better overall condition you're in, the better your chance of improving your game. Fit golfers have more strength and flexibility. They have more endurance so they don't have to fight fatigue and sloppy performance as they make their way around the course. Most professional golfers walk a golf course every day (Unfortunately, that's the part we don't see on TV!). Too many amateurs ride carts. The pros have begun to understand that they need good aerobic conditioning programs and many have added running, cycling and swimming to their training regimens. You should, too.

EXERCISE TO PREVENT INJURY. A good regimen of back exercises will help you keep your back strong and flexible and much better able to cope with the stress and strain of golf. Diagrams and information about proper back exercises should be available to you through your doctor, or local sports medicine center. Meanwhile, here's a look at some of the exercises recommended:

TO IMPROVE SPINE FLEXIBILITY. Lying on the floor with hips and knees bent and feet flat on the floor is the starting position for all flexibility exercises. First, do the single-knee-to-the-chest stretch, alternating legs. Do it slowly, gently and be sure to keep up an easy pattern of deep, regular breathing. Then bring both knees to the chest. Both of these exercises stretch the muscles of the back.

Then do some rotary stretching. From the same position, stretch your arms out to the side, then rotate your lower trunk to the left and try to touch your lateral right thigh on the floor. Keep your arms in contact with the floor. Repeat, this time throwing your right leg over the left leg as you rotate to the left and extend your right knee. Then rotate your upper trunk to the right and left as far as you can while keeping your knees pointing straight up.

REMEMBER: You are not in a race to finish these exercises quickly. Take your time. Breath deeply. Feel the rotation, the stretch. Be gentle with yourself. Focus your awareness on how your back feels as you go through your paces. Take your stretch to the edge, but don't overdo it.

STAND-UP EXERCISES. You can try these additional back exercises while standing. Raise your arms straight out to the side and stand with your legs spread shoulder width apart. Rotate your trunk as far around to the right and left as you can. Does that sound like what you do during the golf swing? Spread your feet twice as far apart as your shoulders. Then, keeping your knees straight and your feet planted, reach down the side of your left leg as far as you can. Reverse and reach down your right leg. Keep doing that, trying to move further and further down your leg each time. When you can touch the floor with your finger tips, be proud. Even if you never get that far, doing these stretches, day and day, will dramatically stretch both your lateral trunk muscles and your inner thigh muscles and significantly reduce your chance of injury.

Rose loses bets as well as respect

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

There is not a baseball fan live without an opinion on the ecent banning of Pete Rose from aseball and the effect it should ave on his election to the Baseall Hall of Fame. His supporters ay that it would be ludicrous for nything to keep the all-time hits ader from a position in the Hall. is opponents suggest that any an who has so blatantly violated one of the cardinal rules of iseball should be denied enrinement from Cooperstown. ose has always a controversial llplayer, and this controversy ll follow him for the rest of his e.

Regardless of a person's inion on Rose's election to Cooperstown, it is impossible for a fan not to realize the immense disservice the Cincinnati manager has done for baseball. In taking the national pasttime to court, Rose shows complete disregard for all that baseball has done for him over the years. This was Rose's effort to prove that one man can be more powerful than a sport with as storied a past as baseball. Thankfully, all of these selfish efforts proved to be for naught.

Rose must now live with the realization that not only did he bet himself out of the sport he loves but he departed with very little dignity. A man who achieved success by relying on gutsy performance and confidence in his ability, Pete allowed his pride and confidence to get the best of him. Rose is still refusing to admit to his gambling problem despite the amazing amount of evidence pointing to his guilt. For this reason, Rose is making it impossible for baseball fans to give him the respect he yearned for as a ballplayer and manager.

In regard to his enshrinement to Cooperstown, I could never bring myself to voting for a man who has made no effort to pay the game back for all it did for him. One of the many qualifications for election to the Hall is integrity, and at this time the name Pete Rose seems to be an antonym for such a word. If Gaylord Perry is missing from the Hall because he threw a spitball and Ferguson Jenkins is still being punished for his one time arrest for possession of drugs, then there is no way that a man who blatantly abused gambling rules of baseball, then lied in an effort to proclaim his innocence should receive such an honor. It is frightening to think of such a man sharing a place in the Hall with players like Roberto Clemente, Jackie Robinson and Lou Gehrig. These men did all they could for the game of baseball, while Rose has made every effort to completely disregard the laws and tradition of the game. These are efforts that should never be rewarded.

Youth is key for ladies' tennis

by Holly Bramble
Women's Tennis Coach

The WC women's tennis team enters this season dominated by a youthful enthusiasm. The squad is dominated by freshmen and sophomores, and they seem ready to continue the progress started in 1988. Last year's team finished 12-7, placing second behind Gettysburg in the Southern Division of the Middle Atlantic Conference. That was the team's best showing since attaining varsity status in 1975. They begin their season next Monday against Division III opponent Glassboro St., their sights set on the MAC Southern Division crown.

The top six seeded players from last year's team all return for another year of W.C. tennis. These players combined for numerous individual accomplishments last season. #1 seed Tracy Peel and #4 seed Meg Wheatley teamed to play doubles in last year's MAC individual tournament. They reached the finals, falling in three sets by Franklin & Marshall's nationally ranked duo. Peel and #2 seed Monica Blanco qualified to attend the Division III National Championships in Claremont, CA. They returned to Washington College after reaching All-American status.

Peel was nationally ranked in the top 20 by the end of last year, while Peel and Blanco were ranked seventh in doubles. All three of these players return for another season.

Junior Sarah Coste is among the players returning to play "Fall Ball." Coste is a two-sport standout, playing a major role in the success of the women's lacrosse team.

One newcomer has shown a great deal of promise in the early season practices. Tina Lennon-Rye, a freshman from New York, may pay immediate dividends for the women's team.

This team is not only filled with talent, but is also dominated by youth. Meg Wheatley is the only senior among the top six seeds, and Monica Blanco is the only junior on the squad.

Tracy Peel is only a second semester freshman, while #3 seed Miriam Dittman is only a sophomore. Rachel Rice and Marti Roughen are other sophomores who have key roles in the success of the team.

With a makeup of promising freshmen and players experienced in national competition, the women's tennis team should continue their rise to the top of the Southern Division of the Middle Atlantic Conference.

Restructuring unites crew for upcoming season

by Matt Conaty
Reporter

The Washington College crew program has been revitalized by a new sense of vigor and purpose. At the fall 1989 preseason meeting held August 28th, the turnout of potential rowers and coxswains was impressive: 65 men and women are out for the team this fall.

The freshmen turnout included ten to twelve rowers with high school experience. Those in attendance were informed of radical changes in the structure of the coaching system.

In the past, the men and women's crews have been coached as separate programs. That standard has been altered with the combination of the men and women under the leadership of Don Chatelier and Mickey Dulin. The coaches will rotate between the men's and women's shells, allowing them to assist members of the entire program. The prospect of several coaches rotating from shell to shell will allow every rower, male and female, to benefit from a variety of coaching techniques.

Aston Richards was hired to join this team of coaches for the fall season. Richards has rowed since the age of fourteen, and he rowed collegiately at Syracuse University. His impressive record includes coaching positions with the University of Nebraska, various club teams and the St. Andrews School in Middletown, Delaware.

Richards attended the meeting and spoke of the love-hate relationship most rowers develop with their sport. He talked about the pain and struggle involved in crew, but reminded the rowers of the ultimate goal of the sport.

Richards related, "After winning a race, rowers can stare over at the opposition and know that they have put them in their back pocket. They own them."

The other coaches joined Richards in his enthusiasm for the sport, and they were optimistic about the potential for a great year. Don Chatelier was impressed with the high-school experience of the new members of the team, while Mickey Dulin spoke of the importance of pacing the team to prevent burnout at year's end. Dulin and the other coaches have their sights set on the Dad Vail Regatta in the spring.

"We hope to have a large number of boats at the Dad Vails, and we want all of them to deserve to be there," Dulin stated. "This will be the best year in WC crew history."

Soccer drops first game of year to Division I opponent

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

The men's soccer season started off on the wrong foot as the Sho'men fell to Division I opponent Mount St. Mary's 3-0 this past Tuesday. The team was unable to capitalize on early scoring opportunities and played a lackluster second half in this first loss of the season.

The team was unable to display their offensive power in this game. Their three best chances came in the first half, and each time the Sho'men player failed to put the ball in the back of the net. Mike Bishop's shot off of a free kick was denied on an excellent save by the Mount St. Mary's goalkeeper. Jon Seal made a brilliant run down the field, but his shot proved to be high and wide. Larry Kilroy had the best chance for a Sho'men goal in the game, but his follow-up shot sailed just over the net.

The Sho'men spent much of the second half in the defensive end of the field, and they had very few opportunities for so much as a shoot on goal. Mount St. Mary's lengthened their 1-0 halftime lead to 3-0 within the first twenty minutes of the second half to put the game out of reach.

Still,Aassistant Coach Peter Allen warned there was no reason to be worried.

"It's hard to get excited after being blown out, but it was obvious that overall this team has improved drastically from last year. We played a lackluster game, but we played the type of game that would ordinarily get things done against regular Middle Atlantic Conference competition."

This was the first of two consecutive games the Sho'men will play against Division I teams. Many strong Division III teams play inferior teams to start the year in an effort to pad their record. Coach Bowman and his staff decided that it was more important for his teams to face a strong challenge in the early games.

"With as strong a team as we have, it's a far better tuneup for us to face this tougher competition," Peter Allen commented. "These games don't really count toward our position in the MAC standings, and this difficult early schedule should prove to be a learning experience for the team."

The Sho'men played a strong defensive game, but the superior ability of Mount St. Mary's eventually proved to be too much. The team suffered only three defensive lapses, and all three resulted in goals. These lapses proved to be the difference in the game. "Mount St. Mary's only had three excellent chances all day and scored all three times."

The soccer season continues this Friday against Delaware out on Kibler Field, and the team plays its first Division III opponent Sunday at Greensboro.

Coach Allen hopes that the game against Delaware will be one more step on their road to the Middle Atlantic Conference Championship. "While other teams are playing games in an effort to improve their record, we are continuing the learning process we started this summer on our trip to England."

Tennis hopes to continue success

by Fred Wyman
Men's Tennis Coach

Over the past few years, the W.C. men's tennis team has quickly turned into a national powerhouse. Last season was a resounding success, and there is good reason for optimism as the team readies itself for its first test of the year, this Friday against Haverford.

The 1988-1989 season marked the fourth consecutive year the Sho'men have reached the NCAA Division III National Championships. It was also the third straight year the WC netters reached the semifinals. The team ended the season ranked fourth nationally.

1989 was also the first year a Sho'men player has ever battled for the national championship in Division III men's singles. Larry Gewer bowed to Washington and Lee's John Morris in three sets. Gewer and teammate Scott Read also made huge steps in the Championships, making it all the way to the semifinals. Read was a hit on the national scene as well, winning the singles title at the Eastern Regional Small Colle3ge Championship at Swarthmore College.

This year's team is built around a nucleus of three standout players. Gewer, Read and Peter Maller were all nationally ranked last season, with Gewer and Read finishing the year among the top ten. All three players were honored as All-Americans, and Maller was also an Academic All-American. Maller plays soccer in the fall, but returns in the spring to close out his fine career. Gewer is also a senior, while Read returns as a junior.

The national success of these three players often overshadowed the success of the team itself in the Middle Atlantic Conference. They dominated the competition, winning the team title for the fourth straight year. Peter Maller also won the MAC singles competition, while Read and Bill Shaw combined to take home the doubles crown.

It seems definite that the team will continue its winning ways this season and for years to come. All of the players return from last year's 22-7 team, with the exception of Bill Shaw. Gewer and Maller are the only seniors on the squad, while Read and Roman Inochowsky are the only juniors. Sol Schwartz, Scott Shepherd and Andy Bohwtiwsky are sophomores, and Alberto Diaz is the only freshman on the squad. With the experience and the winning tradition of the team, this promises to be another exceptional year for the men's tennis team.

Campus bands set the record straight

by Stephanie Hess
Arts Editor

It is apparent to returning tudents that some changes have ccurred at Washington College ver the summer. To mention a ew, a building is taking shape here once there existed nothing ut a pit of mud, the firelane is npossible to navigate, and oxwell Hall has been leveled.

Other changes, which are ot so apparent, have taken place ithin the entertainment scene t the College.

Namely, campus bands. new band has been created, an ld band has disappeared, and nother band has revamped its nage.

The new band on the scene his year is SPG.. Three of its embers, Jim Doran, Drew lburn and Brent Hopkins, were embers of Shy At Parties, a mpus cover band that played gether two years ago.

Shy At Parties broke up st year when Hopkins left to udy in England. While he was one, Elburn and Doran spent eir free time writing original ongs that their new band, SPG, ill perform this year.

According to Doran, they ow have "almost enough music r a whole set of originals." SPG kingly describe their music as emi-random post-acid house." oran provides a more serious escription: "rock and roll."

Though the songs they will ay are not all originals, Doran plained that "the covers we are ing now have been modified to ır taste."

"This band is more of our rsonality than Shy At Parties as," Elburn added.

The members of SPG are ick to point out the differences tween the two bands. While y At Parties was strictly a cover band that played at campus parties, SPG is more serious about performing original songs, not only at Washington College, but at other schools and in clubs as well.

In addition to playing here on campus, SPG plans to play at Towson and at the University of Delaware, where their fourth member, Bill Burnside, is a student.

A band greatly missed this year is The Incorrigibles. Though they suffered a geographical split at the end of last year when three of the four group members (Jeff Cessna, Todd Karr and Ken Winkler) graduated, they had planned to search out summer gigs and continue performing as a group.

The actual break-up occurred in early July when Todd Deitelbaum, the drummer, left the group for another campus band, 49 Reasons.

In regard to a reunion concert at the Coffee House, an idea proposed by the band's guitarist and lead singer, Winkler, Deitelbaum admitted that he "would play" if asked.

When asked the same question, Karr responded negatively, explaining that he wasn't interested in playing for the public without rehearsing, an impossible feat given the scattered locations of the band members.

49 Reasons has been practicing hard and has seen the most changes this summer. Not only have two of the original five members been replaced, but a sixth member, saxophonist Sam Ferguson of Queenstown, has joined the group.

The new lead singer, Razz, is from Baltimore and Todd Deitelbaum replaces the original drummer, who moved to Virginia.

Guitarist and back-up singer Kirk Ross is trying to correct the bad publicity that has built up around the band over the last year; rumors abounded that the band had not only landed gigs in Ocean City, but a recording contract as well.

"The people who started rumors about the band are not in the band anymore," Ross said.

He added that their "show is much better now." He explained that last year they were performing about thirty songs in an evening. This year they have increased that number to fifty, four of which are originals.

When asked how the band has changed, Deitelbaum noted that "the sound is different, more upbeat than the band was last year."

While WC is their "favorite place to play," this summer 49 Reasons performed in clubs in Newark, Annapolis, and Baltimore. When asked how he feels about playing in clubs outside the Eastern Shore, Ross said, "it's a big adventure."

Ross stated that although 49 Reasons is "a little club band right now," they would eventually like to record an album.

There are two promotional agencies in Philadelphia with whom Ross would like to work. Unfortunately he explained ,the agencies will not look at the band until they become more well-known in big-city clubs and bars.

This weekend, 49 Reasons will play at Armadillo's in Annapolis, and they will play at the Coffee House on September 22. (Watch for announcements about 49 Reasons and SPG around campus and in The Elm.)

Mississippi Burning:
Civil Rights, Hollywood Style

by Andrew Donaldson

Mississippi Burning is a dramatization of the death of three civil rights activists, and the subsequent investigation. It opens with a white man drinking from a metal water fountain, followed by a small black boy drinking from a ceramic one, a stark enough reminder of the systematic nature of racism.

For a movie that purports to deal seriously with the related problems of bigotry and racial violence, this scene is as close as the movie comes to social commentary. Even the next scene, where the activists are run off the road and shot, is watered down. In Mississippi, in 1964, the car held two blacks and one Jew. In the movie, one is Jewish, one is caucasian, and one is black.

Much of the acting in the movie is poor. The villains, from the sheriff to the deputy sheriff to the mayor to the leader of the K.K.K. are all completely unmemorable as caricatures of bigotry and small-mindedness. The blacks, whom one would think would be depicted in some sort of empowering, or at the very least prominent, role in a movie about the deaths of civil rights activists, are almost wholly absent. Mostly they are portrayed as silent and sullen and cowed, with their other performances equally stereotypical.

Gene Hackman stars as Anderson, a grizzled FBI agent, who was once a sheriff in a Mississippi town not unlike the one he has come to investigate. His superior, Ward, played by Willem Dafoe, is aserious-minded, by-the-book, Kennedy appointee. Dafoe rises to the occasion at times to perform beyond his character, and Gene Hackman is convincing as a persuasive, glib, clever, and essentially unscrupulous law man. The performances do not deserve the superimposed good cop-bad cop routine.

Despite a p[illegible] character, Dafoe [illegible] a sometimes inno[illegible] and admirer of those wo[illegible] for social change, while Hackman works best while developing the genuine chemistry between his character and Mrs. Pell, the deputy sheriff's wife, played by Frances McDormand. The character change which leads to the movie's degeneration into vigilanteism is unconvincing.

In the end, a movie which should commemorate civil rights, assert the dignity of man and the necessity of just laws, celebrates criminal behavior. The movie, then, receives a mixed review: it contains one outstanding, and one very good performance, but is morally indefensible.

Baltimore artist Symmes Gardner exhibits figurative art with an unexpected twist

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff Writer

Following the WC tradition of giving students opportunities to experience the arts firsthand, the Arts Exhibits Committee has scheduled its first art show of the fall semester.

Baltimore artist Symmes Gardner opens his solo exhibition of recent works tonight from 5 PM to 7 PM with a public reception in the Tawes Lobby of Gibson Fine Arts Center.

In his paintings, Gardner uses images from classical painting and mythology, refashioned to create new, twentieth-century symbols. Describing Gardner's work, Tex Andrews, Lecturer in the Art Department, said, "His works are odd juxtapositions, somewhat unusual compositions for a figurative painter."

In a statement about art, Gardner wrote, "The desire is to inspire the intellect and the emotions to make a 'leap' into the unseen...; to a universe that is invisible and contained within us, comprised of all our experiences individual and shared.

"Art," he continued, "aspires to this other world. To explain man in another sense. This is a different world and sense of man than that of archaeology, science, history and religion."

Gardner's work has not gone unnoticed. In 1979 he was awarded the Engal Prize for Painting from the Philadelphia College of Art. In autumn of that same year, Gardner attended Brooklyn College as a student of its graduate program and went on to graduate with his MFA from the Tyler School of Art at Temple University in Philadelphia.

Outside of a solo exhibition at the Tyler School of Art while he was still a student there, 34-year-old Gardner also presented his work in a solo exhibition two years ago at the Walker, Ursitti and McGuinnis Gallery in Washington, DC. Within the past 11 years, Gardner has taken part in six group exhibitions, four of which were held in DC.

In addition to participating in exhibitions, Gardner has lectured at Prince George's Community College in Landover, MD, and at the Anton Gallery in D.C. Articles featuring him and his work have been included in New Art Examiner, a national magazine, Museum and Arts, a local mid-Atlantic publication and the Washington Post.

Presently, Gardner is the Director of the Art Gallery at the University of MD, Baltimore County campus and is also a part-time teacher at Howard County Community College.

The artist at work in his studio; Symmes Gardner mixes paint at the table, and in the background stands one of the twenty paintings that will be on display in the Tawes Lobby until September 24.

Gardner's show kicks off what Andrews predicts will be a "lively season" at WC. Planned for October and the beginning of November is a traveling show of prints, sponsored by Maryland Art Place (MAP). In the spring Constance Stuart Larrabee will present her WWII photographs, which are currently opening in Washington, DC at the National Museum of Women in the Arts.

Also in the works is a show to be scheduled between Thanksgiving and Christmas, while planning continues for the Student Art Show and the Chestertown Arts League Show in the spring.

Andrews credits WC for the resources to schedule an active year, explaining, "The [Arts Exhibits] Committee is very grateful to the President's Office for a generous allocation of money for discretionary funds for our budget this year." He added that this year's funding is three times the amount of money the Committee has worked with in previous years.

Nearly twenty of Gardner's paintings and drawings will be on display Thursday through Sunday from 1 PM to 5 PM in Tawes Lobby until September 24.

Campus events this week: things to do and places to be

Sept. 8,10,11

The Film Series will show the movie Mississippi Burning at 7:30 PM in the Norman James Theater on Friday, Sunday and Monday nights. Featuring Gene Hackman and Willem Dafoe, and directed by Alan Parker, the film deals with racial issues based upon a real-life incident of the Civil Rights movement. A related review by Andrew Donaldson is presented on page 9.

Friday Sept. 8

The opening reception of an art exhibit by Baltimore artist Symmes Gardner will be held from 5-7 PM tonight in the Tawes Lobby of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. This exhibit is the first of several planned for the year. A related article by Jennifer Del Nero can be found above.

Also planned for this evening is a dance held by the ZTA's in the Coffee House from 9 PM to 1 AM. The deejay is Rockin' Rupe from Ocean City. Admission will be $3. An ID is required from anyone who wishes to drink.

Saturday Sept. 9

Daytime entertainment can be found in Chestertown at Art in the Park, where local artists and craftsmen will be displaying their work in the square.

Those looking for rugs, lamps or antique jewelry can entertain themselves on campus by browsing or buying at the Kent and Queen Anne Almumni Chapters Flea Market held on the campus lawn.

Tuesday Sept. 12

Creative Writing Professor Robert Day will speak on "The Poetry of Howard Nemerov" at 8 PM in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library. Nemerov is the poet laureate of the United States and will be visiting the College and reading from his work on Sept. 19 as part of the Sophie Kerr Series.

Thursday Sept. 14

Erich Bloch, Director of the National Science Foundation, will be speaking at Fall Convocation at 7:30 PM in Tawes Theater. Bloch will discuss the state of science education, research and development in America today.

Cable confusion

by Sharon Bonner
Reporter

Simmons Cable Company representatives met with Washington College administrators this summer to discuss plans for the installation and reactivation of cable lines in campus dormitories.

Simmons agreed to notify Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, and Dr. Paul Bishop, Director of Computing, when an exact date for installation of the cable is decided.

Although no official notice has been given to the College, Simmons stated that they will install cable lines in Middle, East, and West Halls by Monday, September 11.

"We have established good working relations with Simmons Cable Company. We anticipate that within the next two to three weeks, cable should be installed depending on Simmons Cable Company's work schedule," commented Baer.

Simmons will eventually restore cable to Caroline, Queen Annes, Kent, the new dorms, and Hodson Hall; the company has not yet notified the College with a proposal on the reinstallation of cable lines to Reid Hall and Minta Martin.

The Administration requested that Simmons present the College with a drawing of the plans for installation of the cable wires. This will insure that no telephone or computer lines already installed underground are accidentally damaged during the cable installation.

At this time, Baer has received no written plans for cable installation from Simmons Cable Company.

Last year, apparently, students "exploited" that privilege: "...the behavior...was at a new high and an unacceptable level."

This year Stetson plans to "vigorously" enforce laws and ordinances. "I would like to point out...that the law prohibits the possession of an alcoholic beverage if you are under the age of 21; that disorderly conduct and the disturbance of public peace are criminal statutes and could result in that person's arrest for such an arrest obtaining a criminal record the rest of their lives."

"This letter is not meant to be a threat," he concluded.

On September 1, a former Washington College student, Peter Andre Goode, was arrested at 500 Queen Street at the party of a current student, according to police reports. Police visited the party in response to a complaint about the noise, and arrested Goode for possession of a controlled dangerous substance.

Yet residents and students of Queene Street met this Thursday to try to communicate their concerns to one another. Said Maxcy, "Everyone just wants to be the best neighbors possible."

Erich Bloch, Director of the National Science Foundation in Washington, D.C., will be the keynote speaker at Washington College's Fall Convocation Thursday, September 14 at 7:30 p.m. As the head of the governmental agency that awards grants for scientific research in all fields of natural and social sciences, Bloch is leading efforts to improve science and engineering education. At the Convocation, Bloch will speak on the state of science education in the United States today, and review the efforts of the National Science Foundation to strengthen scientific research and increase the interchange of scientific information among scientists in the U.S. and abroad. Fall Convocation is held in Tawes Auditorium of the Gibson Fine Arts Center at Washington College in Chestertown. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend. (photo courtesy Marshall Williams)

New Department Heads

In an August 18 memo to the faculty from President Douglass Cater, the new departmental chairs were officially announced.

Dr. Davy McCall will replace Dr. W. Michael Bailey as chair of the economics department, and Dr. Bennett Lamond will take Dr. Nancy Tatum's place as chair of the English Department. Dr. Garry Clarke is now chair of the Department of Art, Pro Tem, previously held by Ms. Susan Tessem.

While Dr. David Newell is teaching at West Point, Dr. George Shivers will act as director of the graduate program, and Dr. Robert Andersen will act as chair of the Department of Philosophy.

The steering committee for the Washington College 1983 Self-Study for Middle States Accrediting Association suggested that "there be at least occasional assessment of the performance of department chairmen by the Dean and President to ensure that incumbencies are not carried forward by inertia alone."

In an interview with Susan DiLeo, Dr. Elizabeth Baer, provost and dean of the college, explained that each spring the dean and the president look at the departments, take into consideration who "needs a break," and talk with the Tenure Committee about possible changes.

Baer also explained to DiLeo that the provision 'for' turnover "allows for the sharing of burdens (of the job)," gives different people a turn at the leadership role, and with the change of the chair comes the opportunity for different policies and ideas within the department.

Alcohol Policy reflects other issues

by Tracey Connell

Recent changes in the alcohol policy have prompted discussion among students. Some feel it may compromise the College's "traditional" liberal policy. Nevertheless, College policy has changed several times over the past twenty three years.

In 1965-66, Washington College was a dry campus. The Student Handbook for that year states, "Intoxication on or off campus will not be tolerated. In addition students are forbidden to bring or possess intoxicants on the College campus."

The State Alcoholic Beverage Law was then quoted. Four paragraphs of statutes expounded on the 21 drinking age.

Only two years later the policy was shortened from a full page to three lines in the Handbook.

"Alcoholic beverages of any nature are not permitted on campus. Any student who is found to be intoxicated on the campus will be subject to disciplinary action."

Finally, in 1978, the "liberal policy" was added to the handbook.

"Washington College's policy regarding alcoholic beverages on campus is based on the assumption that students will accept personal responsibility and will strive to maintain a standard of personal conduct consistent with the Standards of Conduct."

The policy remained relatively unchanged until 1985 when it was again expanded to allow for "change in legislation".

In that year's handbook it was stated, "The College has always held as one of its goals the teaching of responsible social behavior. (For students of legal drinking age, this includes the responsible use of alcohol.)"

Many of the restrictions placed on organizations serving alcohol were placed then, such as the requirement that food and non-alcoholic beverages be served at functions where beer and wine are served.

This semester, students returned to campus to find yet another rule added to a three page list.

"The organizers of any party which is open to the campus MUST hire College approved bartenders through WCDS..."

Ed Maxcy, Associate Dean of Student Affairs, cited legislation as well as pressure from parents and Chestertown citizens. "Not only are all the members of the sponsoring group liable, but also, of course, the College is liable. We've had complaints that local high school students are being served at college, too.

"We are very concerned."

Another issue may have clouded the "liberal policy." Students living off campus have clashed with some local residents.

Kent County News reported this week that "The group [of residents] even had videotapes and snapshots of dirty laundry, bottles, debris and cars on the sidewalks."

Students were reported as having "all-night parties often involving alcohol consumption, public urination, brawling and littering."

Christine Wiant, President of the Zeta sorority, expressed her personal opinion. "It takes a lot of pressure off of the sorority

Freshman Demo

Two hundred and thirty two freshman are currently attending Washington College. They represent twenty one states and one foreign country. Director of Admissions, Kevin Coveny, deemed this year's freshman "almost a mirror image of last year's". He stated that the quality of students is virtually the same, although a surprising number of them have international background. The class, according to the Director, showed a variety of talents which they exhibited in High School through the mediums of their school newspapers, student government, musicals, etc.. They also seemed enthusiastic about orientation, stated Coveny. THis should portend good things in the future.

Police Reports

Three Washington College students will face charges of theft in district court on November 21. Mark Cavallaro, Nicholas Darcangelo, Michael Johnson and a 17 year old Baltimore youth were cited for theft of college property August 25. The three students shared a residence on Flatland Road.

Lt. John Price made the arrest after observing the group loading furniture into a truck at night. Darcangelo and Johnson have been expelled.

A hearing for a former Washington College student will be held on September 14 at district court. Peter Andre Goode, 25, was in attendance at a student party at 500 Queen Street, according to police reports. At approximately 12:50 AM, Chestertown police responded to a complaint about the gathering. Upon entering they found Goode in possession of the illegal substance. His court date will be set at the September hearing.

John Manning, Daniel Pratt, and Ron Council were arrested and charged for violating the noise ordinance after 11pm, August 26. The usual penalty for first offense is $100.

Chestertown Police Chief Stetson stated in this weeks issue of the Kent County News that "When we get a complaint of noise, we'll look for every violation we can...possession of drugs, underage possession of alcohol or serving alcohol to minirs..until these kids learn their lesson."

November 2 is the new date set for Phil Tom Jackson's trial at the Kent County Circuit Court. Jackson allegedly extorted funds from the Student Government Association when he served as Treasurer last year.

Summer Board appointments

Kevin O'Keefe '74, Ellen Corddry Adkins '49, and Donald F. McHugh '53 were elected by alumni ballot to the College's Board of Visitors and Governors in May.

O'Keefe is president of the Sandler Group as well as various other Wasington College groups

Adkins is a former member of the Washington College Alumni Council.

McHugh has been a member of the Washington College Visiting Committee and a panelist at a colege Symposium.

Wiant added that student response may not have been so critical "if we had been informed before hand. There is a major lack of communication. If they are going to do it that way, students are going to rebel."

Both Maxcy and Wiant agreed that Washington College still has a liberal drinking policy. Stated Maxcy, "this is a responsible way of allowing students to have parties with alcohol."

Regardless of the Sigs, the International House is here to stay. With the advent of this centrally located facility for International studies, it is hoped that many more people who were confused at the diffused state of affairs before will be able to take advantage of the many opportunities that the International House has to offer. "In today's world of instant communication and modern technology, it is absurd to consider a national perspective for your education- an international perspective is much more adequate and enjoyable," said Chaffin.

TABLE TALK

There are several positions still available on the serving line and in the dishroom. All are welcomed to apply. Anyone interested in working for the W.C.D.S. should contact Mrs. Crew.

The W.C.D.S. has really gotten the new school year off to a good start. We have had two special events- both were a success. On August 30th we had a Welcome Back Dinner featuring as the crabs and spareribs you could eat with a host of other great items. Last Wednesday evening we had a Steamship Dinner which was really well attended . There's more to come next Wednesday evening, we will be having an Eastern Shore Dinner. We will be having an extra special Sunday Buffet September 17th. Continental Breakfast will start at 10:00-11:00 a.m. and the buffet will start at 11:00 a.m.-12:30 p.m.

Powerful in very obvious ways that don't lessen the power. In the stunning opening scene, three civil-rights workers are pursued by murderous rednecks, and the chase, beautifully photographed, fills you with a mournful despair—you know how the scene, which is based on the 1964 murders of James Chaney, Michael Schwerner, and Andrew Goodman, is going to end. The movie, which focuses on whites, is about fear and the meanness of self-justification. Willem Dafoe plays the young FBI agent who comes to town to investigate the murders, and Gene Hackman is an older agent, a former small-town sheriff who understands what whites feel about blacks and why. The scenes are incisively written and Hackman's performance is definitive. Powerfully directed by Alan Parker.

Satellite station proposed for the College

By Sharon Bonner
Reporter

A report submitted last year by Paul Bishop, Director of Computing, and Jay Meranchik, Audio/Visual Director, proposed the idea of a satellite station on campus. Recently, the idea has resurfaced due to the desire for cable television in student dormitories.

Included in the written report were summaries of the progress other colleges and universities have made in constructing satellite systems.

Hampden-Sydney College organized a satellite system consisting of two satellite dishes; student population there is about 900-1000. The satellite system is connected only to the library, not in individual dormitories. Located in the library are ten viewing rooms, featuring channels which offer nationwide programs, science educational, Russian, Spanish, and German education channels and some international stations, as well as entertainment channels.

The University of Maryland located on the Eastern Shore (UMES) has also successfully planned and constructed a satellite station system. One satellite dish receiver is connected to the library, the other is connected to the Arts and Technical Center.

Funds to support the UMES satellite station were granted through "Title Three Funds," a federal-funded program to support instructional programming.

Leon Copelan, Chairperson for the Department of Technology at UMES, commented, "The keypoint in getting started in planning the satellite system is to evaluate how it can be best used to enhance an institution's educational programs. The opportunities with the satellite program are unlimited."

A satellite system would provide Washington College with access to educational programming distributed via satellite by various organizations, such as the National University Teleconference Network at Oklahoma State University. A video distribution system on campus could provide cable TV service over the same cabling plan.

It is possible that the College Administration could negotiate a contract with Simmons Cable in order to offer students both channels recieved from the satellite and from the cable network.

Many problems exist with students dealing individually with Simmons Cable Company. The College Administration has no control over the prices students are charged. With a campus video distribution system, the College could negotiate directly with Simmons Cable for only those channels requested by campus residents. No additional adapter box would be required with a campus video system as it uses only the standard channels 2 through 13.

A college-owned video system would allow the College to be directly involved in the installation and wiring of all dormitories. This would alleviate the danger of the cable company unintentionally destroying telephone, computer, and other wiring already installed underground.

The report written by Bishop and Meranchik explored the feasibility of a satellite earth station from the technical standpoint. Problems with initial organization of the campus cable TV system include: dormitory access, student billing, selection of channels provided on the system, and funding for the installation of this system.

"I would like to hear what the students think about access to educational programming currently available via satellite, and what types of programs would be of interest to them," commented Bishop.

One approach to selecting programming on a campus system would be to send ballots and questionaires around the campus offering a choice of channels for selection.

Science educational, language educational, Financial networks, international programming, teleconferences at various universities, and other entertainment channels, are examples of the types of programs that would be available. Another progam available through the satellite is live and taped coverage of US House of Representatives and US Senate.

The initial report on the satellite proposal explained another technological program termed "two-way interactive distance learning." These are specialty courses instructed by professors across the state or nation which the satellite system can receive.

The concluding statement of the report states, "This tool could be used by many of our departments, including language, business, economics, political science, and knowledge of our world in general for our students' futures."

Dr. George Shivers, Professor of Spanish, commented, "The language department is in favor of the proposal assuming that the satellite system would be useful in our educational program." In the past, the language department had suggested the idea of a satellite system to improve language education. The language department had not formerly been informed that a written report of the satellite system proposal was submitted to the Administration. The department supports the proposal as long as funding for the project is available.

The financial feasibility of the satellite station program depends on whether or not the National Endowment for Humanities Grant is granted to the College.

Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, explained, "If the response to the portion of the grant request which deals with the satellite station proposal is positive, then we would be in a position to move ahead with the project."

According to David Wheelan, Vice President for Development and College Relations, the Administration expects a final decision concerning the grant by the end of December

Although the College expects to receive the grant, if the response from the proposal is nega-

Students neglect residents' meeting

by Ed Schroeder
Reporter

Last Friday night, there was a scheduled meeting for the residents of Queen Street, which was to include both the participation of students of Washington College and community members of Chestertown.

Not one of the student representatives showed up to actively participate.

"This meeting wasn't meant as a forum to launch complaints against students," one Queen Street resident explained. "We merely wanted to get to know who our neighbors are."

The first and most important concern was to make sure that the students were happy with their new housing. It was also meant to serve as a gathering for students and residents to become familiar with one another.

Secondly, trash pickup and badly maintained houses has been a pending dilemma. Residents needed student as well as community input to better help Chestertown Town Manager, Bill Ingersoll, in evaluating the situation.

Finally, there has been an issue of reckless driving in this area. Many drivers use Queen Street as a shortcut because of its accessibility. Police will be notified to insure the safety of the street's inhabitants.

Residents who attended this meeting were shocked that stu-

Students must take action to change alcohol laws

The latest addition to the alcohol policy—unaffectionately known around here as the 'babysitter provision'—has been lambasted ad nauseum, but several opponents of the policy are targeting their criticism in the wrong direction.

The buck does not stop in Student Affairs; they cannot say that it's OK for students under 21 to imbibe alcohol, since it's illegal. Federal law applies even to small, independent colleges.

The party, as it were, is over. Used to be anyone of any age could down a few beers at Washington College, but thanks to students who can't handle their alcohol and the possibility of liability suits against the College, those days are gone. Of course, this is not to suggest that students will not find a way around the babysitter provision with a modicum of creativity.

However disheartening it is to see so many students fretting about where their next beer is coming from (alcohol being one of the four essential needs of a number of students, along with food, sex, and cable) instead of, say, worrying about the decline of the Chesapeake Bay, there is a principle at stake.

The concept that anyone who is old enough to vote and to fight for this country is old enough to drink alcohol is a long-dormant idea, and arguably a dated one in these conservative times of relative peace and low voting records. Then again, today (most) people are educated by organizations like AA, MADD, and SADD about the pitfalls of alcoholism and the dangers of drinking and driving.

Thus, it's pretty safe to say that we are more aware of the pros and cons of drinking than generations before us. Today, responsibility where alcohol is concerned has little to do with age.

The bottom line is that the Administration is powerless when it comes to reforming federal law; students who are truly concerned about the present drinking age must take action.

Think about it: there are dry campuses across the country with thousands of students griping about the drinking age. A student coalition to reduce the drinking age is not as farfetched as it sounds, and it is certainly more effective than moaning and groaning.

WC gives its students a grounding in the real world

To the Editor:

In light of the arrival of 200+ freshman on campus defining Washington College for themselves, Chris Deri's article on "Impressions" of WC caused me concern. I couldn't determine if the piece was intended as a satire or if it was written as a serious editorial. Can Deri really be so preoccupied with finding a "stereotype to bond to" that he can't find his own niche?

As a 7 Sisters graduate who spent her "Junior Year abroad" at WC (and it really was that culturally stimulating), is this Newton waiting for the apple? If he is, he'll only end up with fig on his face, and miss the arrival of the geese, the first pep rally, and a whole bunch of diverse, neat people. That's the beauty and specialty of a small liberal arts college such as WC. And while Chestertown is not a Cambridge or a Charlottesville, there is something here— some call it the Claws of Chestertown. I'd agree; after living in Manhattan and Lexington and Boston, this is where I choose to live.

But specific to the College: The academic and social education I experienced at Washington College was far superior and more enlightening than that at Smith College. It was the Washington College students who were willing to help me with my first polysci oral report and who brought me home from the 'Vern when I had mono Spring semester. At Smith, my colleagues hoarded the previous year's bio tests; competitive to the point of cattiness for vet and med school places. Look at the alum notes. My friends at the Ivys - Harvard, Brown, Princeton who went on to the Kennedy School of Government, or Stanford Law School or Columbia MBA— are in the peace corps, baking bread, having babies and learning massage or stressing out at a Fortune 500. My friends from WC— who had active schedules— are entrepreneurs, brokers, their own bosses. Not that there is anything wrong with baking Russian bread. The point is - Washington College gives its students a sense of true accomplishment, of citizenship, a grounding in the real world. I was continuously amazed that students who stayed up until all hours were at their 8:30 AM class. The students learn to discover, to juggle and apply real knowledge to the real world. These students master the art of public speaking (the benefit of small classes) and can literally talk their way out of a paper bag. WC students gain a competitive edge by virtue of the College's size and individualized attention. The faculty are not preoccupied with getting published (for tenure) so they can focus on the students-and that they do, incredibly well.

The renown of Washington College is spreading. I've met people in Europe and even from Australia who know about Washington College-wither from tall tales or their own adventures on campus or contact with students and alums. it was my Smith College dean who suggested I spend my junior year here. Those who know the College, know it well and have a high regard for it. President Cater has indeed been "telling the story of Washington College" and called great attention to this small College, in part by the people he's familiarized with WC. I've met— not just glimpsed at from the back seat in some lecture hall - but had lunch with, spoken with some incredible people at Washington College from Sandra Day O'Connor to Seymour Toppings, Editor of the NYT Sunday Magazine. President Cater has "let the cat out of the bag." However, it is upon to us, the students and alumni to make sure that the tale continues with the integrity and independence of a cat. For it is by its alumni that a College is judged.

My comment to Chris Deri is too bad for your sake you're leaving the College and with such a passive defeatist attitude, good luck in the real world where opportunities and labels do not fall at one's feet.

Acting Assistant Director of Development

Fall enrollment statistics

To the Editor:

In order to clarify the facts regarding our 1989 fall enrollment and housing figures I wish to report the following:

1. The new undergraduate headcount for Fall 1989 is 271. This translates into 19 fewer freshmen and 9 fewer transfer students in this year's entering class. Please note that to comply with our "steady state" enrollment mandate, we planned to enroll fewer new students this year.

2. There are 646 students housed on campus this fall; 253 are new students and 393 are continuing students. Last fall, we housed 695 students; 264 were new students and 431 were continuing students.

3. There are 244 students living off campus this fall as compared to 191 students last year. Both figures include adult learners and local residents who are matriculated as undergraduate students at Washington College.

It is important to understand that enrollment and housing counts remain somewhat fluid through the first few weeks of the semester and the above-listed figures are subject to change. On campus housing will remain available to interested students throughout the balance of this academic year.

With our enrollment ceiling in effect for 1990-91, there is no anticipated shortage of housing projected for either new or continuing students next year.

Director of Admissions

CAMPUS VOICES

ISSUE: The search for a new president is underway. What issues should the next president of WC take into special consideration?

Next president should stress academics, not revenue

We are about to enter the most important decade in history. With the retirement of President Douglass Cater, the new president will have the immensely important task of leading Washington College into the next century. The importance of the next ten years cannot be underestimated and the person who holds the most prominent position at this school must be equipped with the determination and understanding needed to adequately prepare students for what lies ahead.

If our culture is to survive and flourish, one area must take precedence above all others: education. Without it we are doomed to continue on our path of decay, where materialism dominates over all aesthetic and ethical values.

Washington College is perhaps one of the few remaining bastions of the liberal arts where these values are still held in high regard, while other institutions emphasize the more tangible and scientific areas of study. Our next president must be one who can realize and exercise the full potential of this school to produce cognizant, creative, and open-mended students who are not solely preoccupied with owning expensive cars or holding corporate positions.

Few would begrudge President Cater for what he has done for this school. It can certainly be said that he did a great deal to put Washington College on the proverbial map. However, if and when the Master Plan is completed, will it have achieved what Cater intended? It seems likely that if we continue on this course of expansion and "improvement," Washington College may very well lose its renowned focus upon the individual student. Already, many have noticed that they are becoming little more than student ID numbers filled in on a form, the individual case lost in the shuffle of administrative jargon and bureaucracy.

The new president of Washington College should turn away from the physical appearance of the College, forsake increased revenue and prestige, and bring his forces to bear on the problems at hand. Every department does not perform at its fullest potential, nor is there any kind of social and ethnic balance among the student body to fully utilize those departments.

Washington College has grown in size and stature, but it has not kept up social progress around it and it may be losing its hold on the art and creativity which should beat its core. As the size of classes swell with increased enrollment, so too the burden upon the faculty grows. Invaluable time better spent teaching and learning goes into keeping records and fighting red tape. Too much of the student's money, time, and energy is wasted in a struggle with the Buntingon.

Stephen F. Lorenz

Understandably, a school cannot be run without an administration, but we can and must have a president whose strength, dynamic character, and love of learning will bring about a progressive balance between the faculty, the administration, and the students.

Along with the change in presidency, a change in the student body is required. A president who is willing and able to bring about a higher degree of equality and academic excellence must be reflected by students who are aggressive and critical about their own education. We accept too easily how we are taught and the problematic sys-

One question he/she should ask, is why over 30 percent of the students live off campus— it does seem a little odd, don't you think? It would also be nice for teachers and students to work with the administration, not around them.

Cater's shoes will be difficult to fill

Filling the shoes of Douglass Cater. On an ordinary day, the thought would be humbling enough; yet half-way through the most dramatic growth spurt which this college has seen in its two centuries of history, the task of finding a new president may well be one of the most challenging and exhaustive projects faced by our community to date.

And Cater's shoes have grown considerably during his few years of service; partly because of the growing difficulty in maintaining a small college and partly because of the overwhelming goals which he has set for ours. So big are his shoes that he himself admits difficulty in dragging them around any longer, leaving us with the task of finding a willing and able replacement, ready to take the helm mid-way through this journey to a mysterious destination known only as the Master Plan.

The new president will have to face the responsibility of living up to many of the accomplishments of the present administration. One of the biggest challenges to the new president will be to keep the momentum going which has driven the College through so many dramatic improvements in such a short period. In addition, Cater is noted for his accomplishments in reaching out to the alumni and raising money for Washington College. This feat, made possible primarily by Cater's sense of long term planning and goal setting, will be a standard not easily matched by a new president.

Tony Caligiuri

Yet, besides the many accomplishments for which Cater's administration may take credit, the student body is calling out for more personal attention and appreciation of student views and initiative by a new president. Although the administration has made great strides in modernizing and rejuvenating the campus, many students are beginning to feel that the interests and views of the wealthy alumni and unborn graduating classes far outweigh the views and opinions of today's student body. The new president should be willing to make a greater effort to stay in touch with student opinion and views, keeping in mind that an alienated student body today will inevitably result in alienated alumni tomorrow.

In addition, students are looking for a greater role in the planning of the future for Washington College rather than simply a half-hearted annual update on its progress. One with a willingness to open up more to student input, as well as one who is as comfortable walking the hallways and sitting in on a classroom discussion as reaching out to alumni would undoubtedly serve to strengthen student-administration relations.

The new president must be one who appreciates the role of the small college and understands the importance of its survival. As Cater has stated many times, in a world of corporate takeovers and unprecedented buy-outs, one must constantly fight the notion the "bigger is better."

The new president must not only be attentive to the work that has already been done, yet she must also be ready to take new initiative in dealing with many pressing issues which will face the campus in the next few years.

One of the most blatant problems facing this campus is the racial inequities of the student body. To the naked eye, Washington College appears to be a lasting outpost of racial segregation, and the new president must be willing to take serious initiatives to create a more acceptable racial balance in the student body.

Washington College has also reached a state at which the fate of the Greek system and the continuance of the present alcohol policy are coming under serious question. Both of these issues have the potential for dramatically altering the image and atmosphere of the college, and warrant serious attention by a new administration.

Finally, as the new president begins to serve her term and the last of the master plan finally falls into place, the greatest challenge to the youthful administration will be the prevention of a sense of complacency and satisfaction settling over the campus. President Cater proved that one of the most important things in the survival of the small college is maintaining a drive to improve, to stand out, and to never be

Gorbachev faces a troubled Soviet Union

Laura Hopper
Perspectives Editor

Paranoia must be running quite high at the Kremlin these days. Mikhail Gorbachev just returned from his vacation in the Crimea, and certainly has his work cut out for him. According to him, the conservatives and radicals in the government are trying to push the Soviet Union to the brink of instability. It looks as if they don't have to push very hard.

The trouble spots are familar, the Baltic States, Armenia and Azerbaijan. A new one could be developing in Moldavia, where there is a movement for self-determination.

In the Baltic States, the situation continues to worsen. These three small countries have non-Russian ethnic majorities, and were independent before the war. They have never willingly considered themselves part of the Soviet Union. Their nationalistic movements reflect their desires to be independent again.

The conflict may come to a head in Lithuania where Mr. Gorbachev personally phoned a warning to Lithuanian Party Chief Algirda Brazauskas less than two weeks ago, warning that Lithuania should forget wanting to be independent. But as strike committees are reportedly forming in Lithuanian factories, Mr. Brazauskas is warning his fellow Lithuanians that military force may be used against protesters.

To compound Mr. Gorbachev's problems, regional and ethic conflict between the provinces of Azerbaijan and Armenia could flare up again. There were several incidents of bloody ethic conflict between the Azerbaijaniis and the Armenians following the devastating Armenian earthquake.

Something is going to have to give in the Soviet Union, and the Bush Administration is concerned that it might be Mr. Gorbachev and his programs. Confidence is not high in Washington regarding the Soviet Leader's future; the Administration is concerned over the situation in the Baltic States. They [The Baltic States] have, one official remarked, forgotten that Gorbachev is the one is responsible for the new attitudes in the Soviet Union. He is the one who has pushed through the reforms that have touched off the nationalist movements in the Soviet Union.

In Washington, the biggest fear is that of a military crackdown in the Baltic States, which would cause division among the members of NATO. The members of the Alliance rely on trade with the Soviet Union in differing amounts, causing their reactions to be different. And a crackdown would certainly spell the end of glasnost.

The coming months will be difficult for the Soviet Union, and interesting for the rest of the world. As the Soviets cope with their social and economic problems, we will see how strong Mr. Gorbachev's position is and how strong the resolve of the disgruntled ethnic groups is as well.

So far, both seem dead set on a confrontation. Mr. Gorbachev has achieved some successes in recent months; he ended a coal miner's strike in the Ukraine that might have spread to other sectors of the economy.

But it is the upcoming elections in the Baltic States that will be the real test of his regime: a test of his power and the creativity of the Communist Parties of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

News from around the world:

United States:

Former President Ronald Reagan is recovering from brain surgery in Rochester, Minnesota. Mr. Reagan underwent surgery to remove fluid that had collected in his brain after a fall from a horse two months ago. Following the operation, which lasted slightly more than an hour, Mr. Reagan was described as "comfortable and in good spirits."

In a speech last Tuesday night, President Bush declared a "war on drugs." Saying that drugs presented "the gravest domestic threat facing our nation," he proposed to spend an additional $ 716 million more than already budgeted for drug control problems. Mr. Bush's new approach will mean more spent on law enforcement and less on treatment and education. Nearly 70% of the proposed drug package will be spent on law enforcement.

Exxon is ending its clean-up efforts in Prince William's Sound, Alaska, and it will be leaving behind 7 of the 11 million gallons of crude oil that were spilled last spring in what was termed "the worst of any oil spill around the globe." Along over 300 miles of shoreline, the oil remains in a muck that is in some places three feet deep. One environmentalist who witnessed the clean-up said that Exxon was "good at writing checks and getting stuff." (Exxon spent $ 1 billion on the clean-up) but not so good at actually cleaning up the oil.

Bloomingdales, one of the world's most famous retailers, went up for sale on Saturday. The retailer has been owned by the Campeau Corporation of Toronto since last year. Campeau's chairman, Marvin S. Traub, is putting together a group to buy Bloomingdales.

South Africa:

In South African elections last Wednesday, a white majority voted to extend the 41 year reign of the National Party headed by F.W. de Klerk. Much violence surrounded the elections, and Archbishop Desmond Tutu said Saturday that his count of people killed by the police on election day numbered 29. One Pretoria officer said the police behaved like "Wild Dogs" chasing and beating both demonstrators and bystanders. The National Party has proposed some concessions to the Black majority; including the repeal, if not suspension, of the national state of emergency; and the release of Nelson Mandella. F.W. de Klerk hopes these proposed changes will move the country towards "evolution away from apartheid".

Poland:

As the formation of Poland's first non-Communist dominated government draws nears, surprising and unexpected developments are emerging from preliminary talks. The government, to be headed by Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki, will be formed by the Communist Party and the Solidarity Party. The Communists will retain control of the Foreign Ministry, Interior Ministry, and at least one other ministry with influence over the economy, while Solidarity will control the Finance Ministry, and the Labor Ministry. At Saturday's talks, the prospective Solidarity Ministers pledged to return Poland to the Market Economy and to seek war reparations from the Soviet Union. They discussed reprivatization, returning large chunks of nationalized industry to private ownership, price deregulation, and cuts in government spending.

Hungary:

Rezso Nyers, the leader of Hungary's Communist Party, has unofficially consented to let 6,000 East German refugees travel to West Germany. The refugees are mainly young people seeking better economic opportunities, as well as political freedom, in West Germany.

Somalia:

The Somali Army reportedly killed 5,000 unarmed civilians over the last 10 months. The deaths occurred during the prolonged struggle between government and rebel forces in the North. The rebels are seeking the ouster of Somalia's current leader, General Mohammad Siad Barre. The government has denied charges of other human rights violations including beatings and torture.

El Salvador:

Salvadoran rebels, the Farabundo Marti National Front (FMNL) have agreed to the preconditions set down by Salvadoran president Alfredo Cristiani. Negotiations between the government and the rebels will begin sometime this week in Mexico. Archbishop Arturo Rivera y Damas will act as mediator, and the Organization of American States and the United States will be present as well. This will be the first formal contact between the rebel and government during the 10 year civil war which has cost the lives of 70,000 Salvadorans.

Virginia Beach: Race or Media

by Amanda Burt
and Tanya Cunic

Were the riots in Virginia Beach really racially induced or was it just another media distortion?

I will be the first to admit that I am prejudiced (anyone who claims to be free of prejudice is living in an unrealistic world). But does every civil disturbance have to be linked to a racial stem? The Media is not the only culprit. Other groups such as the ACLU and NAACP seem eager to fuse these riots to racial undertones. They fail to recognize that each time they do this, they are not only hindering the minorities' progress but are fueling the groups' sense of repression.

Virginia Beach is no exception. The Labor Day weekend disturbances brought to light the broadness and the shallowness of the war between "the blacks and the blue suits."

It was a typical Labor Day weekend-Greekfest happening, extra police were on hand to ensure safety. By late Saturday night, most students were at the beach and ready to have a good time. But when an ambulance summoned officers for help in order to get through crowded streets, the trouble started. Within minutes, more policemen arrived on the scene in riot gear.

As they attempted to unclog the streets, students began ransacking local stores. This behavior was carried on for two more nights and escalated into several life threatening situations, including students throwing rocks and beer bottles at police officers, who were using night-sticks in an attempt to subdue the crowd. The National Guard sent 325 guardsmen to Virginia Beach to aid in the effort. As a result of the violence, thirty policemen and National Guardsmen were treated for injuries. There were also a number of lesser civilian injuries. Reports recorded that 1,235 people were charged with numerous offenses.

A lot of people want a formal FBI investigation. But they do not need one. The answer is frighteningly clear. Whether you are black, white or orange, race has nothing to do with moral character. So is this Media distortion? YES! Race had nothing to do with this incident. It was simply a matter of lack of respect for others' well-being.

Peru: balancing between democracy and war

by Camilo Leon-Castro
Spanish Assistant

For the military guard of the town of Vchiza, the 27th of March seemed to be just another day.

At 6 PM, a couple walking through the town square unexpectedly drew their guns and assassinated the first soldiers that passed in front of them. This was the signal for 200 guerrillas of the Shining Path to attack the garrison. Five hours later the 13 survivors, including ten soldiers and three officers, surrendered. The officers were executed at the town square, one by one, in front of the town's residents. After robbing the banks and vandalizing the state buildings, the terrorists returned to their hideouts in the Amazon jungle.

In nine years, the Marxist guerilla organization Shining Path has expanded its radius of activity from the mountains of Ayacucho (an area roughly 200 miles southeast of Lima) to all others areas of the country. Their alliance with narcotics manufacturers in the jungle allows them to acquire ammunition and recruit followers from the peasants who farm the coca used in producing cocaine. Following the assassination of about 50 mayors and other government authorities in Peru, the Shining Path is able to impose their own laws, based on terror.

The military response guerilla activities was the so called "Dirty War," a strategy used by the army in the field against the Shining Path. The army's ideological leader, the retired general, Luis Cisneros Vizguerra has been quoted as saying, "The peasants must choose where to die: either with the army or with the Shining Path." In other words, if a peasant community is suspected of collaborating with the Shining Path, they must all be eliminated.

Because of the Dirty War, the count of those "missing" is 4,000, divided between peasants and syndicate leaders. Six mass graves have been discovered with hundreds of bodies in them. Congressional investigations have been unable to arrive at any conclusion as the power of the Army in the declared Emergency Zones prevents them from obtaining information.

So far, the cost of this war has been high. 15,000 people dead, millions of dollars in vandalism and the destabilization of the democratic system. Because the military and the Shining Path exercise supreme power in half the country, democratic rights have ceased to exist in those areas.

Far from the war zone, terrorism is not the primary occupation of the people and politicians living in the cities. Their problem is the 4000% inflation rate suffered since 1988. Added to this is the cut in external credit which came after the decision of President Alan Garcia not to award more than 10% of export income towards the external debt service payments, which have risen to more than 14 billion dollars.

This crisis has sharpened the differences between the rich and poor. The infant mortality rate has increased to 90.5 deaths per 1000 births, a rate surpassed only by Haiti and Bolivia.

For the middle class, the last resort seems to be leaving the country; in 1988, 120,000 Peruvians emigrated. The majority went to the US, Canada, and Australia.

In the meantime, business men deposit their profits in Swiss banks or invest overseas. Residential areas now have walls three meters high, complete with electric wires and televised security systems, all to protect the luxurious mansions of the bourgeoise.

The political parties have candidates in the upcoming presidential elections in 1990: APRA (the Popular Revolutionary American Alliance), the United Left, and FREDEMO (Democratic Front).

APRA seems to have little chance of winning the election following the failure of the current government. The United Left was favored until it split into a Marxist-Leninist faction and a Social Democratic faction headed by the former mayor of Lima, Alfonso Barrantes.

FREDEMO, a coalition of rightist parties headed by the writer Mario Vargas Llosa, seems to be the likely winner. FREDEMO is currently leading in the polls.

There is much doubt in Peru about the ability of the government to overcome this crisis. Two of the men running for President have governed the country in the past and been unsuccessful.

The one thing that is clear is that Peru must choose between democracy or civil war. Once that is decided, hopefully the political parties and democratic institutions will be able to peacefully channel the longing for change felt by many Peruvians into action. The actions of these parties and institutions will, in the following months, determine Peru's future as a nation.

North American drug habits fuel drug war

by Carter Boatner

Finally the brutal consequences of the lucrative Latin American cocaine trade have been realized. The drug lords who so successfully developed the enterprise are under fire in their own country. With the extradition of various figures to the United States, the well-established cartels are experiencing the most serious threat to their power. They have fought back with violence, but this is common news. They are retaliating in typical terrorist fashion like they have done in the past in similar circumstances. These are the stories that cover front pages across the world. Aside from the violence, there is another, equally devastating aspect of the drug trade which is not so well exposed.

This aspect has to do with those drug-producing nations themselves. As a result of the drug trade parts of Latin America have suffered severe social, political and economical changes. The lucrative enterprise has lashed back at the very nations which perpetuate it. The issue of North American drug dependency is not limited domestic ramifications, it has far more damaging effects upon the indigenous peoples of Latin America.

Coca chewing, or as it is traditionally known as Hallpay, is a deeply embedded ritual necessary in the religious life of the South American Indians. Present as far back as 2100 BC, Hallpay aids the Indians in spiritual and physical ways. Apart from being the single-most unifying element among South American Indians, the stimulating effect of leaf-chewing helps Indians to withstand the harsh conditions in which they must make a living.

Modern laborers also consider it crucial. They find it difficult sometimes to put in the long days which are required of them in the mining business and other agricultural efforts, so they have long depended upon coca to provide them with energy. But this dependency did not transform their lives the way the recent increase of cocaine in North America has. The demand for cocaine has increased to levels in the United States never before seen in the World.

Because of this, there has been a corresponding demand for coca which has threatened the vital customs involving the leaf among Indians. The governments, under pressure from the United States, has tried to eradicate coca production. They have failed to target the most significant operations, instead it is the laborers who are not caught up in the drug trade are who suffer most.

Because coca demands an inflated price, many farmers are enticed into the illegal cultivation of coca, often neglecting to cultivate legitimate crops. This has lead to the shortage of traditional crops, thus driving food prices skyward. Earlier in this decade It was estimated that in the Chapare region of Bolivia, the amount of coca production has risen by as much as 400%. Because of the recent increase in the demand for coca, it not viewed so much as a spiritual element, as it is a commodity.

To maintain the unthreatened presence of the drug enterprise, drug lords have contributed to widespread corruption in their countries. In Colombia in 1984, President Belisario Betancur's efforts against the drug cartels lead to an investigation in which approximately 400 judges were found to have been receiving drug-related bribe money. By paying off judges, and other key officials, the drug lords in some cases have taken control of vast areas of their countries, leaving the government virtually helpless in checking drug activity. This is evident in areas such as the Chapare regions which are sometimes mockingly referred to as an independent, "Republiqueta Pichicatera", meaning Drug Republic. In these areas the cocaine boom has led to the development of commercial hubs whose markets harbor the sales of coca, coca paste, and even the materials required for the production of cocaine. This is turn compounds the problem surrounding the rapid influx of "Narcodollars", which are funds drawn into the areas usually by foreigners involved in the drug trade.

Drug lords have also found ways to spread their influence into the United states as well. In 1984, a former United States Customs Agent testified in front of the Commission on Organized Crime and Cocaine Trafficking, that he received $50,000 for each petroleum truck filled with marijuana that he let pass into the U.S. It is bribes such as this which entice low-paid U.S. government officials into the lucrative drug trade.

Money laundering schemes which are a closely-related to the drug trade, have been repeatedly uncovered in Florida. In 1982, Miami's Bank of Dade County was charged with being involved in a $96 million operation involving profits from South America. In 1985, money laundering was found to be an $80 billion a-year-industry thriving throughout the border areas of the United States. In that same year the Miami Herald reported that "virtually every piece of U.S. currency handled in South Florida is contaminated with microscopic traces of cocaine".

These are just a few of the many, far-reaching implications that are the result of the North American cocaine boom. No longer should the drug trade be considered exclusively as a North American problem, as a nation we are once again greatly involved unfavorably in the affairs of our Southern neighbors.

Campus mourns history professor

by Amy R. Caddle
Reporter

Guy Fair Goodfellow was known at Washington College as a man of integrity. He was a man of uncompromising ideals coupled with compassion.

Goodfellow, after a four-year struggle with cancer, passed away Thursday, September 7, at the age of 60. Surviving are his wife Alice, two children, and four stepchildren.

Dr. W. Robert Fallaw, Chairman of the History Department, remembers Goodfellow as "an outstanding faculty member, a kind neighbor and a wonderful friend. He was an excellent family man, taking great interest and pride in his children. Guy always impressed me with his effective teaching methods; he truly enthused his students. He had a way of putting students at ease so learning would come naturally."

Fallaw continued: "Goodfellow always did what he sincerely felt was the best for Washington College. I always admired him for being true to his principles."

Goodfellow served on almost every college committee from Academic Standing to Admissions, as well as the 1973 Presidential Search Committee and the 1982 Bicentennial Committee. He also served as the Pre-Law adviser for several years. He always involved himself in activities beyond the classroom, yet these activities always related in some way to students in the classroom.

Dr. Nathan Smith, Professor of History, recalls Goodfellow as a man who performed "above and beyond his call of duty. Goodfellow was very sympathetic with his students. He was concerned with their academic as well as personal lives. His students adored him," Smith states. "He was very good about keeping contact with history majors after graduation. I am sure his death has moved many of his former students."

Goodfellow will also be remembered through his written work. The History Professor had been co-editing with Robert Janson-LaPalme the autobiography of artist Charles Wilson Peale. Their work will soon be published by Yale University Press as part of a Smithsonian Institution series on Peale.

"It is a great tragedy that the current Washington College students were not able to get to know Dr. Goodfellow," said Dave Wheelan, a 1980 graduate of Washington College who is currently the Vice President for Development and College Relations here. "Dr. Goodfellow was one of the professors at WC who had a significant impact on my peers and me. He invested his total self in the classroom-he was very passionate about the material he taught, especially race relations," explains Wheelan.

Wheelan continues that Goodfellow was "an historian in the true sense of the word. His teaching encouraged students to absorb history not just through memorizing dates and facts, but through making history a part of our lives." Wheelan adds, "Dr. Goodfellow was respected by everyone. He had such a positive impact on so many lives that he won't soon be forgotten."

Goodfellow taught American history, history of the antebellum South, and pioneered the teaching of Afro-American studies at Washington College. Goodfellow was awarded the prestigious Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching in 1977.

A native of Hanover, Pa., he was a political science graduate of Dickinson College and later received his master of arts and doctoral degrees in history from the University of Maryland, where he chose as his dissertation the presidency of Calvin Coolidge.

Last May family, friends and colleagues took part in a celebration honoring Guy Fair Goodfellow for his outstanding achievements at Washington College. He was presented with a citation from the College praising his dedication, service and integrity.

Dean Elizabeth Baer extolled Goodfellow as "a very courageous man. He is a source of inspiration for many here at Washington College."

Goodfellow began as an instructor at Washington College in 1959 and left as a professor in 1985. Although never formally retired, Goodfellow continued to serve the college community despite his illness.

One may not express how much Guy Fair Goodfellow, as a professor, colleague and comrade, enriched the lives of those around him. He was a man of extraordinary character— a man to be remembered as intelligent, giving, and brave. He was an involved, interested, and broad-minded individual–looking at history through a minority's eyes.

President Douglass Cater, in notifying the faculty and studnets of Dr. Goodfellow's passing,said:"Professor Guy Goodfellow has always symbolized the very best of Washington College. As teacher, historian, and gentle, caring friend, he will leave a lasting memory on our campus. The Washington College community grieves the loss of such an exemplary faculty member and loyal friend.

Raincoats, light beer, and sandstorms

by Katherine Absher
Features Editor

The summer before I embarked on my Washington College career, Student Affairs inundated me with letters ranging from the meal plan to buying a Macintosh computer. But there was one letter which prepared me most for college, and I still hold it close to my heart. It was a memo listing what I should bring to college,such as book ends, a shower bucket, and a raincoat.

The mentioning of a raincoat in this list seemed very strange to me, but being a good little freshman I went out and bought a brand new red raincoat. I was quite proud of myself; it was lined inside with plaid material: very college, I thought.

I should have taken this hint to bring a raincoat to college as an ominous warning of all the wet Chestertown weekends I would have to endure. My raincoat protected me from all the construction muck, the cars spraying me from the crosswalk, and the many tornado warnings I always seemed to become stuck in.

But it also protected me from the Lamdas' beer throwing contests, tipsy townies with wobbly drinks, and the splashing of a ping pong ball in a Kappa Alpha's glass of Milwaukee Light.

My raincoat was with me when I stood with three hundred other people outside of Kent on May the First and watched naked Lamda pledges slide in the mud. My raincoat was with me when I tried to fish two of my friends out of the mud puddle in front of Queen Anne; they were very smashed and thought it was a hot tub. My raincoat was with me from fraternity party to Coffee House to Tamara Alexander's benefit, and my L.L. Bean duck shoes usually came along for the ride, or I guess I should say the slosh too.

Last year was a wet and festive time– splashing, singing, and drinking in the rain. Last year this campus was a wet campus, flooded with rain and beer.

In preparing for this coming year, I bought a sweatshirt picturing a duck swimming in the rain, crowned with a plastic raincap, and an umbrella tucked under its wing. I had the sales clerk iron below this transfer "Washington College" in red lettering. I was ready for another wet and wonderful year.

It hasn't rained since I came to school. My raincoat hangs on a hook unused, and my duck shoes look quite forlorn. I really dreaded being bogged up to my waist in mud from our unfinished brick-lined fire lane, but only dust coats my shoes.

Riding my bicycle along the fields of Chestertown, the earth cracks around the corn, and the stalks are turning brown. The farmers I pass are a solemn looking lot– wearing the expression you usually see in 1930s depression photos of Oakies farming the dust bowl.

Wondering if it is going to rain or shine, Kate Absher is prepared for both. Last yeara dry weekend did not exist weather-wise or party-wise. This year the sun has not stopped beating down- -neither has Security. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

The Thetas, however, are wearing this expression also. This year this campus is a dry campus, besieged by security and tumbleweeds. The campus truly resembles a desert, especially the parking lots, which are deserted on weekends. The students who stay here roam the campus like a lost wagon train, and beer cans litter the campus (because there isn't a legitimate party to drink at) like the bones of cattle on the lonesome desert. Kent House, which used to be a haven from the storm, will be lucky if it is an oasis on our dry, desolate sand storm of a college.

Today the weatherman said this week was going to be besieged by ninety-degree days, hot and humid. He also said, however, it is supposed to rain. Outside I hear thunder mixing with the night, and I think it just might rain.

Yet, I truly doubt it, for the next Theta party isn't until September 23, and Security will be watching.

Uncle Benny and the Master Plan

Ahoy, young cherubs and dudes of Washington College. This your uncle Benny here with a little bit of helpful advice to ease you into the school year and improve your sad, distasteful life. Now I don't want to hear any of you saying, "But dear, kind, infallible, def, personally altruistic philanthropist, Uncle Benny I don't have a sad distasteful life!"

Hogwash. You are only fooling yourself. Your life is an incomplete swoon of mental and bodily excretions that leave you a physical plebian and a intellectual waif. Trust me, I know all.

Now that everything is in perspective, and you have hopefully realized the lowness of your existence, you can finally begin to grow. I have noticed many a student roaming about campus; they have slight scowls and furrowed brows. They say, "Uncle Benny, dude, the Master Plan totally sucks."

The inquisitive expression clearly mapped about my visage conicides perfectly with my following statement as I ask. "Why?" The cute little disgruntled student replied with intensity. The brunt of his argument placed blame on the administration. His playmates agreed with him as he complained that the administration is placing all its time in a plan that reaps results in five years but offers little for the present student body.

It was quite clear to me that this lad was chowderhead. As a matter of fact, most of the students I have spoken with or have overheard through my magic Benny Ball seem to have adopted this chowderhead attitude. Why are all of these anti- Master Planners chowder heads?

I'll tell ya why. It is because the Master Plan was never intended to meet immediate student needs. This plan will make this place grow, and will provide better facilities for research– I'm sure you have heard the rest.

So let Uncle Benny shovel the bunk aside and hip you to what the Master Plan will do for you...That's right, you, the one holding the newspaper. It will raise the quality of education and thus the quality and marketability of a Washington College degree.

This means, my little friends, that the degree you earn now will be worth more than the amount of work you put into it. So quit wasting your time griping about the MP. A more important matter is at hand.

This is a matter of utmost seriousness. What Uncle Benny is alluding to is Aristocrat.TM Aristocrat toilet tissue is standard issue at WC. Any of you who have rested upon the bowl know of the terror of Aristocrat.TM It comes from Wisconsin, you know.Listen up, this paper of toil and grit is the nemesis to happy movements. The capital of Wisconsin is Madison. Uncle Benny belives that all of the complaining about having to walk further to class does not stem from people's anger towards the MP. It comes Aristocrat.TM

So quit fooling yourselves kids. It is not the MP. It is the TP. Oh Wisconsin! Ah Wisconsin! I like eating cheese! So Uncle Benny begs you from the bottom of myself. Mobilize a movement. The Fonz is from Wisconsin. This campus must be Charminated or it will be the end of us all. Give me cottony softness or give me death.

Jim Sobczak is Uncle Benny.

Writing obligation

This semester marks a change in the sophomore writing requirement. Until this year sophomores participated in writing seminars, small groups meeting six times to review one another's papers. Now, in response to students' requests, the tutors will offer another approach: during one semester of the sophomore year, students will meet individually with a tutor for three, one-hour conferences to review papers in progress for academic courses requiring writing. This change should eliminate scheduling problems that sometimes occurred in the past but retain the advantage of discussing a draft with an objective reader.

If they have not already done so, sophomores enrolled in the Sophomore Writing Obligation this fall should come to William Smith 7 in the next few days to schedule three meetings. According to Alice Goodfellow, Coordinator of the Writing Program, the tutors' calendars become increasingly full as the semester progresses, so sophomores should reserve time early. In order that participants may plot their own growth and development as writers, she recommends that they space the three conferences over the semester.

Despite loss in opener, field hockey looks strong in '89

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

The women's field hockey team tried their best to ignore the first game jitters and come away with a win against conference rival Haverford, but it was not to be. Haverford won 3-2, blitzing the women with three unanswered goals late in the middle third of the game. WC peppered the opponent's goal with shots in the second half, yet they were never able to tie the score.

The team had good reason to be nervous going into the first game of the year. Expectations were high after last year's team posted an outstanding 9-5 record, and four freshman were beginning their college field hockey careers. Junior Erin O'Neal was also playing in goal for the first time since her career began at Washington College.

"In light of all the changes in the lineup and the pressure on the freshmen, we played well in the game," Coach Diane Guinan said. "We made some errors in the game, many stemming from lack of experience. Still, we dominated play in the second half and created many opportunities for ourselves."

Washington College started the scoring at the 28:58 mark of the first half on a goal by Julie Schram. The defense held for over twenty minutes, led by freshman Kris Phalen and goalie O'Neal. Haverford finally broke through with a goal at the 8:25 mark, then added a goal with 2:10 remaining for a 2-1 halftime lead.

Haverford stretched the lead to 3-1 at the 24:14 mark, and things looked grim for W.C. The women responded, however, and freshman Carolyn Athey scored on a pass from Donna White. The goal came at 16:47 of the second half and brought the team to within one. The team then began to pepper Haverford's goal with an array of shots, led by the play of senior Carole Reece and Julie Schram. They were unable to cash in on these opportunities, however, and suffered their first loss of the season.

The team's next four games are on the road, starting September 13th against Wesley College. This should allow the freshmen of the team to get over their jitters and develop the experience necessary to be successful for years to come. Coach Guinan looks for upperclassmen such as Carole Reece, Amy Tiehel and Donna White to take charge on the road and hopes that the team continues the successful climb they have made over the past five years.

Men's tennis displays depth

by Fred Wyman
Men's Tennis Coach

The men's tennis team displayed their strength as well as their depth this past Friday at Haverford College. The team left Larry Gewer, Scott Read, and Roman Inochovsky home in an effort to give the rest of the team experience in match play. The players showed themselves to be worthy of the challenge, defeating Haverford 7-1 in the Middle Atlantic Conference competition.

Scott Shepherd, the #5 seed was the only player to lose a match. Shepherd played up at the #1 position and bowed to Haverford's Andy Jewel 6-4, 6-4 in a close match. Jewel, Haverford's #1 seed and a semifinalist at last year's MAC championship, broke Shepherd once in each set to take the match. The netters dominated the rest of the matches, both of the singles and doubles variety. Freshman Alberto Diaz made his WC debut an impressive one, defeating his opponent in straight sets 6-4, 6-3. The veterans of the squad also paid dividends for the team. Sol Schwartz also won in straight sets, defeating Adam Kies 6-4, 6-1. Andy Bohutinsky was very impressive in his thumping of Nathan Patton, blanking him in the second set and winning 6-1, 6-0. Jim Lim also defeated his opponent 6-4, 6-3.

Two other newcomers to the Sho'men tennis roster figured prominently in the team's victory. Both Brian Nilstoft and Greg Coss rolled over their opponents, winning in straight sets. Nilstoft, a freshman from Wilmington, Delaware, won 6-3, 6-1 while Coss defeated Randy Peale 6-2, 6-3.

The netters also dominated the doubles competition. Bohutinsky and Lim teamed up won with a solid performance, and Shepherd and Coss combined for a victory of their own.

The team hopes to continue its winning ways this weekend. Gewer, Read and Inochovsky will be back to lead the netters as they take on the U.S. Naval Academy. This should prove to be a test for the squad, as well as good preparation for the Millersville Tournament to be played later in the week. Judging from the performance in last week's victory over Haverford, the entire squad is solid from top to bottom and poised for a run at another MAC championship.

Ladies' tennis wins opening match

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

The women's tennis team paid a tribute to the mailmen of the world this Monday against Glassboro State. Neither their late arrival nor rain nor dark of night could stop the team from beating their Division III opponent on their home court. Despite the many hazards of their trip, the ladies were still able to win 7-2. Their next match comes against Division I opponent Navy.

The team was late arriving at Glassboro State, and they were promptly greeted with a rain delay. Most of the matches were played under the lights, and the doubles matches were played in the standard pro set format in an effort to speed up play. The ladies showed no ill effects from these changes, dominating both the singles and doubles matches.

Tracy Peel solidified her position as the #1 seed on the women's team, trouncing Glassboro's Chris Mellon in straight sets, 6-0, 6-2. #2 seed Monica Blanco was victorious as well, taking three sets to defeat her opponent. Miriam Dittman also played solid tennis, conceding only two games while winning her match.

Meg Wheatley played excellent tennis, yet still dropped her match as a result of a mixup in scoring. After dropping the first set, Wheatley came on strong to win the second set 6-3. The two players became confused and played a tiebraker instead of a third set, and Wheatley lost in the tiebraker.

"That's a shame," Coach Holly Bramble said, "because Meg is very strong in the third set."

The team did win the rest of its singles matches, and performed just as admirably in the doubles competition. Peel and Blanco teamed together to whip Glassboro's #1 doubles team by a score of 8-1. The women won two of the three doubles matches played, giving the team their first victory of the year.

Tracy Peel also joined the men's tennis team on their trip to Haverford and displayed her unlimited potential against Haverford's #1 seed. Peel defeated Marcell Siegel 6-3, 6-1 last Friday in an exhibition after the men's matches. Siegel was the winner of the MAC women's singles championship last spring. Siegel did not have to face Peel, however, who was busy placing second with Meg Wheatley in the doubles competition. This exhibition introduced Siegel to Peel's tennis ability and gave her something to think about for the MAC championships next spring.

Coach Bramble and the team hope to continue their winning ways agsinst Navy. Regardless of the team's performance, the ladies have already proven that they can endure hardships and get the job done. Just like the US Postal Service.

Soccer continues losing streak

by Greg Oliver
Reporter

The men's varsity soccer team continued their rough start this past week, dropping two more games. This lowered their record to 0-3, and the team has yet to score. Still, the coaches are not worried by these early season losses. The two defeats came at the hands of Division I Delaware and Division III powerhouse Greensboro, and the squad has gained experience necessary for a successful year.

A sudden rash of injuries has been a major blow to the team. Larry Kilroy tore ligaments in his leg, Peter Maller hurt his leg and Scott Overund suffered a twisted ankle. Several other players had to leave the Greensboro game due to heat exhaustion.

WC fell to Delaware by a score of 4-0 last Friday. The team played poorly in the loss, creating good chances that they could not put away. The coaches were unhappy with the team's performance in the game..

The team played much better Sunday against Greensboro. The game was played in extremely adverse conditions, with soaring temperatures and high humidity affecting the endurance of many players. This was the team's best-game of the year, led by the solid play of Mike Bishop and Tom Bowman. Goalie John Thomas made several great saves, including one crucial stop on a penalty kick late in the second half.

WC had a number of scoring opportunities, but were unable to capitalize on any of them. Most of the shots were taken from difficult angles and either sailed wide or hit the post. Both teams were held scoreless in regulation, sending the game into overtime. Greensboro was finally able to score on John Thomas in overtime, while WC continued their scoring drought and dropped their third straight game.

The team appeared to work out many of the problems from previous games against Greensboro. In the losses to Mount St. Mary's and Delaware, the Sho'men were having trouble controlling the ball on offense. In the Greensboro loss, the team was able to overcome problems with their passing and clearing to play a better team game.

With the tough early season schedule nearly out of the way, there is light at the end of the tunnel for the soccer team. Coach Bowman hopes the experience from these three games will prove helpful when league play starts against St. Mary's on September 20. The men take on Millersville in their next game, looking for their first win of the year.

Wit or philosopher? Dual aspects of poet

by Stephanie Hess
Arts Editor

In a talk on Howard Nemerov given this past Tuesday, Professor Robert Day explained, "the best poetry is always dangerous," adding that poet and novelist Howard Nemerov writes against the power of authority, suggesting that he writes "dangerous" and consequently excellent poetry.

Students of the College will have the opportunity to judge Nemerov's poetry firsthand when he visits to read from his work on September 19.

Nemerov is in the midst of his second term as the Poet Laureate of the United States.

In addition to receiving the Pulitzer Prize in poetry in 1978, he is also a recipient of the Theodore Roethke Memorial Prize for Poetry (1968), the National Book Award in poetry (1978), and the Bolligan Prize for poetry (1981).

Nemerov has written nine books of poetry since the publi- ation of his first collection, The mage and the Law, in 1947. He has also written seven collections of literary essays, three novels and two collections of short sto- ies.

Born in New York City in 1920, Nemerov is a 1941 graduate of Harvard University, and has taught at schools such as Hamilton College, Bennington College, Brandeis University and Hollins College.

In 1969, he became the Fan- ie Hurst Professor of Creative iterature at Washington Uni- ersity in St. Louis, where he is now the Edward Mallinckrodt Distinguished University Professor of English.

Nemerov uses rhyme and conversational idioms in his poetry: Day explained that the "effect [of this colloquial language] is to debunk authority."

About the subjects and settings of Nemerov's poetry, Day spoke of intellectual scenes such as universities and the academic world in general, and used film jargon to explain that these scenes were "arenas more than setting."

Day added, "Nemerov's main poetic concern is with thought."

On a less technical level, Day called Nemerov's poetry "delightfully conversational and full of twists and turns," adding, "Nemerov is of the poet family that descended from Longfellow" and other classical American poets.

Nemerov has explained that the natural world has had an impact on his work. This confession brought many critics to compare him to Robert Frost, not only because of the natural themes, but also for the philosophical issues he incorporates into his poetry.

Nemerov himself admits that his earlier works show influences from other writers: "...I began and for a long time remained imitative, and poems in my first books ... show more than traces of admired modern masters—Eliot, Auden, Stevens, [E.E.] Cummings, Yeats."

Critics of Nemerov also have noted this imitation; some condemn him for it, while others note the improvement that his work shows after the publication of his third book.

Not all readers find him so easy to categorize. In New Republic, Joyce Carol Oates states, "romantic, realist, comedian, satirist, relentless and indefatigable brooder upon the most ancient mysteries—Nemerov is not to be classified."

Critics also point to a dichotomy in Nemerov's work, and Julia Bartholomay claims that this duality is shown in his poetry through paradox: there is a seeming conflict between his "witty, ironic manner" and his "serious, perhaps pessimistic, philosophy."

Nemerov's prose fiction receives similar critiques for its wit and irony; many writers have lauded his biting satire.

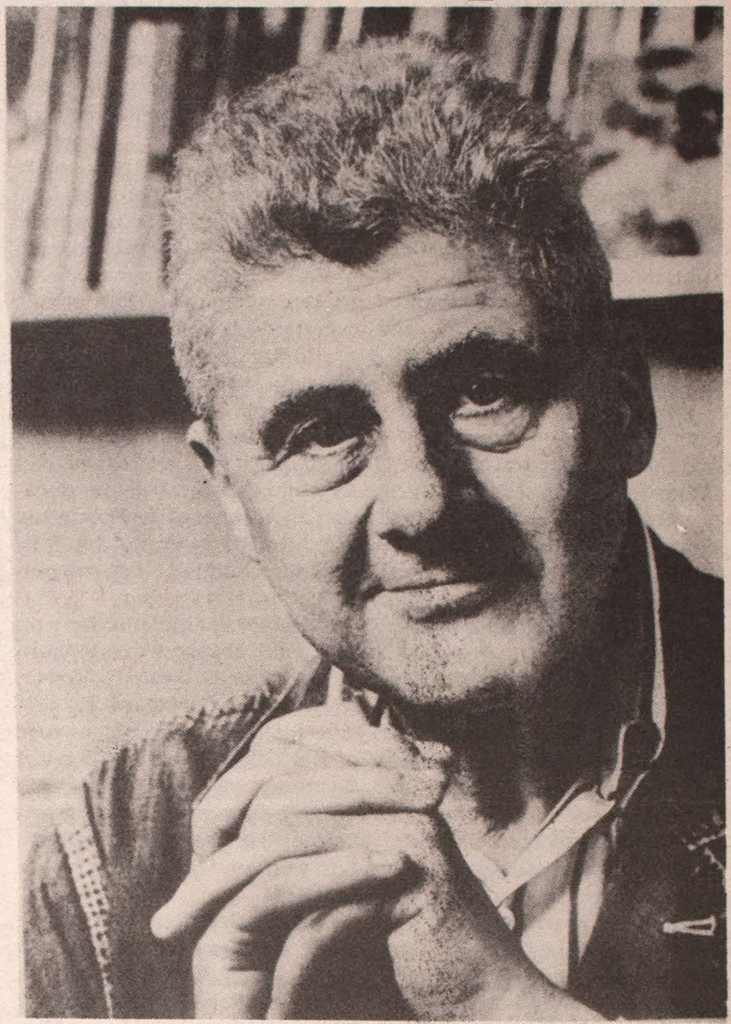
Of his novels, Peter Meinke says "like his poems,...[they] are basically pessimistic....Nemerov's dark viewpoint, which in his poetry is redeemed by beauty...,in his fiction is redeemed by humor."

Meinke also pointed at a problem with Nemerov's novels: "...readers do not know how to take Nemerov: Is he being funny or what?"

At the same time, Meinke quickly urges the reader not to "confuse seriousness with solemnity; Nemerov is never solemn but is always, even at his funniest, serious."

Through all the conflicting and varied appraisals of Nemerov and his work, one definitive statement by Oates stands out like a beacon: "Nemerov is, quite simply, a brilliant mind."

On Tuesday, September 19, students will have the chance to make their own categorizations of Nemerov's poetry. Nemerov will be reading from his work at 8 PM in the Norman James Theater as the first visitor of the Sophie Kerr Lecture Series.



Poet Laureate, Howard Nemerov, a writer upon whom critics cannot seem to agree, will read from his works of poetry this Tuesday.

Myth and beauty blended in fascinating exhibit

by Andrew Donaldson
Art Critic

Baltimore artist Symmes ardner's exhibition, "Recent Works of Symmes Gardner," Sponsered by the Arts Exhibits ommittee of Washington Colge, features seven paintings, nd twelve drawings, which, hough a small collection repre- senting only the last five years of ork, displays a very sophisti- ated and composed representa- on of myth, growing more con- dent and self-referential over ime.

His first work, Prometheus 985), offers us our first intro- duction to his work. The broad strokes and delicate absences of paint on Prometheus' frame give im a dense, bulging musculature, contrasting starkly with the rough, sparse, geometrically designed backdrop of rocks. The sky and water are both portrayed in a drab manner, serving to compel attention towards Prometheus and his face, the most striking feature, looking downward, almost centered, is a blur.

The Ancient Pulse (1989), among his most recent material, gives a visually stunning portrait of Odilon Redon, the famed Symbolist, above the center, that resembles most in structure a self-portrait by Redon in crayon, around 1895. Beneath Redon is a wheel, to which the Venus de Milo, a young boy with a Roman face, and a back torso, which is ironically a far more developed musculature than the Venus,are each connected to the wheel.

His two paintings, Orpheus (1988) and Will and Necessity (1986-8), both depict the tale of Orpheus and Eurydice, but from two vastly different vantage points. In Orpheus , the smaller work, Orpheus' face, shown here darkly romantic, soulful, and Eurydice, facing away from the viewer, superimposed over a lyre, and a red-skied, barren, almost molten background, reminding the viewer that Orpheus, the poet, played his lyre and convinced the gods to release his wife from Hades.

The second, much grander piece, Will and Necessity , shows Eurydice nude on the left, again facing away from the viewer, and Charon, the boatman, a giant, almost dominating figure, to the right gazing at her, his face old, grim-faced, from behind a rock. This title, and new emphasis, marks a mature consciousness of the twists of interpretation myths can undergo in order to remain contemporary.

Danae (1987) is a drawing of a woman writhing (who, Greek myth tells us, was visited by Zeus as a shower of gold) partly covered by some sort of cloud, an almost hilarious juxtaposition of subject and art.

Icarus (1989) is a beautiful drawing of the winged Icarus bursting into flames, and falling. The violent, impulsive, unsubtle brushstrokes with which Gardner captures the flame invokes Icarus' impulsiveness in flying too close to the Sun, here represented by a glorious, multi-colored golden sky.

Pilgrim in Winter (1988), perhaps his most ambitious work, uses images without reference to myths to capture a mood. Yet this work was mildly disappointing, as the Roman bust is reminiscent both of the boy's face in The Ancient Pulse , and Orpheus, in Orpheus . The water to the right is distracting and unnecessary, even inappropriate. The falling figure, graphically, skillfully composed, and the boy with his hand uplifted, at an angle, both show lively action compared to that stale figure.

Symmes Gardner's work is a vivid display not only of the power that myths still conjure, but also of the symbols and images through which art can express and complete the soul. The exhibition shows a skill which is worth nourishing. It's worth seeing. Go to it. It looks better than the construction.

The Exhibit is on display Thursday through Sunday from 1 PM to 5 PM in the Tawes Lobby of the Gibson Fine Arts Center until September 24.

DC magazine editor examines libel issue

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff Writer

Discussing what it's like to work for an influential magazine in a high profile city like Washington D.C., John Sansing, husband of Dean Sansing, will be the first presenter for the fall semester in the lecture series sponsored by the William James Forum, now in its 27th year.

Sansing, Executive Editor of Washingtonian Magazine, will speak on "Liberty or Libel: Telling Tales in a Political Town"

When asked about the lecture, Special Events Coordinator Marshall Williams predicted , "There'll be a lot of life to it [the presentation]," as Sansing will provide anecdotes about what it's like to write personal interest stories for a magazine in DC, a city where, as Williams pointed out, "people are concerned with self-image and how they're represented in the press."

Focusing on modern day journalism, Sansing will explore what he believes to be the "thin line journalists have to take in writing about public personalities." In particular, he will describe the caution reporters must exercise when covering articles on people and events as they pertain to the White House and Congress.

"Expectant" is how Sansing briefly described the atmosphere in DC now that Congress recently convened for its fall session. Among issues involving political figures that Sansing feels certain will be under the careful eye of the press are "drugs linked to foreign policy, ethical problems on the [Capitol] Hill, international affairs and financial and sexual scandals."

One recent situation where the question of liberty or libel was a controversial issue is in the case of Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), a liberal advocate of human rights who has openly admitted his homosexuality.

Earlier this year, the press played a major role in the fall of the careers of two other prominent politicans. After a string of damaging press where the ethicity of their behaviors was questioned, Speaker of the House Jim Wright and Democratic whip Tony Coelho submitted their resignations.

Another example of the ruin of a political career due to damaging press is John G. Tower, whose alleged womanizing and drug history was the major cause of his defeated nomination for Secretary of Defense early in 1988, a time when many members of the Reagan administration were under scrutiny by the press.

In the past poiticians have made obvious their disapproval of the ethics practiced by some reporters. Rep. David R. Obey of Wisconsin, in a quote from a New York Times story published in June of this year, accused reporters of "a mean-mindedness and reckless disregard for balance and fair play in their skewering of the Congress." Added Rep. Barbara Boxer (D-Cali.) in the same article, "The media have been spending so much more time on the personal morality of Congress than on political morality...."

Although allowing that these critcisms may possibly have "a chilling effect on the press," Sansing doesn't forsee the future of print media as a time when the press will refuse to report the behaviors of politicians or confront controversial topics and said, "I don't think there's any particular threat to it."

Yet there has been a tremendous increase in the number of libel cases in the past decade. Sansing admitted to the probability of a media that may become "overly timid over libel suits" explaining, "libel suits are easy to win, but expensive to fight."

After practicing law in D.C. for nine years, Sansing, an Amherst graduate with a law degree from University of Virginia, joined Washingtonian Magazine in 1979 as senior editor and lawyer. In 1982 he was promoted to the position he currently holds, writing and editing the Capital Comment section of the publication.

Sansing's lecture on the dangers of writing about people in DC politics will begin at 7:30 PM next Thursday evening in the Hynson Lounge of Hodson Hall.

Campus events : things to do and places to be

Sept. 15, 17, 18

The Washington College Film Series presents My Sweet Little Village, a Czechoslovakian film of small town triumph over bureaucracy directed by Jiri Menzel.

Friday 15

Guitarist Tom Larsen will play in the Coffee House tonight from 9 PM to 1AM. Admission is free; no one should miss seeing WC's favorite blues man in action.

Saturday 16

Saturday afternoon, writers and other students interested in campus literary activity, should stop by the Lit. House at 1PM for the Writer's Union Picnic. Usual picnic fare will be served, along with the opportunity to join the Writer's Union. Membership to the Union provides students with a mailbox in the Lit. House and fisrt-hand information about literary events on campus.

Saturday evening, the Historical Society of Chestertown will be hosting a Candlelight Tour of Chestertown. A great opportunity to view and learn more about the historic homes of our town, the houses on the tour are open from 6PM to 10PM. The tour is self-guided and tickets for students can be purchased for $12 in Rhodes and the Butterfly Bush. Money from this fundraiser goes to the maintenance of the Giddes-Piper House.

Kappa Alpha's annual Beach Bash will be held Saturday night from 9PM to 2AM in Middle Hall. The door charge will be $3 for those in bathing suits and $4 for those in regular clothes. Come dressed for the beach and join the fun in the sand.

Tuesday 19

Poet Laureate of the United States, Howard Nemerov, will be visiting the college to read from his work. The reading is made possible by the Sophie Kerr Fund, and begins at 8PM in the Norman James Theater. An article about Nemerov and his work appears on page 9.

Benedictine children to visit college

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

The Dutch Dumschott Society, staff and volunteers of the Benedictine School for Exceptional Children, and Washington College student volunteers will provide a day of fun and games for children at Washington College's Fall Fun Day, September 30. Washington College has ties with the school, since almost 10% of its employees are alumni.

The Benedictine School, located in Ridgely, MD, is a coeducational, residential facility for children ages five to twenty-one with mild to severe mental disabilities. The school offers educational, physical and vocational training.

Nancy McCloy, Director of the Benedictine School, is a graduate of Washington College and Co-President of the Kent-Queen Anne Alumni Association.

Susan Bennett, also a WC alumna, is the supervisor of the Industrial Training Center (ITC), where students learn job skills in an effort to achieve and maintain employment and move toward more independent living.

Kathleen O'Donnell, Class of '86, is Benedictine's Assistant Director of Development.

Benedictine has also sponsored internships for students from the Sociology and Psychology departments at Washington College. The Washington College Dining Service has catered several affairs for them and WC's Alumni Association has contracted with them to provide silkscreen t-shirts for special events.

The purpose of Fall Fun Day is to celebrate the long standing relationship between the College and Benedictine, as well as to give the Dutch Dumschott Society an opportunity to promote the value of community service.

Fifty students from Benedictine, fifteen volunteers from the school and twenty five WC students will take part in the event under the leadership of Dutch Dumsschott.

The day will start at 10 AM and conclude at 2 PM.

Anyone interested in volunteering should attend a recruiting meeting in the Sophie Kerr Room on September 21 at 7:30 PM.

Kappa Alpha fraternity in the news

Kappa Alpha Order's Beta Omega Chapter on the campus of Washington College recently received one of the fraternity's highest chapter citations. They were presented with the Samuel Zenas Ammen Award, at Kappa Alpha's 63rd National Convention and 44th National Leadership Institute in Scottsdale, Arizona, August 11-14.

The purpose of the Ammen Award, named for the Order's Practical Founder, is to recognize chapters that functioned at a level of excellence in all areas of operations during the previous academic year.

Beta Omega Chapter is one of only 16 of KA's 122 collegiate chapters to receive an Ammen Award this year.

To apply for the Ammen Award, chapters must complete an extensive two-part process. In the first semester or quarter, the chapter is asked to evaluate its operations and to set goals for itself to be reached during the school year. Near the end of the year, the chapter then reports on its achievements, specifically in the areas of scholarship, membership and development, finances, alumni relations, public relations, national reporting efficiency, conduct, and housing.

The chapter is awarded points, by a panel of usually three or four judges, in each area based on its general performance and its success in reaching its goals in each area. The aggressiveness of its initial goal-setting is also taken into account.

Finally, a grade is given by the Educational and Leadership Consultant who visited the chapter during the year (each chapter is visited by a consultant from the National Headquarters each year who offers guidance on chapter operations). The points are figured into a formula which produces a final cumulative score for the chapter. Chapters which score above a certain cumulative mark receive an Ammen Award. Furthermore, the chapter or chapters (up to three) with the highest cumulative scores also receive the J. Edgar Hoover Award for Chapter Excellence which recognizes the very best chapter(s) for the year.

KA President, Mike Jenkins, and members Don Diefendorf and Jon Longest recently appeared on local television in Salisbury, MD. They presented a $250 check to the Jerry Lewis/MDA telethon in the name of their fraternity.

March of Dimes Walk

On October 1st, the Eastern Shore Chapter of the March of Dimes will hold its First Fall Walk in Chestertown beginning and ending at Wilmer Park. Chapter Director, Pyda Sterling, invited Washington College students to participate this week.

Check-in time for this ten kilometer trek is from 12:00 noon - 1:00 p.m. at Leila Hynson Pavilion with the actual walk beginning at 1:00 p.m.

Delegate Clayton Mitchell, serving as Honorary Chairman, intends to walk the route. Rose's Stores, whose grand opening is also October 1st, will serve as the Fall Walk sponsor. Headquarters and Headquarters Company 2/115 Infantry of the Maryland National Guard is providing "Victory Vans," ambulances, water, tables and chairs for the event. March of Dimes Goodwill Ambassador, Mandy Kent, will give her "pep talk" to the crowd before they begin their journey.

People can participate as an individual or as part of a team. But, as this is a prepaid event, walkers must preregister and bring their collected pledge amount the day of the Walk.

For more information or to register, contact the March of Dimes at (301) 546-2241.

Said Sterling, "We really want Washington College students to participate in this. They could be a great asset to the charity walk."

Sig update

by Ed Schroeder
Reporter

Rumors circulating throughout campus recently about the possibility that the Phi Sigma Kappa fraternity will be re-recognized were denounced by Assistant Dean of Students, Edward Maxcy. Says Maxcy, "The Sigs charter has been suspended for the whole academic school year."

The fraternity will not be recognized officially until the fall of 1990. At this time they must have contacted the National Phi Sigma Kappa Organization and provided the necessary provisions needed to be nationally recognized. When this provision is fulfilled, Washington College board members will meet with Phi Sigma Kappa leaders to discuss terms of reinstatement.

tem which attempts to organize this campus. We must make demands, be willing to fight for them, and have a president who will take them in absolute seriousness and try to accommodate them.

The new president of the College must carry a vision beyond simply preserving and sprucing up a small liberal arts college. He or she must be fully aware of problems such as the ethnic disparity among the student body and the faculty, and their frustration with the administration. The next president must concentrate less upon the cosmetics and social prestige of the College and even greater emphasize the importance of writing, literature, art, and music, all tempered by philosophy and the social sciences.

Our generation is in a position of the greatest potential, able to shape the beginning of the next millennium. The tools we require can be gained here, but only if we and the next president of Washington College prove capable of demanding the necessary education.

PCB update

by Andrew Diller
Reporter

Last year, the Environmental Protection Agency found that six of Washington College's PCB transformers did not comply with federal EPA regulations; some were even leaking the highly toxic PCB. With the new academic year, the issue surfaces about what has been done to remove PCB transformers and to replace them with new silicon or oil based transformers.

On June 6, 1988, the EPA conducted a surprise inspection of the College's six transformers, located at Queen Anne's, Kent, and Caroline dormitories, Hodson Hall, Miller Library, Gibson Fine Arts Center, and Cain Gymnasium.

The EPA found the transformers in violation of a number of applicable laws, those laws having been in effect since 1987. Fortunately, the violations were relegated to administrative infractions.

The infractions included failing to post warning signs on PCB transformers, failing to keep detailed logs concerning possible PCB leakage from the transformers, and failure to notify local fire officials about the potential danger of the PCBs.

For violating these laws, the EPA filed suit and fined the College $150,000.

At this time, the two most dangerous leak sources, the transformers in Queen Anne's and Caroline House were removed (following federal EPA procedures) and new silicon transformers were installed.

According to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, the remaining four PCB transformers are still operational, but all the rough work for the installation of new transformers has been completed.

This rough work consists of pouring the new packs for the transformers, and laying of underground cable for their eventual hookup. The only hold up is the obtaining of actual transformers.

Old transformers will be removed by January 1990, and new transformers should arrive this fall.

PCB was thought to be the perfect additive to the oil which serves as a coolant. The transformers are "step-down" transformers: they step down the current to usable levels for the buildings on campus. This process generates heat, and oil serves to cool the huge copper coils which convert electricity.

The positive characteristic of PCB is that it extends the life of these oils, but is also believed to be a carcinogen. PCBs do not break down chemically, so they will not biodegrade if allowed to escape into the environment.

Additionally, there is the threat of PCBs forming deadly dioxins in high degrees of heat, such as fire.

"The only positive side of it is now we have brand new transformers," said Baer when asked what benefits the College will derive from their installation. The new transformers are not better than the old ones, they simply don't contain the illegal PCBs.

However, there is still the matter of the EPA fine, which is currently under litigation.

dents didn't make an active effort to participate considering that students "have always been so very thoughtful....there haven't been any noisy parties so far."

The apathetic attitude alarmed one resident who said, "It was very sad. If only one had shown up, maybe then we wouldn't have been so disappointed."

Many of those who live on Queen Street question whether the students of Washington College will come to the next meeting. The date is as yet unscheduled.

Police Report

Kent County News reported this week that two Washington College students were released on their own recognizance following their arrest on Controlled Dangerous Substance charges, September 7.

Hamilton Brooks Durkee, 21, was stopped at approximately 12:00 am on Cross Street for a speeding violation. Having suspected that Durkee was intoxicated they administered several field sobriety tests. He was then arrested for driving while intoxicated. According to Kent County News, a search incident to his arrest turned up 124.7 grams of suspected marijuana.

Both Durkee and his passenger, Jill Mackay Butler, were charged with possession of a controlled dangerous substance and possession with intent to distribute/manufacture.

Student fined for cross walk violation

On Friday, September 8, a Washington College student was stopped by local police in the crosswalk across from Reid Hall.

According to Chestertown Police Chief Stetson, she was cited for not hesitating, "or even looking," before attempting to cross the street.

Chief Stetson was forced to stop abruptly to avoid hitting the student. He claimed that she was too busy listening to her walkman to observe traffic.

The Chief stated that if he was driving a tractor trailer, or even was a less attentive driver, chances are that he would have been unable to avoid hitting her. Instead of getting fined she would be seriously hurt.

"I think it was for her own good, but I don't agree with the extent of the citation," stated Chris Rummell, a freshman who lives in Caroline and uses the crosswalk everyday.

Amanda Burt, a resident of Minta Martin, stated that citing the student was for her own safety.

"A lot of drivers don't bother to stop at the crosswalk, so I think it's important to be aware of the traffic, especially since there's a lot of construction going on in Chestertown and it is often difficult to stop."

TABLE TALK

I hope that everyone enjoyed themselves at the Eastern Shore Dinner last Wednesday evening. Since its discovery in the 1930's, thiamine (vitamin B1) has been touted for its ability to get rid of that "run down" feeling. However, thiamine by itself cannot provide energy.

Like other B-Complex Vitamins, thiamine acts as a biologic catalyst, or coenzyme, it participates in the long chain of reactions that provide energy for the body to maintain a constant temperature. Because thiamine is used for energy production, the need for thiamine increases if calories increases.

Inadequate thiamine in the diet may result in mental confusion, muscular weakness, leg cramps, and an enlarged heart.

An extreme deficiency will result in beriberi, a dehibilitating and often fatal disease. Although rare in the United States, the less developed countries are not as fortunate.

The Recommended Daily Allowance is 1.4 mg for men and 1.0 mg for women. Thiamine is not stored in the body to any great extent, so daily intake is best. Since our bodies take up only what they need and excrete any extra, megadoses are futile and may even be dangerous.

A variety of foods is recommended to get a daily supply of thiamine since no one food or food group is an exceptionally good source.

Thiamine can be found in enriched and whole grains(Breads and cereals); liver and organ meats; dried beans; leafy vegetables and pork.

Full of gentle, ironic humor, this movie is joyful from beginning to end. It tells the story of the Mutt-and-Jeff relationship of an irascible truckdriver and his bumbling assistant who live in an ordinary village in Czechoslovakia, and how they and their neighbors quietly triumph over a patronizing bureaucrat who is plotting to take over the assistant's ancestral home. State of College assessed

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

The 1989 Washington College State of the College Report was released over the summer. Submitted by last year's Student Government Association Vice President and Student Academic Board Chairperson, Robert Albers, the report centers on the apparent need for more faculty.

In the first paragraph, Albers cited the 1977 report, which claimed the College was "academically stagnant and drifting without purpose or vision."

In 1989, Albers sees the College in a more optimistic light. "The school has improved because of an increasing acknowledgment of the need for personal responsibility on the part of individual faculty members and students."

The rest of the report addresses the need for additional professors. "Buildings alone will not make a school a place of learning," he wrote.

Some concerns were with the four course plan, a current policy which increases the credit values of most classes in order enable students to make the most of their college career. Instead of a fifth class, there exists an extracurricular fifth obligation, which encourages students to attend College events, such as lectures, concerts, and films.

This is a recognized student responsibility, said Albers, but "dedicated and demanding faculty can encourage more responsibility on the part of the student."

Another issue in the report is student faculty ratios from the Constitution reflects new SGA

by Jeni Gilday
Reporter

The Washington College Student Government Association is doing things a bit differently this year, according to executive officers Steven Attias and Joe Van Name. Everyone in the SGA is making a serious commitment to improve the quality of all areas of the Association.

This new and serious attitude has come about because of actions taken in the past few years. Changes in the SGA Constitution are examples, especially that of the treasury department. Due to the behaviors of the last few treasurers, new steps have been taken to form a different kind of treasury.

Instead of the treasurer alone signing checks for the SGA, the President, Attias, and Treasurer, Van Name, must both sign all checks for the SGA. If clubs need money they must fill out a fund request form.

Once all checks have been written, approved receipts will be turned in to the Business Office. Since there has been some trouble with the amount of monetary funds open to the treasurer, it has been decided that $2000 will be kept for petty cash. The account will be replenished when money has been taken out.

Besides the changes in the handling of money, Van Name stated that he is determined to make a budget, pay off bills from the last SGA, and keep records. The treasury will be reorganized with Attias' help

According to Van Name, one of the biggest problems with the past treasurers is that records were not kept to trace the input

Cable issue still unresolved

by Sharon Bonner
Reporter

Simmons Cable Company was supposed to meet with the college administration last week but failed to make an appearance.

"The College did everything in its power to facilitate Simmon's Cable Company installing cable in the dormitories. Now it is all up to Simmon's Cable to contact us.", commented Mr. Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Activities.

The meeting between the college administration and Simmons Cable will allow the college to examine Simmon's drawings of plans for cable installation and to discuss the plans for reinstallation of cable wires in the newly renovated dormitories. The college administration needs to insure that telephone, computer and other wires previously installed underground aren't destroyed in the cable installation process.

At this time, Simmons Cable Company has not contacted the college to set another meeting date or to plan a definite date for cable installation. Simmons Cable Company was not available for comment.

Student interest in cable television in the dorms has lead to the resurfacing of a proposal for a satellite station on campus. A proposal for a satellite system was submitted to the college administration by Dr. Paul

SGA has first meeting

by Kyndra Ponder
Reporter

Tuesday night the SGA had its first meeting of the year in the Minta Martin basement. Most of the 27 members present were newly elected Dorm Senators waiting to be sworn in.

After swearing-in ceremonies, senior SCC representative Neil MacIndoe discussed the Student Conduct Council and its new role at Washington College. The SCC is made up of a 5 member board— 1 rep from sophomore, junior, and senior classes, 1 faculty adviser and 1 member of the Administration. The council handles student conduct violations which are not related to academics.

There are currently 4 members on the SCC. They currently await the nomination of a Sophomore representative. Interested sophomores should talk to any SGA member or member of the SCC or leave their name in the SGA mailbox.

Treasurer Joe Van Name submitted the SGA budget in the 1989-90 school year. This year's budget includes over $38,000 collected from Student Activities Fees, in addition to a $900 surplus of funds from last year.

The two largest expenditures are planned for social events and for student clubs.

$10,000 has been set aside

EDITORIAL

Where are the letters?

Where are the letters? In the last few weeks, Elm staff members have been inundated with comments from students who are unhappy with this publication's reporting practices.

I specifically refer to the Police Report, which, although usually buried within the pages of The Elm, consistently causes the biggest stir from outraged friends of the "victims" about whom we report.

Staff members have been patient with inquiring minds who want to know what right we have to print these reports—which, incidentally, are public information. We have informed students that Letters to the Editor is indeed a forum for them to voice their opinions about matters such as this.

So far, we have received no letters and several headaches from people who find it easier to assault the staff with bombast than to put their pens where their mouths are. "Where do you draw the line?" is the most frequently asked question.

There is no question that we are well within our ethical rights to print police reports involving students. It is newsworthy when a student is accused or found guilty of committing a crime, and it is of interest to other students. Whether it inspires positive or negative interest varies with the individual; it is not our responsibility to refrain from printing news because a small group of people may take offense.

The police reports again raise the question of a person's accountability for his own actions: generally, people know when they're doing something illegal, such as driving drunk or possessing a controlled substance, and it is a choice that each person makes. If that person is caught, then it's pretty rotten luck, but that's not going to stop The Elm from printing the offenses if records are available to the public.

Furthermore, just because we print these reports doesn't mean we're righteous, or that we blindly agree with the law. If we think it's news, we print it. Period.

Some people won't agree with our policies, which brings me back to the subject of letters to the Editor. Student complaints and praise are not limited to the police reports; they range from the Administration to the WCDS. Letters to the Editor are an excellent way to make the higher-ups aware of what's important to you—administrators do actually read The Elm.

So put your pen to paper, if you dare. We want to know what you're thinking.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Editorial Board.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Consumption of alcohol is a privilege

To the Editor:

I will probably upset a lot of students with what I am going to say, but this is not unusual nor unexpected.

By now just about everyone is aware of the changes in the alcohol policy and a great many students appear to be disturbed by the concept of being required to hire a WCDS bartender at official parties. The intent of this new alcohol policy is to limit the availability of alcohol to persons under the age of 21 (at least on campus). So what's the problem?

In case it has not occurred to you, it is illegal to serve alcohol to a person under the age of 21. This is a matter of fact and it has nothing to do with any ethical implications. By law, those under 21 are prohibited to consume alcohol. This is merely a fact and to debate this point would be useless.

Before I go any further let me point out that the consumption of alcohol is a privilege and not a right. The Constitution and the Bill of Rights clearly (or at times, unclearly) define your rights as a US citizen. However, the consumption of alcohol is not among these rights – as we all like to believe. And even to say that it is my right to drink is somewhat absurd.

But going back to my previous notion about debating the alcohol policy. If you want to debate the question as to whether or not it is fair to lay these restrictions on drinking, you are debating its ethical statute. You are asking whether or not drinking ought to be restricted, and if you think that drinking ought not be restricted then you must lay down your ethical criteria for such a claim. You can not simply say that people under 21 ought to be given the privilege of drinking. You must support that claim. And idle threats such as students will go off campus to drink, students will drink and drive, students will ignore the law, or students will use other drugs, are not relevant claims that will support your argument. As for "saving us from ourselves," this requires an honest effort on "our" part because it is our responsibility not the college's to baby-sit us.

So, if you want to debate the issue, fine. Just make sure you debate it on its ethical validity, not the fact that it exists, and therefore debate it with your Congressperson or Senator and not with those who attempt to uphold the law set by the state of Maryland.

MD General Assembly internships

To the Editor:

Applications are now being accepted for students interested in the internship program at the Maryland General Assembly during the spring semester. Preference will be given to political science majors in their junior year or students who will be first semester seniors in the spring. Students must have a GPA of a least 3.0 and a B in forms of lit. As well, preference will be given to students who have taken pol sci 391 or 401.

Final choice of interns will be made in Annapolis. However, the department will make the first "cut."

The internship program counts as two courses. Students interested in details of the program and/or an application form should contact Professor Weissman in 12 Ferguson Hall, ext 326 by the end of the month.

In the near future, a meeting of interested students and past participants will be scheduled.

This program is most rewarding, but is very demanding in terms of time, flexibility and work.

National Honor Society

The Washington College chapter of the National Honor Society (Phi Alpha Theta) is beginning its formal activities for the 1989-90 academic year by opening its membership rolls to qualified students. History majors who meet the requirements are automatically notified of their eligibility. Membership in the organization, which requires interest and high achievement in the discipline of History, is not limited to History majors. Requirements for membership include the following:

- A minimum of four courses in History with a "B" plus average,

-a "B" average in 2/3rds of the remaining course work;

- standing in the upper 35% of one's class.

If you are interested and believe you have the qualifications for membership, contact the Chapter Adviser (Professor Bob Fallaw, Ferguson 24, ext. 272.

Corrections

Ronald Council, John Manning, and Daniel Pratt were charged with noise ordinance violations on August 26, but were not arrested, as reported in The Elm on September 8.

The Elm reported incorrectly that Nicholas Darcangelo, and Michael Johnson were expelled from the College for charges of theft. Both men were in fact dismissed, and may apply for return next semester. –Ed.

CAMPUS VOICES

ISSUE: The College is investigating the possibility of installing a satellite dish on campus. Why or why not is this a viable alternative to cable?

Satellite dish has other, less obvious purposes

Carolin Leibig

Cable versus a satellite dish? Get the dish! It's just the better investment. With the dish, the school would get more channels, including educational channels and foreign language programs. And if the College could get a grant, then it would be less expensive as well.

The reception on my TV here in Chestertown could be a lot better. Since we're relatively far from Baltimore, every time a weather front moves in, some channels don't come in at all. It's a pain to have to move the antenna on your TV set around every time it rains just in order to get NBC. I'm tired of having to go home to watch Days of Our Lives easily. A dish would improve reception greatly, and end some of our weather woes. It might even help keep some students on campus on the weekends.

The College is isolated by being so far from large cities. The dish might end some of that isolation by bringing more things, such as sporting events and international news closer to us. The dish would give the College community access to programming from around the world.

Remember last year when they cut the cable lines (and other things) during construction? That would be less likely to happen with a dish and if it did, we wouldn't have to call the cable company. A dish would be more reliable than cable, and less likely to mess up our phones or the network hookups.

There wouldn't be the hassle of getting cable installed each year. They could install lines in each dorm room, and the student would only have to pay a one-time hook-up fee, and a small monthly service charge. These lines could later be updated to include the phone lines for a Washington College phone system.

As for billing problems, everyone could pay a flat rate for a basic cable package, the way we do now at home. If you want movie channels, you pay extra for them.

Once the dish is installed, if the College doesn't get the grant, then they could use the hook-up and service fees to pay it off. Eventually the dish would pay for itself and even become a source of revenue for the College. Students would get the network and independent stations in clearly, and could pay to for whatever movie channels they wanted.

But besides the obvious, the dish would have several practical functions if, say the College decided it didn't want it anymore. The WCDS could use it as a salad bowl for those all school picnics, or the Administration could turn it into a lovely ornamental pool with a fountain or a planter for in front of the Academic Resources Center. It would also make an ideal wading pool.

If you look at it this way, 2% milk is not as good as whole. A cable company cannot give you all the channels you could get with a dish. The dish comes with a lot of potential that cable lacks.

Carolin Leibig is a junior International Studies major.

Karen Iacangelo
Silver Spring, MD
Sophomore

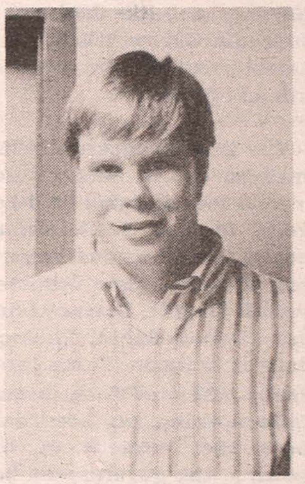
I think a satellite dish would really be a good idea. It is much less expensive than giving students more cable. Go for it!

Lynn Massicott
Owings Mills, MD
Sophomore

It doesn't make sense to deny us cable, then approve a satellite dish, but it's a good idea. Satellite dishes are a good source of entertainment.

Jennifer Griffin
Reisterstown, MD
Sophomore

The main intention of getting a college satellite should not be cable for dorms. If the College has extra money or is able to get a grant for the project, then a satellite would be useful for educational purposes, expecially in the foreign language, economics, and political science departments.



Todd Kagler
Baltimore, MD
Sophomore

Satellite TV would not only increase on-campus entertainment, it would also allow an additional source of media that could expand every student's learning opportunities.

Wendy Kloiber
Syracuse, NY
Senior

It is a good idea but not as an alternative to cable. The kind of service available from the two systems is too different for one to replace the other.

by Brian Simpson

Purchasing a dish is not an alternative to cable

Brian Gimelson

At first the idea of the school buying a satellite dish sounded fantastic. A dish can receive hundreds of channels as clearly as if you were next to the transmitter. The cost is high, but would go down over time. Sounded like the answer to our TV woes, right?

The problem is that a satellite dish is not as versatile as it sounds. It can only receive signals from one satellite at a time. Some companies (Disney is a good example) have their own satellites so we'd end up paying for their channels. Most pay TV channels like HBO and Cinemax are scrambled anyway, so anyone who wanted them would have to pay to get a decoder. Since more and more stations are scrambling their signals, soon the dish would be about as good as a large antenna.

Before the College goes ahead and applies for any grants, or decides to purchase a dish, the Administration should attempt to find out how many students would make use of it. The language departments want a station, and say they would make use of it but who else would it benefit? An argument that it replaces cable is unfounded. We will still have to pay for all our favorite channels.

After they figure out who would get the most use out of the station, there's still the question of where to put it. Satellite dishes are large, and face it, out of character. Disguising a dish so that it fits in with the colonial architecture on the campus would be a challenge, if not impossible. My first choice would be the top of Bunting, with the top of Hodson a close second. Behind the Alumni House is my third choice.

For the present, stick with cable. It's reasonably accessible, and works out fine for right now. People who want it can pick out the stations they want, and just pay the charges.

A lot more needs to be done on campus before the college should consider a "satellite station." There are dorms that need renovating, a fire lane that looks like a mud slide, and buildings that are still unfinished.

When I can walk directly from my dorm to the dining hall, without a detour, then I'm ready to think about what I'd want from a satellite dish.

Brian Gimelson is a sophomore intending to double major in business and art history.

PERSPECTIVES

Editorial

Just give them a gentle nudge

Laura Hopper
Perspectives Editor

When it comes to diplomacy, we might learn a lot from the Bush Administration. The Reagan Administration was perhaps overfond of shuttle diplomacy. Sending Secretary of State George Schultz to the Middle East garnered a great deal of press coverage, but was expensive and unproductive.

So far, Secretary of State James Baker III has not made the rounds of Middle Eastern capitals. If the policy followed by the current administration is any indication, he is not likely to.

The new policy is disarmingly simple: let governments involved in a regional conflict solve their own problems, without interference from the United States. The best example of this is unfolding in the Middle East, where Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's ten point plan for holding elections in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is meeting mixed reactions.

Both of these territories are currently held by the Israelis, and there have been scenes of bloody confrontations between Palestinian youths and Israeli Defense forces. President Mubarak's plan is similar to the Israeli Labor Party position on elections in the occupied territories.

Mubarak's plan would allow all Palestinians in East Jerusalem, the West Bank, and Gaza Strip to vote and run for office. Candidates would be allowed to campaign without interference from Israeli authorities, and Israel would permit international supervision of the electoral process. However, the Mubarak plan also contains suggestions the Israelis are likely to find offensive.

During the election period, construction or expansion of Jewish settlements in these areas would be suspended, and only Israelis who live and work in these areas would be allowed to enter them on election day. The army would withdraw from polling places the day of the election. The plan does not suggest, as many Arab initiatives have, that Israel negotiate with the PLO.

How is the United States involved with this? It nudged the Israeli Government into considering the proposal.

The Bush Administration's new policy on the Middle East. Let the Israelis and the Palestinians iron out their own differences. So the Bush Administration praised the Mubarak Ten Point Plan but didn't go into much detail about it. It was lauded as a first step, not as an actual solution.

President Mubarak's plan contains several points that United States knows the Israeli Government is certain never to accept. Yet at a meeting with Defense Secretary Yitzhak Rabin, Secretary of State Baker strongly urged the Israeli Government to seriously consider President Mubarak's plan. The Secretary's message was clear, you may not like Mubarak's proposals, but we (the United States) aren't going to come up with an alternative.

The Israelis apparently listened to the Secretary's advice. A meeting was held between the top officials of Israel's coalition government. Present were Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Finance Minister Shimon Peres, and Foreign Minister Moshe Arens. While nothing has been said about the outcome of the meeting, the government has not officially decided what to do about President Mubarak's proposal.

In the United States, the Administration's nudging policy is also meeting with some criticism. Comprehensive Middle East peace initiatives have become an expected part of each administration's foreign policy since the Carter Administration.

Congress is already beginning to call for a new Middle East initiative, but they have forgotten that costly shuttle diplomacy doesn't work. However, it would be a political victory for opponents of the Administration.

The biggest problem is that the countries of the Middle East have grown used to the United States trying to solve their problems for them. Why bother to make a move on our own, when the US government will be along any minute now with a new proposal and a couple of million dollars to set up negotiations?

This policy might never make it off the ground because the Israeli, Egyptian, and other Middle Eastern governments might be unwilling to shoulder the responsibility of the peace in their area.

While the Administration is hoping its policy of nudging local governments along will meet with success in other areas, it also seeks individuals who can serve as catalysts.

In Afghanistan, for example, the US is hoping to enlist the aid of former king Zahir Shah in resolving the civil war in that country.

The Administration also supports the efforts of former President Jimmy Carter to set up negotiations between the Ethiopian Government and Eritrean People's Liberation Front who have been fighting each other since 1961. Talks between the two sides are being held at the Carter Presidential Center in Atlanta, Georgia currently.

One of Mr. Carter's preconditions for the talks was that the two sides agree to have talks in one of six African countries. They were also to agree on the language to be used in the talks, and other procedural matters. While he praised the resolve of both parties, Mr. Carter did not say if he would remain as mediator.

If the governments of the Middle East are willing to take on the responsibility, and there are people who can act as catalysts in different situations, this new "nudge" diplomacy might work. But Congress and the press will have to give it time.

KGB goes Hollywood

Steven Bruchey

The new director of the KGB, Vladmir A. Kryuchkov, has come to the forefront in praise of glasnost. He has done so by making himself available to foreign correspondents and the establishment of a new press office. In these attempts to open itself within the umbrella of glasnost, the KGB seems to be losing itself in a symbol of American Capitalism: Hollywood.

In "The KGB Today," they hit the silver screen in a 55 minute documentary. Its purpose is to project an objective image of their work both at home and abroad. The film will be shown soon to the Soviet people to try to present a more humanistic image of the organization while trying to reinforce their tightening policies towards drug smuggling, terrorism and crime. The movie says that while all countries engage in intelligence work, the KGB is no worse and perhaps more moralistic than most others. Regardless, the KGB is going against years of tradition and Soviet culture in this display of pseudo-Americanism.

More than anything, it is startling that the KGB is reaching out to the people through film. While the bureau is trying to update its propaganda to fit into the media age, the KGB tradition of never mentioning topics such as repression, phone taps, the number of employees, structure, organization and methods. Instead, the narrator, Colonel Igor Prelin, the press officer of the organization, tells jokes, gives cooking tips, comments on grooming and recites his own poetry about the KGB ("We wage a war with no rules/ A snowstorm with no end./ We share a bottle with a foe/ Or get a bullet from a friend."). Glasnost is certainly opening if the KGB allows a colonel to voice an opinion in this manner.

The documentary utilizes another aspect of the American movie industry: marketing. The Novosti Press Agency, who helped the KGB in their endeavors, hopes for wide commercial distribution and has told inquiring American television companies that the beginning price for the "movie rights" is $100,000. It is overwhelming to think that we could be viewing "The KGB Today" while Soviet audiences are seeing "Batman."

Over the years, glasnost has definitely taken root into the present political system. Its roots are so deep that they have delved into one of the most secret agencies ever to exist, the KGB. In "opening" this clandestine organization, they have selected an American venue by putting the new KGB onto the big screen. Believe it or not, but plans are being made for two more installments— sequels, if you will—in this documentary series.

THE UNITED STATES

The Senate decided last Friday to ban smoking on all domestic flights by a 65 to 34 vote. This is an extension of the current ban, which prohibits smoking on flights lasting less than two hours, about 80% of all flights. The House has yet to approve the measure and has so far only approved a bill to make the current ban—which expires in April 1990—permanent. The White House reserved comment on the Senate decision.

A capital gains tax cut was approved by a House Committee last Thursday. Opponents of the cut assert that the lower tax will only benefit the rich, at the expense of the working class, making it easier for them to increase their already inordinately abundant capital. Those in favor of the cut feel that it will make more capital available to business for expansion or new ventures. The cut still must be approved by the House in order for it to take effect. Stocks, bonds and real estate are effected by the capital gains tax.

In a shooting rampage last Thursday, a man shot and killed 7 people and wounded 13 others. Joseph T. Wesbecker finally killed himself with the assault rifle he had used on his victims. The tragic incident took place in a printing plant in Louisville, KY, where Wesbecker used to work. A co-worker who was not harmed said Wesbecker had been talking about guns and "Soldier of Fortune" magazine, and had expressed aloud his plans to "shoot the bosses," whom he could not find Thursday. Wesbecker was being treated for mental disorders, and was on permanent disability leave from the plant.

The city council of Philadelphia decided to cut funding for programs for the homeless by 50% last week. The decision provoked outrage and public protests from many advocates for the homeless. In addition to the cuts the city has made in funding, it has evicted about 300 people from homeless shelters and closed its emergency shelters. Estimates figure there are 12,500 homeless people in Philadelphia, a quarter of which are mentally ill. A member of the Mayor's Task Force on the Budget and Taxation said the social programs were cut so that more funds could be appropriated for public works. Philadelphia was first city to develop a comprehensive program for housing for the homeless and is now the first to make severe cuts. Many fear that the decision in Philadelphia reflects a national trend.

Robert Penn Warren, famous poet and novelist died of cancer last week in his summer home. He was 84 years old. Most famous for his novel, All the King's Men, Warren was hailed for his ability to "form an intricate mirror of the human experience." Much of his work was drawn from his experience living in the South. Mr.Warren was also a professor at Yale, Louisiana State University and the University of Minnesota.

CAMBODIA

With the pull-out of Vietnam scheduled for the end of September, many fear a power vacuum which would allow the ghoulish Khmer Rouge to return to power. From 1975 to 1978, the Khmer Rouge controlled Cambodia and committed genocidal atrocities against its people; two million Cambodians were killed,the intelligentsia completely wiped out, and the countryside utterly deciminated. Vietnam then invaded in 1978.

Since then it has been one of the Unites States foreign policy objectives to evict Vietnam. In doing so, the US supports resistance forces which will control Cambodia once Vietnam leaves, giving the US some influence the future of the country.

The strongest contender for power seems to be Prince Noroodom Sihanouk, whom the US is backing. Unfortunately, Prince Sihanouk is allied with the Khmer Rouge. Worse still, he demonstrated during talks in Paris last month that he wants the Khmer Rouge to take part in an interim coalition to govern Cambodia.

Last week, the Administration met to work toward resolving whether it should allow the Khmer Rouge to be given any stake, even in a transitional government, or only support a coalition which excludes the Khmer Rouge. Currently, there are 40,000 Khmer Rouge guerrillas in Cambodia, and they are by far the strongest indigenous military power. It is in this light that Secretary of State James Baker commented last May, that ,"You're going to have the Khmer Rouge there...That's a fact of life."

Many feel that for this reason, the Khmer Rouge would be less threatening as part of coalition in which they might be overshadowed and eventually disintegrate, than if they continue to fight in the countryside.

Others, however, feel that the US shares responsibility with other foreign countries for the Khmer Rouge genocide, and any appeasement or tolerance of the Khmer Rouge now is morally reprehensible. Furthermore, because the US has considerable influence in the area, it should take urgent action to prevent a recurrence of another such tragedy.

SRI LANKA

Last week, amid the first sessions of what will be a month-long peace conference, 38 people were killed in intensified violence, the cause for which remains nebulous at best. Killings have become commonplace in Sri Lanka, and those who are made targets of pro-government death squads or the People's Liberation Front, the two groups who are most likely responsible for the killings, are often intellectuals, civil servants, human rights monitors and politically active young men and women.

The killing of Chandratne Patuwathavithane last week, a popular Sri Lankan university chancellor, is one of many examples of senseless brutality without motive.

The People's Liberation Front, a twenty year old Sinhalese nationalist group, Sri Lanka's ethnic majority, which flirted with mainstream politics at one point; recently they seemed to espouse violence exclusively rather than legal political activity, killing anyone from taxi drivers and shopkeepers who ignore its calls for general strike, to government officials and monks.

The government of Sri Lanka, run by the United National Party, has allowed angry civilians to deal with the crisis: thus, the spread of death squads who have killed 5,000 young people thought to be associated with the People's Liberation Front.

The violence is thought to center around the presence of Indian troops, who have occupied Sri Lanka since 1987. This is the reason many have put their hopes for peace into the withdrawal of the troops, which will take place before the end of the year.

The peace talks will focus on India's departure. Though other guerrilla groups were invited and are taking part in the talks, including those representing Sri Lanka's other ethnic group, the northern Tamils, the People's Liberation Front has refused to attend the talks.

NAMIBIA

Namibia, also known as South-West Africa and under South African rule since World War I, will gain its independence next year. Last week, it was allowed the return of its exiled leader, Sam Nujoma.

Mr. Nujoma is the leader of the South-West Africa People's Organization, known as "Swapo" and declared by the United Nations in 1973 to be "the sole representative and authentic representative of the Namibian people.". In preparation for its independence, 41,000 Namibian refugees came home last week from abroad. Within Namibia, citizens were allowed to register in upcoming elections that will draft a constitution for Namibia next year.

The return of Mr. Nujoma and these concurrent events evoked national euphoria. The champion of Namibian independence for 30 years, most spent in exile, Mr. Nujoma was "greeted as a hero" last week. Committed to an armed struggle against South African rule since 1966, Swapo is now ready to bury the hatchet, so to speak. Mr. Nujoma addressed Namibians in an emotional speech and told reporters, "We return in a spirit of peace, love and national reconciliation.".

SOUTH AFRICA

On two separate occasions last week, September 13 and September 15, the new president of South Africa, F.W. de Klerk, allowed anti-apartheid demonstrations to proceed unimpeded by police measures (which have in the past been violent). The crowd numbered 20,000 in both Johannesburg and Cape City, and though many demonstrators were black or of mixed race, some were white. Not only are marches such as last week's illegal under the current state of emergency rule, but the Cape Town protest took place in the city center designated for whites only. As de Klerk has promised "evolutionary change" and the end of white domination in South Africa, last weeks events can be seen as a genuine desire to further these ends.

SOVIET UNION

President Mikhail Gorbachev met with Communist leaders from Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, the Baltic states, last Wednesday, to consider demands for greater autonomy. Though he held the stance that separatist Communist movements would threaten national stability, unity and ultimately the success of perestroika and glasnost, his programs for political and economic change, he stressed the "need to grant the parties(of the Baltics)...greater independence..." He expressed that "differences can be worked out without confrontation," thus dispelling a general fear (in the US as well as the Baltics) of a military crackdown. Baltic leaders were generally pleased with the meeting, journalists reported, and are optimistic about the more important meeting of the Communist Party Central Committee this week.

THE MIDDLE EAST

A peace plan ending the intifadah in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza strip, now in its 21st month, may be in sight. The intifadah has been a bloody tragedy in which over 400 Arabs and almost 100 Israelis have been killed. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak devised a peace plan which is still being hotly debated by Israelis and Egyptians alike. Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin will fly to Cairo Monday to discuss the plan with Mubarak.

The peace plan details the logistics of holding elections in the occupied territories, which is what an earlier peace plan proposed by Israeli President Yitzhak Shamir in March called for.

The difference between the two is that the former offers specifics about how the elections will be carried out, whereas the latter does not. While Mr.Rabin, a member of Israel's Labor Party, and Shimon Peres, the head of the party, want to adopt the plan immediately and have threatened to withdraw the Labor Party from the governing coalition if it is not adopted, President Shamir, Foreign Minister Moshe Arens and the Right wing all adamantly oppose it.

As for the Arabs, PLO head Yassar Arafat is willing to discuss the plan with Mr. Mubarak, and has already done so, while others feel that the plan is a carbon copy of Mr.Shamir's, and does not meet their demands.

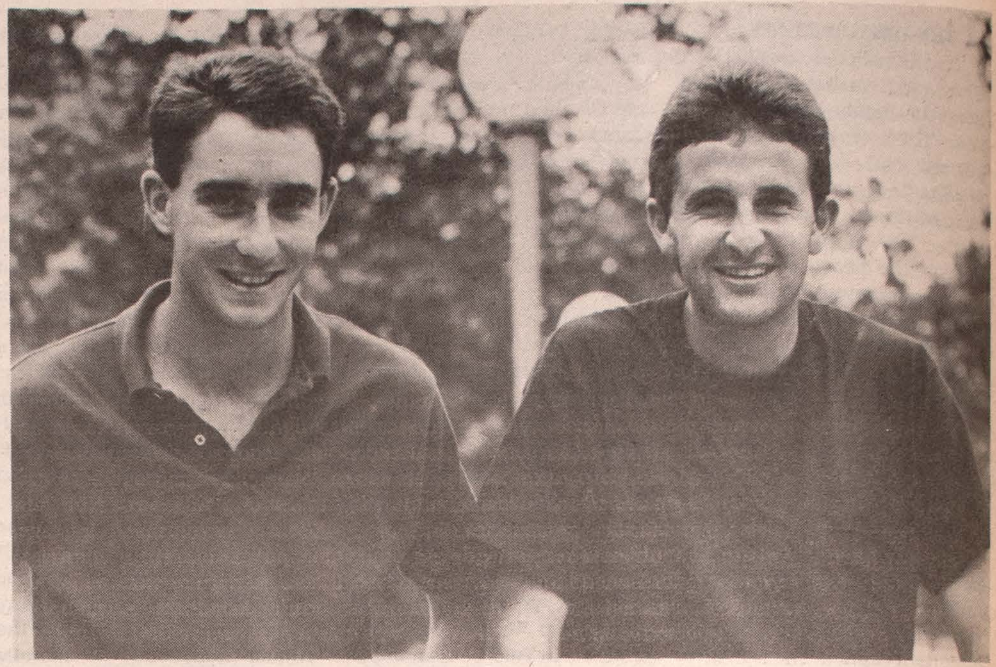
South Africans do more than volley well

by Rachael Rice
Reporter



Making themselves at home on the tennis court, in the classroom, and in the United States, Larry Gewer and Peter Maller integrate South African culture with American. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

To the inhabitant of any metropolitan area, small and lethargic Chestertown, Maryland represents almost the end of the world. When three residents of Johannesburg, South Africa stepped from the plains of their homeland to the corn belt of Maryland, a different school system, nation, and culture suddenly engulfed them.

Tracy Peel, Larry Gewer, and Peter Maller all made this long journey, mentally as well as in body, from South Africa, and have found Washington College is not the end of the earth, but offers new beginnings.

How and why did three students from virtually the other side of the world manage to wind their way to this small Eastern Shore community? A dual interest in tennis and attending school in the states fueled each one.

"A friend of mine played tennis for UNC– Charlotte," explains Larry, "and he let Fred [Wyman, the men's varsity tennis coach] know about me. Fred got in touch while I was still serving in the South African army. I came without ever seeing WC or Chestertown."

Peter, who arrived with Larry in January of 1987, tells a similar story. He adds that he had offers to play tennis at schools in California and Florida, but when he came to Chestertown, he "liked it and stayed."

Tracy, the most recent addition to the South African contingent, arrived in January of this year. Tracy had known Peter and Larry back home, and she always said someday she would like to play tennis and study in the states. When Coach Wyman contacted her coach in South Africa last year, Tracy believed that "the time was right."

Initially, life in America, away from the excitement of the big city, is not always easy. Although Tracy "thought the college was very pretty," she "thought Chestertown would be a lot bigger than it was." Looking back, she laughs, "the first few days were the worst days of my life! At first I felt like an absolute fool! I couldn't put plugs in the sockets properly. I couldn't open doors properly; in South Africa all doors open outward. One time I panicked when I thought I was stuck in the bathroom. I pushed and pushed on the door, until finally I realized that it pulled in!"

Remarking that"he was shocked at first at the size and relative quiet in comparison to Johannesburg," Peter experienced a similar reaction to the size of Chestertown

All three students, however, have crossed those initial stumbling blocks with little difficulty, and continue to excel both on and off the tennis court.

Tracy made her tennis debut in the States last spring and rocketed to an NCAA Division III national singles ranking of 14 and doubles ranking with partner Monica Blanco. Her accomplishments during 1989 have been numerous: beating third ranked Joli Huarnick of Trenton State in straight sets; gaining the doubles final of the Mid-Atlantic Conference Tournament with Meg Wheatley; competing in the NCAA National Singles and Doubles Tournaments in Claremont, California, and most recently being named an NCAA All-American.

Tracy enjoys her classes, particularly business courses, and boasts of a solid grade point average. When asked if she plans to finish all four years at Washington College, Tracy answered emphatically, "Most definitely!" Her post graduate plans appear to be a little less settled: "I may go into dentistry, but who knows, my mind may change a million times before that happens!"

Larry, who will graduate in the fall of 1990, hopes to add to his collection of tennis awards by attaining a 1990 NCAA Division III National Championship. His list of accolades is impressive: three year All-American, ranked number one nationally in singles 1989, ranked number one in doubles with Scott Flippin Read 1988/89, was invited to the Rolex Intercollegiate doubles with Read in Minnesota in1989, and was runner up in 1989 NCAA Singles Championship final. The National Championship is the only feat he has not accomplished.

Despite long and demanding hours of tennis and training, Larry has consistently maintained a 3.0 GPA. When asked about his plans after graduation, Larry thinks for a moment and answers undecidedly, "I may play a little pro-circuit tennis. . .then again, I may go home and get a graduate degree. . .of course, I may just work for my father."

Peter, who will be graduating in the spring of 1990, makes his mark simultaneously in the athletic arena and the classroom. Twice he has been named an Academic All-American by obtaining a GPA of 3.5 and up and acquiring the position of team captain in both 1988/89. Peter was a MAC champion in doubles with Rich Phoebus in 1988 and in singles in 1989. For the first time this fall, he is starting at wing-half back on the men's soccer team. Dean's list, peer advisor, and DK (leadership fraternity) round out an already full list of college activities and honors.

After commencement ceremonies, Peter plans to "keep my option open. I may go to graduate school, or business school and earn my MBA. Then again, I may play some [tennis] circuits in Europe, South Africa, or Texas."

Looking back upon a busy few years, these Johannesburg natives have greatly benefited from and excelled in their experiences in Chestertown and all around America.

But they are not the only ones who gain from their presence, for the cultural exchange has been rich for all who come in contact with Tracy, Peter, and Larry. They do not shy away from sharing slices of life in Johannesburg, even when the topic is that of the controversy surrounding South African government policies.

When asked how he feels about the current situation in South Africa, Peter responds, choosing his words with obvious thought, "I am anti-apartheid. I think it's very difficult, because on one hand, I'm very anti-government, but on the other hand, I was born in South Africa; therefore, to a certain extent I feel very compelled to defend South Africa. I have never been one to put people down for their color. I judge people for who they are. If more people at home felt this way, it would be less of a problem."

Summing up a sentiment expressed at different times by all three students, Tracy proclaims, "Don't believe everything you read in the newspaper. You must go to the country and see for yourself before you make a judgment."

Larry thinks of his homeland and answers, "South Africa is the most beautiful place in the world. However, I do believe that the blacks should have equal rights as well as whites. Yet, I do also believe South Africa is trying to head in that direction. Clearly, the latest election is an indication of that trend."

He also cites media exaggeration and the negative images of South Africa portrayed in television and in movies as adding to misunderstanding: "Lethal Weapon II, now that's a good example. The movie shows a few South African people and persecutes the whole of us. Why, every nation has prejudiced people– but not all the people are prejudiced. It's terribly unfair; people expect change to happen overnight, and it just cannot occur that way."

Next year Tracy, Larry, and Peter will all head back to visit South Africa, back to the home Tracy fondly calls "Jo-Berg." Peter looks forward to seeing friends and attending sporting events, such as cricket and rugby matches, again. Particularly, he misses his family, especially his father, a district doctor, and his baby niece and nephew.

Larry also mentions missing South African athletics, and adds he longs for "everything about South Africa. I am anxious to see my parents, my brother, my sister who was just married and my St. Bernard, China."

Aside from suffering recurring homesickness for her father, who is a baby products manufacturer, her mother, an accountant, and her seven-year old brother, Nicholas, Tracy laments that in the states she "cannot get a tan in the winter or Cane vodka, my favorite drink that is sweetened with lime and Sprite!"

Understandably, all three unanimously agree that Maryland weather is "the worst" in comparison to that of their native land. "It's too cold in the winter and too hot and humid in the summer."

Although their body temperature has not adjusted to Maryland's climate, the three tennis stars have definitely adjusted mentally to the rigors of athletic and academic life as they tear up the tennis courts and text books.

Dancing, singing, speaking with Indians

by Jennifer L. Eisberg
Reporter

"'When did you learn they were not gods?' the Indian boy questioned.

'That came later,' the Wise Old Man responded. 'That is a different story. . .Come another day, and I will tell you the story of how the Indians were deceived and cheated by those they first thought were gods.'

History of the Delaware Indians

Two Sundays ago, Stephen, David, and I arrived in Milsboro, Delaware. We only knew we had come to our first pow wow, joined by the heat and humidity. Not knowing what to expect, we presumed we would learn something about the Indians who lived in the Delaware region before being pushed west by white men...

As I wipe the perspiration off my face, we climb out of my car. I feel as though I have just emerged from a sweat hut. Strangely enough, this feeling is the only connection to Indians that I experience the entire day. The Nanticokes sweat themselves to stay healthy; I feel rather grimy.

We walk through the woods to the sight of the pow wow, and tractors, carrying passengers, pass us on their return to the parking lot. There is something incredibly ironic in watching an Indian haul a load of white people on a tractor-pulled wagon; the passengers have sullen, almost defeated expressions on their faces.

Coming through the trees, the tribal music swarms around us. Stephen struts to the hard, constant beat of the drums. Also responding to this beat, a crowd looms before us.

If it wasn't for the colored feathers decorating the Indians headdresses and colored paint smudging their faces, I would believe I am at a Stevie Ray Vaughan concert.

Like a Vaughan concert, fat men house enormous bird tattoos on various parts of their bodies. Wearing an assortment of silver and turquoise jewelry, unnaturally thin women with long stringy hair stand beside them. Falseness lies in their footprints in the sand.

This does not fit my image of the traditional Indian pow wow: a ceremonial gathering of Indians dancing, singing, and calling spirits to protect their tribe. The gathering of people are not Indians, but overweight spectators eager to view a show.

Forming the center of attraction, a dance circle performs a particular dance called the "Rabbit Dance." A narrator explains this is one of the few dances in Delaware Indian culture where women actually dance with men. If the lead male dancer continues the dance long enough, the Indians believe the dancer magically turns into a rabbit.

The costumes are impressive. From a distance, I imagine how the women work the buffalo hide until it is smooth, and sew pieces together with thread made of grass to create skirts and leggings.

Using clay and the juice of berries, I see them paint their faces. I feel if I move close to them in order to see more in detail, my images will be destroyed.

The last dance is the Friendship Dance; the dancers invite the spectators to join in. Joining hands with strangers, Stephen and I run to the center of the stage.

As I grasp his hand, the boy to my right gives me an embarrassed glance. Stamping their left feet to the beat of the drum, everyone begins to move to the left. After half a turn, we move toward the center, stamping our left feet. At the center of the circle, we let out a whoop and start the whole thing over.

When the dancing is finished, we walk around to see the crafts. Beautiful, expensive jewelry is everywhere. Silver, turquoise, and malachite jewelry from the south west are mixed among the rattlesnake tail earrings, shell necklaces, and intricate beaded bracelets and headbands.

Artisans sell woven rugs, leather moccasins and carved wooden peace pipes. A woman with not a trace of high Indian cheekbone sits at a table making various pieces of custom jewelry, bearing no resemblance to the typical American Indian jewelry surrounding her.Also keeping with the Indian theme, a man with a U-haul truck sells Harley Davidson belt buckles and faux leather vests.

The closer I look at this scene the less I like it and the worse I feel. Children wear feather headbands made with fake fleece and elastic bands around their heads. Women comment how a nice woven rug would look in their living rooms. Having shed their costumes, the Indian dancers now walk around in running shorts and Nike tennis shoes.

I wonder what it is all about: the pow wow, the Indians, the cheap souvenirs. I realize what I expected to see— the traditions, the religious ceremonies, the culture of the American Indians. These things no longer exist in their true and untainted form.

What does exist is the Indians' effort to hold on to a culture that was more or less destroyed by greedy invaders.

I wonder what the Nanticokes are trying to show to people through their pow wow, and if they really believed in what they are doing.

Some do believe in their culture and traditions, and want to share a part of their ancestors' culture with other people, while others recognize the easy profit of commercializing their history.

A tired Mohican tells me of the wars between the Iroquois Nations and the Delaware and Nanticoke Indians. With a hint of pride, he speaks about his people and interests himself more than myself in his storytelling.

As I listen to his stories, I realize this man is the highlight of the pow wow for me; he is real. The rituals lacking a god to dance for, the half-breeds selling their wares, and the total forced attempt to reenact a way of life no longer exists, and what is left is weighed down with falseness. Yet, Stephen, Dave, and I drive back to school having experienced something different.

Cater's fall convocation remarks

Winston Churchill once declared, "We shape our buildings, afterward our buildings shape us." Yet neither bricks and mortar, nor mortar and pestle can generate by themselves the spirit of scientific inquiry that should be a part of every student's education.

Your challenge- -student and faculty alike- - is to transform Dunning Hall and Decker Center into a living laboratory. You must prove what our graduate William O. Baker, one of the nation's eminent philosophers of science, told me before we began this undertaking: That Washington College builds on a splendid tradition in the sciences but must not falter as we move into our Third Century or we will surely become second rate.

By the time the flowers come up this spring, we will be dedicating the Constance Stuart Larrabee Center for the Arts. Our old Boiler Plant will be transmogrified to provide an exciting workshop for painting, sculpture, photography, and other visual arts. This, too, represented a hard choice in allocating funds and energies, especially when measured by the small numbers who actually major in Fine Arts.

But a college without a lively commitment to all the Arts would be a desolate place. Fine art, drama, music, poetry must permeate the campus and stir the souls of all who dare to call themselves civilized beings. An old Boiler Plant, no matter how skillfully rejuvenated, cannot accomplish this miracle. But those who work there will have a better chance than they did while huddled in the little red run-down dwelling which they have had to endure so long.

Before Commencement, if the winter rains are sparing, we will be entering the splendid new building know as the Academic Resources Center - -or the Casey Center. It has been seven long years in the planning and construction.

Students and faculty, many now departed, joined the initial contest and the subsequent group sessions with the architects that defined the shape and uses of this structure.

Between the conception and the reality has fallen the shadow of impatience. We find it hard to hold onto dreams when they cannot be attained overnight. But the Casey Center will provide a true measure whether ours is a dynamic or a moribund institution. It will not be simply a grand entrance to this College which never before had a gateway or a front door. It offers the prospect of becoming the heart of a campus which grew up in the manner of many little college one building at a time.

The Center's Forum will bring us face to face for close encounters that never take place in the vast stretches of Tawes Auditorium. Within the forum and the new seminar rooms communications will flow around the table and not across the lectern.

Every function assigned to the Casey Center- -from the Language Lab to the Computerized Classroom- - has grown out of needs voiced by members of our community. This was an enterprise designed from the grassroots up.

Over the years, I have convened many sessions in Hynson Lounge and elsewhere devoted to "Open Season on the President." Within the next fortnight I plan to announce another Open Season to discuss any student concern from the College Master Plan to alcohol and drug policy. We can discuss what are the effective ways by which the President keeps in better touch with the College community.

I have maintained an open door policy in my office and my home, responding within the same week to every request to see or speak to me. No inquiry or petition that reaches me has gone unanswered. SGA, the Elm, and other student-led organizations have only to whistle to get my attention and to meet with me at my place or theirs. I have headed out into the night whenever a fraternity or other group was in trouble and sought my guidance.

The next president of Washington College will wish to know from faculty and students what you expect. Your capacity to communicate realistic expectations will help determine what sort of leader is ready to accept this job. The candidates will be sizing you up even as you are measuring them.

No college can ignore the challenge to define, to plan and to position itself for what lies ahead. My successor will not lead a leisure life. Seven years ago at my inaugural, I quoted the eloquent words of Felix Morley delivered to President Gibson nearly four decades earlier. Morley declared "It is your amusing opportunity to make a small college great by keeping it small. In doing so you will be swimming upstream. You will have to struggle against the trend of the times. . ."

The WC soccer team continued to fall just short in the pursuit for their first victory this past week, losing 2-1 to Millersville. The loss dropped the squad's record to 0-4. The team continues their search for their first win against St. Mary's and Franklin & Marshall this week.

The game was not without its bright spots for WC. Mike Bishop scored the team's first goal of the regular season on a pass from Scott Smith, giving the team their first lead of the year. The Sho'men ended the first half with a 1-0 lead.

John Thomas also turned in a magnificent performance in goal. Millersville outshot WC 20-10, but Thomas was able to make an incredible 15 saves. He was able to come through consistently in clutch situations. His play was not only a key in giving WC a halftime lead, but he was able to make several saves to keep the team close late in the game.

Millersville was finally able to score on Thomas in the second half, scoring back to back goals to take a lead they would never relinquish. The Sho'men were unable to muster any offense in the second half, taking only two shots on goal. The Millersville goalkeeper shut the door on both opportunities, and WC went down to their fourth straight defeat.

Coach Bowman was able to give the entire team some playing time in Saturday's scrimmage against the WC alumni. Despite losing the game by a score of 2-1, Bowman allowed each player to showcase his talents on the field. Mike Bishop was the team's offense once again, scoring his second goal in as many games. The Sho'men peppered the goal with twelve shots, including seven in the first half. The alumni only managed three shots in the game, yet they were able to cash in on two of the opportunities to win the contest.

The team has yet to play a conference game, instead taking on two Division I schools and two Division III powerhouses. They hope to use this experience to their advantage as conference play begins in the St. Mary's game. Despite their performance up to this point, the team remains confident that they can show their true form and contend for the title in the MAC.

Field hockey defeats Wesley for first win of season

by Jennifer Stickney
Reporter

The field hockey team tasted both the thrill of victory and the agony of defeat this past week. The team defeated Wesley 1-0 last Wednesday, then lost to Fairleigh Dickinson University by a score of 4-0 on Saturday. The team remained one game under .500 with a 1-2 record.

The team played a solid game on September 13th in their victory at Wesley. Senior Carole Reece scored the lone goal of the game in the second half, driving a penalty shot past the Wesley goalie. The penalty was called on the goalie, and the call heightened the tension between the two teams.

The Wesley players were unsuccessful in their desperate attempt to even the score, and the field hockey team celebrated their first victory of the 1989 regular season.

The next game was held at Fairleigh Dickinson University, and the team played well. Unfortunately, the team's performance was unable to overcome the wet weather, flooded field and the FDU squad. The team lost the third game of the year 4-0, dropping the team back below .500.

FDU players flooded freshman goalie Brigid DeVries with one shot after another during the first half. scoring at the 25:09 and 21:16 marks. The team only managed one shot during the first half, leaving the score at 2-0 at the midway point of the game.

WC returned from halftime rejuvenated and full of energy. Washington's offense, led by Kris Phalen, Jenifer Blenckstone and Amy Tiehel, peppered their opponent's goal with shots. Despite outshooting Fairleigh Dickinson 10-5, the team was never able to dent the net. FDU pushed two more shots past DeVries, and the team was never able to close the deficit. Despite the team's solid performance, the game ended with the score 4-0.

Despite the loss, Diane Guinan was happy with the team's performance. "We did see some positive signs - people were moving better and covering better. There was also an increase in intensity along with better team play," Guinan stated.

The team is practicing hard this week for their upcoming games. They continue their road trip with a game this Saturday against Elizabethtown. Coach Guinan and the players hope that their recent game experience will pay off and allow them to even their record.

Praying for joy in Mudville

by Brett Lankford
Sports Editor

The rains came to Chestertown today, and I was caught in the downpour. While wading over to the the gym, I made the unfortunate discovery that I was standing ankle deep in mud. If any town has earned the right to the name Mudville, this eastern shore haven has. I began to reflect what would bring joy to this resident of Mudville. The answer is amazingly obvious.

If only the Orioles were to win the American League East, most of Mudville would be overjoyed. So would most of Baltimore, most of Maryland, and any human being who loves fairy tales. The only thing that stands in the way of happiness in Mudville is Canada's gift to the American League, the Toronto Blue Jays.

Please don't get me wrong. Ordinarily I have no problem with the Blue Jays. It's just that at the present time the Blue Jays are the most annoying thing to come from our northern neighbor since Michael J. Fox.

The contrast between the two teams is amazing. The Orioles are all that is pure and enjoyable about baseball. They play in an old stadium on natural grass. They have an ornithologically correct bird on their cap. Their slogan is "You gotta be there." They have a team full of young, hungry players. Their home run leader eats Fruit Loops for breakfast every day. Their ace out of the bullpen is just out of college plays Nintendo and makes $68,000 a year. This is the most lovable non-Cub team in years.

The Blue Jays are at the opposite end of the spectrum. They play on artificial turf. The games are played in a place called the SkyDome that is only slightly larger than the Taj Mahal and contains everything short of a nuclear warhead. Their slogan is "You can only be here if you are willing to spend a large sum of money." One of their home run leaders marched out of camp last year because the manager wouldn't let him play the field. Their ace out of the bullpen makes over a million a year and is nicknamed "The Terminator". That's not lovable. If they didn't have a starting outfielder named Mookie, there would be almost nothing to like about this team.

The Orioles have captured the hearts of millions of baseball fans across the country, and an AL East title would be the greatest thing to happen to Baltimore since the arrival of the manatees at the National Aquarium. The Orioles are God's team– the Blue Jays weren't even a team until twelve years ago. If Toronto does ignore my pleas, continues to win extra-inning games and eventually captures the AL East, I can assure you of one thing. There will be no joy in Mudville, or at least my section of the town.

Volleyball shows promise in tourney

by Kathy Brewster
Reporter

The women's volleyball team played very well this past week, finishing with a 2-3 record. The team defeated Marymount and St. Mary's last Wednesday, then made an excellent showing in Saturday's Gettysburg Tournament.

The women impressed coach Penny Fall with their hard work, dedication and desire to overcome their injury problems. With the injury of senior setter Sharon Orser, Coach Fall was forced to revamp her lineup and place some players in unfamiliar positions. The loss of Orser has caused problems, but Laurie McClellan has stepped in and performed well in her absence. The team hopes to have Orser practicing again in two weeks and ready for the team's upcoming tournament.

Coach Fall stated that this season's schedule is one of their toughest in years. In an effort to prepare for their challenging season, Fall requested to play the toughest pool at the Gettysburg Tournament.

"It was an excellent opportunity to play good volleyball, even though we lost all three games. They all took a long time to finish and the pressure lifted our level of play," stated Fall. The losses came at the hands of Salisbury St., Albright, and Gettysburg, but the long matches showed the team's desire to win. The Salisbury match alone took over two hours to complete. The setting of McLellan, the middle blocking of captain Debbie Cohn and the back line coverage of Valerie Williams were key in the team's sterling defensive play.

Coach Fall stated that these losses were not at all disappointing, and the team performed admirably even in defeat. "These matches told me a lot about our team and our potential for the upcoming year," Fall said. The season continues this week with a dual match against Hood and the College of Notre Dame, then play a match against Dickinson on Saturday.

Rec Sports Update

by Deeann Pinczok
Rec Sports Writer

The Rec Sports program began intramural football with the men's games last Thursday, September 14th. On Thursday the two top seeded teams were able to hold onto their positions by defeating their opponents. Pseudo Lambda scored a 25-0 win over Alpha Rejecta, while Salt and Budha defeated the KA's 28-0. The Dawgs fell to No Name by a score of 10-8, and Hard & Clueless beat the Multi-Offenders 15-12. The women's games were scheduled to begin on Tuesday the 19th, but the games were rained out and will be rescheduled. Both men's and women's games are scheduled for Thursday, September 21st.

XTC's new release, "Oranges and Lemons:" an upbeat album for the open-minded

by Julian Kirtley
Album Critic

"Oranges and Lemons," the latest album by XTC, has been selling very well, which is not surprising, given the quality of the album. What is surprising is that the England based group has been making albums together for SEVENTEEN years, and until very recently, has received neither the attention of the critics, nor of the public.

This is surprising, because they are damn good. A reason for their relative anonymity is they don't tour. They never have, and according to the band's lead songwriter, Andy Partridge, they never will.

Because the band members see each other only occasionally to record albums, and then go back to private, quiet lives, they have managed to stay together as a group for quite a long time. On the down-side, these separations have made it very difficult for the band to accumulate much of a following either in England or the US. Fortunately, this began to change a few years ago when the band released "Skylarking," and accumulated a small following. Rather than following up on their success, however, they temporarily retired XTC and became... the Dukes of Stratosphear!

The Dukes are XTC's Psuper-Psychedelic alter-ego band. Under the guise of the Dukes, the members feel free to experiment wildly with head-spinningly complex music. Some of these experiments work better than others, but it makes for extremely interesting listening for the very small number of listeners adventurous enough to purchase "25 O'clock," or "Psonic Psunspot," the Dukes' two albums.

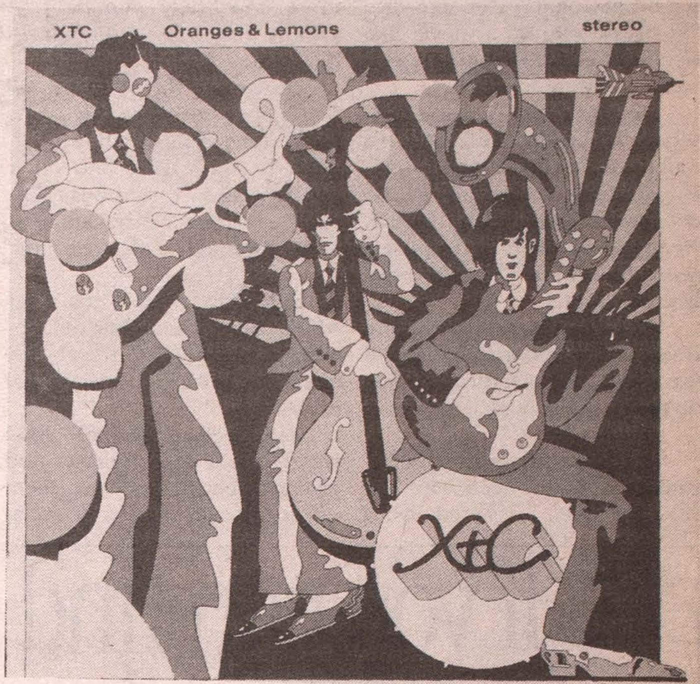
Those familiar with "Skylarking" may at find "Oranges and Lemons" rather unfamiliar. The droning melodies and ambiguous imagery of "Skylarking" have, for the most part, been replaced by more upbeat rhythms and slightly more conversational lyrics. As a whole, the album seems a lot more spontaneous. As always, the band presents an optimistic, but slightly sardonic view of the world, as in the song "The garden of Earthly delights" (about, you guessed it, the Earth), which informs us, "This is your life, and you do what you want to do, just don't hurt nobody, 'less of course they ask you."

The band has even put what I guess you would have to call a political song on this album, expressing their opinion of our current administration. The song is called, "Here comes president Kill Again." Also evident is the strong influence on the band (admittedly) by The Beatles. Even the cover will remind Beatles fans of "Yellow Submarine." To sum up, this is a highly worthwhile album for today's open-minded individual.

XTC is one of the best bands going nowadays; we should encourage them. Buy this album.



1975 Sophie Kerr recipient returns to read poetry

by Stephanie Hess
Arts Editor

Washington College graduate, and 1975 winner of the Sophie Kerr Prize, William "Chappy" Bowie will return to the campus on Monday to read from his poetry. Bowie's reading will open the Monday Series: Talks of Matters Worthy and Curious, held weekly in the O'Neill Literary House.

After graduating from Washington College, Bowie , an English major, went on to the University of Arkansas for his MFA in poetry, and later sold a manuscript to Veiled Horn Press. The manuscript was a collection of poems entitled Before the Statue of a Laughing Man. Dissatisfied with the manuscript, he withdrew it before publication. He now has a second manuscript ready to send, entitled, Topiary Hair, which contains "bits and pieces" of the first manuscript.

Two years ago, in January of 1988, the Washington College print shop put out a Broadside of Bowie's poem "Hunting Pheasant in Kansas." A copy of the poem, which hangs in its Broadside form in the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, follows this article.

A native of Cambridge Massachusetts, Bowie taught at the University of Arkansas, and several community colleges, and now runs an independent publications company in Baltimore.

When asked about his poetry, Bowie explained that it is half formal, half blank (or free) verse. Robert Day, Creative Writing Instucter, described Bowie's work as "charming, witty, and intellectually adventuresome."

Though he has not had the time to plan what he will read on Monday, Bowie was able to say that he will read 12 or 15 of his own poems and possibly a love poem by Philip Larkin , who Bowie asserts "was wonderful at inventing forms...as a technician he was unparallelled." He added that he wants to read poetry by another favorite, either Henri Coulette or L.E. Sissman, both poets whom he holds in high regard, but whose works are out of print.

Bowie will begin reading at 4:30 PM in the O'Neill Literary House; tea will be served at 4 PM prior to the reading.

Hunting Pheasant in Kansas

Ward Sullivan, d. 1985

Two telephone wires run out of sight, in either direction, the one slung under the other, they rise until they reach a pole and drop away, over and over, each like a head nodding away

yes! And yes, the beads of ice strung out across the lines were like the beads polished for an abacus.

Six birds that day for you, and one for me. But where we walked into a slough, behind us, in the glare:

only the snows erasure.
It looked as if we'd come striding down through the air into a world built from primary colors. -Sun and sky both washed, and when out of the snow, driven by red, the cock and hen

in a blur of noise, burst upwards out of a plum thicket, we saw it -a first still unassembled spectrum.

Campus events: this week's preview

Sept. 22, 24, 25

This weekend the Washington College Film Series presents Heathers, an independent film directed by Michael Lehmann. A black comedy that satirizes American youth, and stars Winona Ryder and Christian Slater, Heathers is reviewed on page 10.

Friday 22

49 Reasons plays their own special brand of high energy progressive rock in the Coffee House tonight from 9 PM to 1AM. Cost is two dollars at the door. Come hear their new sound and see their new band members.

Saturday 23

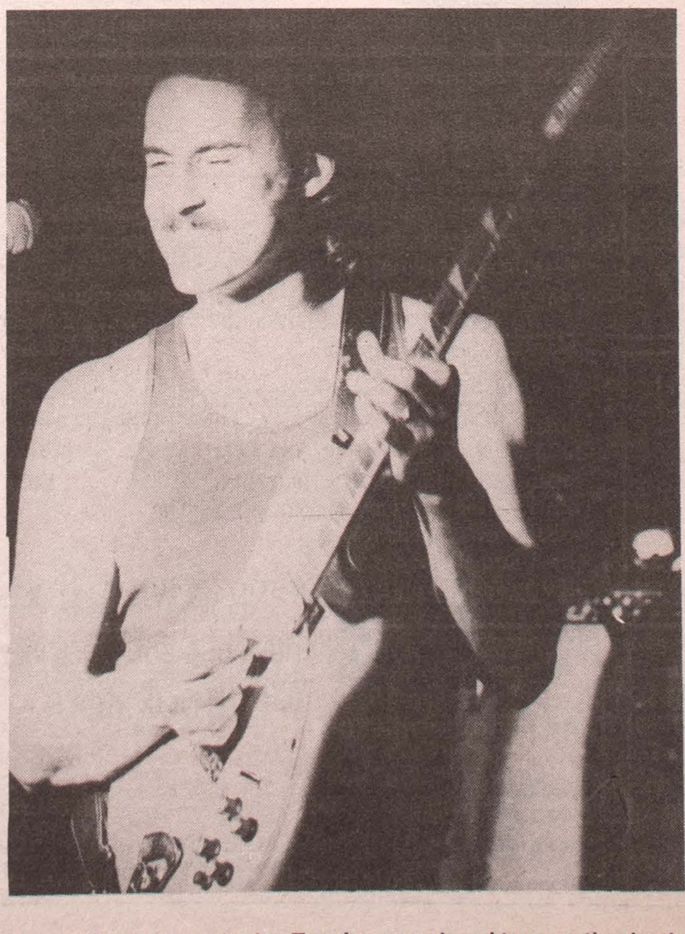
The annual Theta Chi Softball Tournament is scheduled for Saturday afternoon, but if the rain continues, will be rescheduled. Saturday night, the Thetas will be sponsoring a party in Dorchester. The party will go on, with or without the rain.

Monday 25

The Monday Series:Talks of Matters Worthy and Curious, opens this year with a poetry reading by Washington College graduate, William C. Bowie. Bowie was the 1975 winner of the Sophie Kerr Prize, and has published a book of poetry. A related article appears on this page. Tea will be served in the Literary House at 4 PM prior to the reading at 4:30.

Wednesday 27

This year's first Bach's Lunch, presented by the Music Department, will be held at 12:30 PM under the elm. The raindate is October 13.



WC's favorite blues guitarist, Tom Larsen, played to an enthusiastic crowd last Friday night in the Coffee House.

Heathers: teen angst with a body count

by Timothy J. Madison
Film Critic

In an age of self-pitying teen dramas (Dead Poets Society) and self-congratulatory teen comedies (fill in the blank), a movie like Heathers should come as a welcome breath of fresh air.

Heathers' vision of the high school hierarchy has about as much in common with John Hughes films as The River's Edge does with Back to the Future. Heathers is a satire in the purest sense of the word-a blackly comic satire at that.

The film is of such a rare breed that is unfortunate that it is not more successful at making its point.

The film centers around Veronica, a likable teen who has recently been accepted as a member of the most powerful clique in Westerburg High.

With the exception of Veronica, the clique is composed of three impossibly popular and artfully bitchy girls all named Heather.

These are the stereotypical rich snobs who play croquet when they aren't doling out humiliation to obese girls and other sundry geeks. Veronica is rightfully conscience-stricken, but feels powerless to stop the girls.

Enter J.D.: a super-cool loner with decidedly anarchist tendencies, who falls for Veronica and entangles her in his web of social revenge.

J.D. decides the only good Heather is a dead Heather and promptly begins knocking them off in his own version of social Darwinism. "The extreme always makes an impression," says J.D., and director Michael Lehmann seems to agree.

Among their assorted homicides, Veronica and J.D. gun down Westerburg's quarterback and linebacker and then frame it to look like a homosexual suicide pact. Much of Heathers revolves around society's emotionally anemic response to teen suicide.

At the same time, the film also toys with the inherently cruel nature of teen social jockeying.

The humor is supposed to spring from J.D.'s radical response, but this is an apocalyptic black comedy in the most extreme sense of the word-when J.D. reveals his ultimate plans to annihilate the student body of Westerburg, he maniacally proclaims it "a Woodstock for the eighties."

What makes Heathers difficult to palate is its lack of focus; any satire which asks the audience to accept such a black approach had better make it clear what is being satirized.

Daniel Waters' screenplay never seems quite clear on what it wants to be or who it wants to blame.

As a basic premise, Heathers probably sounded great on paper, but the more insightful jokes in the film end up being weighed down by the body count.

As Veronica, Winona Ryder continues to be one of the most likable and least irritating of teen actors.

Doing an only slightly subdued Jack Nicholson impression, Christian Slater systematically steals scenes as the relentless J.D.

These two actors are one of the main reasons Heathers gets as far as it does and both should be commended for not being sucked down by the film's confused undertow.

It should be acknowledged that one of the reasons that Heathers does not succeed is that it takes so many risks.

Heathers is nothing if not a subversively funny and genuinely disturbing film.

What the film lacks in coherence, it almost makes up for with nightmarish style. Unfortunately, the extreme does not always make the right impression and no amount of style can make up for that.

Middendorf Scholars

According to an announcement from the Washington College Administration this week, two of the College's most deserving undergraduates, Michael McGinniss of Milford, Delaware, and Catherine Smithmyer of Queenstown, Maryland, are the 1989-90 recipients of one-year scholarships established last year through an endowment gift from Baltimore's Middendorf Foundation.

The scholarships awarded under the College's Middendorf Scholars Program are worth $6,000 each.

The Middendorf Scholars Program is intended to recognize and reward Washington College students who have demonstrated superior scholastic achievement and exemplary leadership within the student body. These scholarships, awarded to rising seniors each year, are considered one of the highest academic honors to be conferred upon an undergraduate student at Washington College.

Michael McGinniss, an English major intending to enter law school next fall, has a superlative scholastic record. A perennial Dean's List student, he was the recipient of the Fox Medal (freshman year), the Alumni Medal (sophomore year), and the Visitors and Governors Medal (junior year) for having the highest cumulative grade point average of his class. He was also the recipient of Sophie Kerr and Beneficial-Hodson scholarships. He has served on the executive board of the College's Writers Union and was peer adviser for two years.

He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel McGinniss of Milford.

Catherine Smithmyer, an English major interested in working with either emotionally disturbed children or juvenile delinquents, intends to enroll in the education block at Washington College after graduation and hopes to do graduate work in psychology. A Dean's List student, she writes short stories and is a member of Christian Youth Fellowship.

Smithmyer, who has commuted to college from here Queenstown home in previous years, says the scholarship will enable her to live in Chestertown while concentrating on her studies. "I have five little brothers and sisters at home, and with the Chester River Bridge closing at nights, it would have been difficult for me to stay late to use the computers and the library," she says.

She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John R. Smithmyer of Queenstown.

Internship offered to students

Oak Ridge Science and Engineering Research Semester (ORSERS) is offering Washington College juniors and seniors an opportunity to do hands on research at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL) in Tennessee during the academic year.

ORSERS is part of a nationwide effort by the US Department of Energy to increase the quality and quantity of students preparing for careers in science, mathematics and engineering.

Participants become members of research teams engaged in long range, intensive investigations employing advanced facilities and equipment. Fields of study include artificial intelligence, biomedicine, chemistry, environmental and life sciences, computing and telecommunications, physics, mathematics and engineering.

While the emphasis of the program is hands on research, ORSERS also includes an educational enrichment component. Participants attend seminars and symposiums sponsored by the division at ORNL and have the option of enrolling in a laboratory approved course at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville or one of the nearby colleges. Students are also encouraged to arrange for the granting of academic credit by their home institutions for the research semester.

To be eligible for participation in ORSERS, students must be 18 years of age, have completed the sophomore year at an accredited US college or university, and be a US citizen or permanent resident alien. They must be working toward a degree in computer science, engineering, environmental or life sciences, mathematics or physical sciences. Guidelines suggest an overall gradepoint average of 3.0 or higher, based on A=4.0 scale.

While in the program ORSERS participants will receive a weekly stipend of $200 per week, free housing, and travel reimbursement for relocation to the appointment site.

According to National Science Foundation studies, by the year 2000 the United States will not have enough scientists and engineers to meet its needs.

According to Friedman, "Manpower projections for all types of scientists and engineers show the future demand for these specialists to be much greater than the supply. Experts contend that the gap is widening to serious, if not critical levels."

For more information on the ORSERS program contact Ernestine Friedman, ORSERS Program Manager, Science/Engineering Education Division, Oak Ridge Associated Universities, PO Box 117, Oak Ridge, TN 37831-0117.

Application deadline for the 1990 spring semester is October 20. The 1990 fall term deadline is March 15, 1990.

This past Labor Day the Beta Omega chapter was hard at work raising money for the Muscular Dystrophy Association. Chapter President Mike Jenkens, Historian Jon Longest, and Don Diefendorf traveled to TV station WBOC in Salisbury to work on the telethon. The three answered phones for four hours and raised a pledge total of over $2,000. In addition, Jenkens went on the air and presented a check for $250 on behalf of the chapter, and made a commitment to raise the total to at least $1,000 before year's end. Both the chapter and WBOC are already anticipating next year's telethon.

past four years. Albers cites that the number of full-time student increased without a corresponding increase in faculty, which can lead to problems.

A "lopsided" increase puts heavier demands on professors, thereby putting more pressure on them in grading tests, quizzes and papers, with less commentary and personal attention.

Thus, attention outside of class becomes limited. For instance, advising and critiques on senior theses may suffer on the part of the faculty member.

"Additional demands are placed on a teacher by increased enrollment and these demands may have an adverse effect on the other responsibilities of the faculty," he stated.

The solution lies in additional faculty members. "An increase in the number of faculty could enhance the art of teaching," Albers wrote.

He and the SAB also recommended a greater variety in curriculum. This would allow for special topics which students request , less trouble with overcrowding in classes and in arena registration.

A third area of concern was with school financial reports.

"We find that in the past four years there has been a 47% increase in revenues from tuition and fees while only a 16.5% increase for instructional expenditures. Additionally there has been a 53% increase in total revenues while only a 32.5% increase of total education and general expenditures. These numbers do not include expenditures on debts, pensions, health insurance, or negative revenues from room and board." Financial aid increased 41%, which means, he said, that the school now "pays" for quality students.

Albers concludes by comparing Washington College with other schools. He found it "lagging behind".

He stated, "The physical appearance of the school has been greatly improved by generous donations from people who desire to help the College. Perhaps these philanthropists would be willing to endow a chair for a department they find especially important."

Bishop, Director of Computing, and Jay Meranchik, Audio/Visual Director. The proposal explored the feasibility of the project from a technical aspect.

One suggestion explained in the report is the possibility of the college negotiating a contract with Simmons Cable in order to offer channels from the cable network. A video distribution system on campus would allow the campus to choose from a selection of channels offered from Simmons Cable and the satellite. The written report listed possible educational and entertaining stations that could be received via satellite. Science educational, language educational, international programming, teleconferencing, and other entertainment stations are possible options for channel selection.

According to Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, the financing of the project depends on the response from the college's proposal for the National Endowment for Humanities Grant. The College is expecting a positive reply concerning the grant, yet if the grant request is denied, the administration is willing to explore other possibilities for the financing of the project.

President Cater commented that he is interested in the students' response on the campus satellite station proposal.

The campus is now open to both individual dealings with Simmons Cable Company and the possible solution of acquiring a college owned satellite system. The suggestion of the campus to have cable television in the dorms will be determined by Simmons Cable's willingness to begin plans for cable installation and to cooperate with the college administration. Input of student and faculty concerning the proposal of the satellite station on campus is needed if the project will ever advance.

Another big change with the SGA Constitution involves the Student Conduct Council. According to the SGA Parliamentarian, Stuart Neiman, changes revolve around the philosophy that any infraction committed against the College is in fact a crime against the whole College community. Therefore, all aspects of the campus should be represented. As of this year there are five members of the SCC. The representatives will include Director of Athletics Geoff Miller representing the Administration, and Professor Edward Weissman representing the faculty, as well as one senior, one junior and one sophomore.

According to its executive officers, the SGA is an organization that is deeply dedicated to the advancement of this institution. The leadership of the officers of the SGA this year is intended to build a solid groundwork that will continue to benefit the College community.

Sports hall of fame

The Kent County News reported last week that five athletes will be honored at the Washington College Athletic Hall of Fame ceremonies on Friday, October 6.

Don Chatellier has been a member of the Athletic Department since 1955 and is currently active as a crew coach. He has coached a number of outstanding track teams and was actively involved with cross country. Chatellier will receive a special award at the ceremony.

Allen Rayfield Kirby grew up in Chestertown and eventually starred as a guard in Washington College football in the early 1940's.

From the past: "Little Joe" Ingarra was a starring Washington College Football and baseball player in 1949-50. Clayton McGran was also a football and baseball player, though years earlier from 1923 to 1925.Bill Smith was a basketball and baseball player in 1937.

Congratulations to Jonas White and Karu Wiesenbaugh for winning the wool blankets September 20th during the blanket giveaway. The blankets were donated by Habeck and Zaitz Food Brokerage Firm. Thanks a lot to Haback and Zaitz Food Brokerage for making the prize giveaways possible.

This Wednesday evening we will be having "Recipes From Home". Recipes from home consist of recipes sent to us from the incoming freshman students. We started this program over the summer with hopes of making the transition from home cooking to ours easier. The response was really great. Hopefully, in the near future we will be continuing this program. Please feel free to give us some in put on the different recipes that will be served throughout the semester. I hope that everyone will have a great week.

Asbestos levels may pose danger in Tawes

by Tracey Connell
News Editor

The Washington College Administration recently engaged the services of an independent consulting firm, O'Neill Banks, to test levels of asbestos in Tawes Theater. At press time, administrators stated that the results would be released by this afternoon, and a meeting with students should take place at the beginning of next week.

President Cater stated that the firm was engaged after a review of the situation by the executive council. According to Cater, the College intends to deal with the possible threat "as effectively as possible. We wanted to be sure that no false alarm is set off. It is easy to start a scare on campus, so we want to address concerns."

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, is the presiding administrator. He stated that asbestos is often found in the form of insulation for purposes of fire prevention, but otherwise there "is a lot of asbestos in our environment." Brake pads in automobiles is an example.

A dangerous situation requires very high levels of "friability," a reading based on the number of particles in the air. According to Baer, long-term exposure is another factor.

Previous surveys of the theater failed to turn up damaging levels of the material. Dangerous levels have been discovered elsewhere on campus in the past: for example, asbestos was removed from Dunning Hall when it was renovated.

Last week, tests were conducted to determine the level of asbestos in the air at the theater. A hygienist from O'Neill Banks noticed particles of asbestos on the stairs and on walls in the backstage area and recommended that drama students as well as maintenance be warned not to "sweep in that area." No recommendation was made to cease operations there.

Baer stated that the theater is currently considered "safe" and there should be "no problem with its continued use."

Students are nevertheless concerned. Senior Alistair Paget is one student who has spent "a lot of time there over the past four years." He stated that students have noticed the dust before and now are not sure just how much of it is asbestos. He added that "the dust gets moved around a lot."

Paget did commend the Patient escapes from local facility

by Ed Schroeder
Reporter

On Sunday night, September 6th, freshman Lisa Woodcock was walking from a friend's room in Wicomico to her room in Minta Martin when a 6'2" black man dressed in a green hospital gown raced by her. Seconds later two of the Kent County Upper Shore Psychiatric Facility security personnel knocked her over in attempt to capture the escapee. The incident has sparked controversy over what, if any, security measures should be taken by the College and the Facility.

Woodcock says that when she looked up from the squatting position into which she was compelled, she saw that four men were standing over the patient. While tremendous care was given to the apprehension of the escapee, little attention was given to Woodcock, who was pushed aside during the pursuit and capture.

"As I walked away [across the street towards Minta Martin], I saw that they threw him in a car and drove off. It was as if I hadn't even been there," she stated.

After a reportedly sleepless night, Woodcock and her friends went first to the Chestertown Police Station to report what had happened. According to Woodcock, the officer she spoke with said she had valid reason for Council uniting greek efforts reorganized

by Julie Schram
Reporter

In an attempt to bridge the gap between campus Greek organizations and the Administration, the Inter-Fraternity Council (IFC) has been revamped under the organization of Stuart Neiman, Student Government Association Parliamentarian.

Neiman met with the presidents and representatives of the fraternities and sororities September 13.

Only Frank Crivelli, President of Phi Sigma Kappa, was absent due to his own fraternity meeting, where it was subsequently decided to disband that fraternity and not to seek reinstatement.

The council met to discuss ideas and set up a nonconflicting social calendar. Neiman is optimistic about the council. "I can honestly see it happening," he said, "There was a lot of excitement generated at the meeting."

Neiman will act as the SGA representative and liaison at the biweekly meetings. To avoid animosity between the Greek organizations, the IFC is designed as a kind of "sounding board" where decisions will be made. There will be no chairperson and no discussion of internal fraternity or sorority affairs, unless it pertains to the campus as a whole.

Steve Attias, SGA President and member of the Kappa Alpha order, sees the reorganization of the IFC as a good idea. "It [Greek and campus unity] was part of my platform. Stu wanted to handle this, and I think he'll do a good job."

The IFC meetings will be held every other Wednesday, but will be closed, according to Neiman, until further notice.

Cable deadlines

by Sharon Bonner
Reporter

Simmons Cable Company is planning to meet with the College in the beginning of October. The reason for Simmons' absence from the last scheduled meeting was due to complications from the weather.

Remarked Cinda Benney, System Manager for Simmons Cable, "The College is not at fault for this part of the problem. We take responsibility for our shortcomings in handling the project. This is our busiest time of year and it has been very difficult to make everything run smoothly."

According to Simmons, another complication in the project is that the College requested that the poll lines between Campus Avenue and the fire lane be removed in order to beautify the campus area.

At this time the College is waiting for a written proposal to be submitted by Simmons Cable explaining the plan for the reinstallation of cable in Minta Martin, Cullen, Reid Hall, and Cardinal dorms. The cable wires previously installed in these dorms were destroyed during renovation.

This proposal will specify the cost of the underground feederline and cost of post wiring. Post wiring, the wiring of cable lines on the inside of the buildings, requires the redesigning of system maps for the dormitory area in order to make certain that no signal loss will occur.

Although no proposal has been officially written, the de-

Convocation needs student input

Fall Convocation at Washington College has a history checkered with successes and failures, most falling into the latter category. Still, the ceremonies of the past three years show that this much-maligned event is beginning to show vague signs of life.

Convocation in 1987 was rather dismal; I remember nothing of it, save the fact that Tawes Theater was embarrassingly barren, and that I was there only to see a friend receive an award. Probably my poor recall is indicative of the inspiration sparked by that event.

In 1988, Convocation was the polar opposite of the previous year. Unfortunately, it was also conducted in bad taste. "Student leaders," which included a good portion of the campus, received letters informing them that they and their staff or constituents would be "recognized" at Convocation; the letter essentially stated that students should attend to avoid the embarrassment of not being present when their names were called.

Of course, Tawes Theater hosted a standing room only crowd last year, and Convocation was deemed a success on a grand scale by administrators. Yet, the ceremony itself was anything but ceremonious: President Cater hurriedly reeled off a list of names of "leaders," who didn't know whether to remain seated, stand, or wave.

Fall Convocation this year indisputably rose above its predecessors. Sure, there were empty seats, but the event was tastefully and smoothly carried out. Student leaders and sports figures were awarded citations instead of hearing their names hastily read from a list (though I can't help thinking that the SGA might be more deserving of a citation in the spring, when it will have actual—as opposed to promised—accomplishments to cite).

Still, Convocation is far from perfect; most students realize this, but are at a loss as to what specifically is needed to improve it. The answer lies in the choice of keynote speakers. Most students were unable to relate to Mr. Bloch's address this year; as important as science and its economical ramifications are, it is not an immediate concern to students who want to earn their degrees before tackling the world's economy. I can think of a million things I'd rather hear addressed instead of the economy; I'd rather be advised about the bleak ecological future of this planet (the economy won't matter much when the environment's destroyed). Students want to attend a Convocation geared to their interests, with speakers who will address their concerns.

Although committees aren't the answer to every problem on campus, maybe it's the solution here. As always, student involvement can improve any unsatisfactory situation; we should be consultants in recruiting keynote speakers to assure that we'll hear from people who will speak to us, not at us.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Editorial Board.

All letters to the editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

More lighting, new locks would improve security

To the Editor:

I realize that I am a new student at Washington College and as such, I have no previous knowledge of the students' views regarding security. Yet in spite of that fact, I wish to address some security problems I've seen during the last few weeks here. Normally, I don't walk into new surroundings and start criticizing it, however, an experience one of my friends had Sunday night has opened my eyes - and has somewhat frightened me.

Sunday night at around 9:30, my friend was walking from my room in Wicomico to hers in Minta Martin. Suddenly, she heard footsteps behind her; she turned around only to nearly be knocked down by a huge man in a hospital gown. Before she had a chance to regain her composure four men ran past her, knocked her down, tackled the gentleman in the gown, and handcuffed him.

Understandably, my friend was terribly frightened, and when she told me, so was I. Monday, we found out that this "hospital gown man" was an escapee from the Kent County Mental Health Facility about 1/2 mile from campus. This fact upset both of us more, but what was more concerning was that such situations are far from rare.

Perhaps this situation was extraordinary. Maybe it will never happen again. Or maybe it will. I can't predict the future but I can say-with some certainty-that security measures at W.C. can't help but invite trouble-no matter what the situation.

For example, the lighting here on campus is-shall we say-not very bright. The area between West Hall and the library is only lit by 1 globe on the basement door of West and 1 pair of lights by the library door. After dark, that area is so pitch black that it's hard to see even the sidewalk. Considering the condition of that sidewalk-not seeing it is pretty dangerous. The walkway from Smith Hall to Rte 213 is only lit by two poles in front of Middle Hall and all along Route 213 isn't even lit. Lighting is probably the single most effective security measure-ANYWHERE-not just Chestertown or WC. I propose lighting every walkway on campus.

The second security measure-which needs strengthening here is locks. I know that "all girl" dorms are locked by security. I assume this measure is to keep unwanted visitors out. Open windows in the basement don't really help to keep such visitors out-neither do doors which are propped open by wooden blocks. My second proposal is to install AUTOMATIC LOCKS on every dormitory-male and female. These locks would only open when a student inserts an ID card into the lock. That way students at WC could have open access to all dorms, but those who don't belong on-campus can't get into the buildings.

I know that my views may seem like harsh ideas coming from a frightened little girl. Maybe they are, but I would rather "OVERREACT" and know my safety is sure than brush something off and regret it later.

Thank you,
Kyndra L. Ponder
Freshman

New parking regulations enforced

To the Editor:

Due to the frequent overcrowding of student vehicles in William Smith parking lot measures have been taken to reduce the problem for students, visitors, faculty and staff.

New signs have recently been posted announcing that Smith lot is now reserved for faculty, staff and visitors only from 8 A.M. to 4:30 P.M. Monday through Friday. We recommend that students park in the parking lot behind the Fine Arts Center. With increased construction on campus there is a greater need to keep this parking lot open to allow construction equipment enough room to maneuver around the construction areas.

Warnings are now being issued and ticketing will begin on Monday, October 2, 1989. We would like to thank everyone in advance for their cooperation.

CAMPUS VOICES

ISSUE: Did you attend Fall Convocation? If so, was it a success? If you did not attend, why not?

"Perhaps I instinctively flee from boredom..."

David Morrison

How does the normal and average person respond to a convocation, i.e. a summons? The typical reply surely is fulfilled as the party called upon speedily proceeds to the nearest court of law, according to the date as specified within the summons itself. Now why does this scenario not describe the overall student response as President Cater attempts to convoke the WC community?

Perhaps this so far is overly general and for that reason presumptuous. In order to avoid the absolute arrogance demanded to suppose that I can speak accurately for any segment of the student population (other than myself), let me be just bombastic enough to offer my head to the chopper; I will state for the record that I did not attend Convocation, nor have I ever done so in the past. In fact I had to do a fair amount of research before I could even begin to comprehend what Convocation here at WC entails. To be quite frank I referred to the O.E.D. in order to peruse the classic usages associated with the word 'convocation.'

Now in retrospect, after the fact– the grand convoCATER has opened the academic year– I truly believe that I have missed something rather significant. To be sure, this august ceremony– one ripe with tradition– demands the attendance of the entire student body. Why, then, did I fail to attend? I say now, for the life of me, I do not know, nor have I ever known; I simply have never been perceptive enough to respond to Mr. Cater's summons.

Perhaps I instinctively flee from boredom; after reading the Elm accounting of Mr. Cater's convocation remarks I am sure that this is the case. I do not believe that I am blind or stupid (here I leave myself open to contradiction), but in order that I fail to recognize our small campus is changing significantly– being transmogrified, if you like– I would have to be an utterly inferior bat. This being the case I would not actually see the changes that our campus undergoes; rather I would hear them and subsequently translate those self-same sounds into mental images. However, the remarks Mr. Cater provided at Convocation do seem to be of high value– that is crucial for orienting the newcomer in regard to the history and significance that the construction bears to the campus. My problem is precisely that I am tired of wallowing through mud.

As to the proposed problem of my stupidity (I believe that I have cleared up the suggestion of blindness), maybe I fail to ascribe any particular importance to the changes presently taking place on campus. Indeed to do this would be quite vacuous. In point of fact I clearly understand that the small sacrifices made by the students of today must undoubtedly lend a vital substance to that potentially thriving campus of tomorrow.

Therefore I will walk through mud, fall down, get back up soiled, and feel privileged to do so; I will smile cheerily. Yet for some strange reason I will not trudge over to the theater and attend Convocation.

David Morrison, who graduated last year, is currently enrolled in the education block at Washington College.

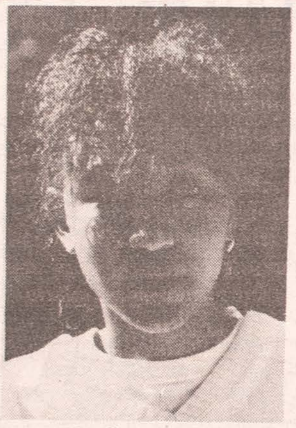
If the intent of Convocation was to solely outline the intellectual direction of the school, they succeeded. But really, weren't there more pertinent issues to address to bring together a college community? I think the key speaker underestimated the students' concerns if he felt their only interest in the sciences was for their contribution to the GNP.



India Henson

The idea of having a fall convocation to boost student morale is very good, but I can't say that Convocation accomplishes what it sets out to do. I think that Convocation needs to be made more interesting– more lively– something that really grabs the attention of the student body. Students can stay in their dorm rooms and be bored.

The traditional format was like last year, prestigious, helping to make a unified scholastic atmosphere. However, I think Cater's and Bloch's words fell on either deaf, indifferent, or sleeping ears.

Yes, I don't think Convocation was as successful as it could have been because the main speaker said his point in too many words. The main idea of Fall Convocation should be stressed more.

Yes, I went. I don't think Convocation was successful. Mr. Bloch drove his point into the ground, not home.

Students should give Fall Convocation a chance

Stuart Neiman

On Thursday, September 14, I attended what, I must admit, was my first Washington College Fall Convocation. Last year I truly wanted to attend, but like so many other WC students I had something more important to do. This year it occurred to me; the school makes so few requests of a student's free time, what could be lost by attending? In truth, I lost nothing; rather I gained a new perspective on the academic life of the College.

Perhaps seeing President Cater in a robe was what led me to this new understanding of Washington College's rich and vast history. Maybe it was the sight of the faculty, standing proudly in their gowns, displaying the colors of their field of study. Regardless of what it was, there was most definitely a feeling in the room that not even the heat could interfere with. It was a feeling that stemmed from the knowledge that I was a part of a much larger picture. Though I sat with other members of student government, I sat first and foremost as a student of liberal arts in the 10th oldest college in the United States.

In conversations following this year's Fall Convocation, I have found myself having to defend the importance of a ceremonial convocation to different students. The one thing which I have found that all of them have in common is the fact that none of them have ever attended either the Fall or Spring Convocation. They feel confident to judge, without ever having experienced the ceremony. To them I say, "at least give it a chance, if you still don't like it you can hold Washington College responsible for those two hours of your life."

Oddly enough it is often those same people who say that the College doesn't provide enough activities outside of the classroom. We all know that there is a need for more school sponsored activities, but at least give the ones which the school does make available a chance.

This Convocation seemed to be a special one, based on a rather small number of empty seats. In his remarks, President Cater addressed this fact by stating that he was indeed pleased that they were able to fill many of the once empty seats with warm, enthusiastic bodies. As is often the case, the alumni, faculty, and administration were all well represented. But this year's Convocation brought with it a large number of the newest members of the Washington College community, namely the freshman class. The freshmen, in addition to the impressive number of fraternity and sorority members present as well as other upperclassmen, helped to contribute to the true success of the evening.

Success in a Convocation is not merely determined by the number of bodies that you have in an auditorium. It must involve the feeling that the ceremony leaves in the individuals once they leave the room. Having listened to the speeches and seeing the special recognition given to those who strive to achieve the pinnacle of what Washington College stands for, I can say that I was able to leave the auditorium with a better understanding of what it means to be a student here at WC.

I can't say that everyone left the room with the same feeling, but I feel safe in saying that anyone who attended the Fall Convocation could not help but feel a part of the community as a whole.

Stuart Neiman is the Sophomore Class President.

The Mafia is waging war on Sicily

Laura Hopper
Perspectives Editor

When the name Sicily is mentioned, it conjures up images of the Godfather, the Mafia, killing, and vendettas. On a whole, the word revenge seems to sum up Sicily.

There is a war in progress on Sicily. A war very similar to the one in Colombia. A war about money and power. But in Colombia, it is almost easy to tell the difference between right and wrong. On Sicily, it is almost impossible.

On Sicily, the war is between local mafia families, the Laurettas and the Cocominis, and a very powerful family, the Corleonese. The battle is taking place in Gela.

Gela is on the southern coast of the island. Once it a small city of fishermen, farmers, and artisans. People who couldn't find jobs in Gela moved away. When a petrochemical refinery was built near Gela, thousands moved to the city hoping to find work. The city planners were unable to cope with the mass immigration, so few of those who moved to Gela have running water, electricity, or sewers. The schools are so overpopulated that the students come in shifts; and the hospital sometimes is without water, and patients go without adequate care.

The refinery, Enimont, didn't need the thousands of unskilled laborers who moved to Gela. It required highly skilled labor that was brought in from outside. Although Enimont employs 6,000 local workers, there are 15,000 people without jobs in Gela.

It would seem that there is very little worth fighting over in Gela. This is a story about killing, money, revenge, and modernization. Modernization is the biggest cause of Gela's woes. The mafia families are fighting over public contracts for three dams. At stake are millions of dollars and hundreds of lives.

On December 23, 1987, Salvatore Lauretta and Orazio Coccomini were killed. Their deaths led to series of reprisals that has lasted for nineteen months. During this time, there have been 63 murders and around 100 attempted homicides. Included among the dead are the victims of the Christmas eve massacre, Salvatore Polara, allied with the Corleonese family, his wife, and two of his children. Some have been wounded unintentionally. Ugo Liardi, the brother of the mayor of Gela, was wounded in an attempt on someone else's life.

(There are rumors this battle is also over drugs. Stories of a secret refinery, and mysterious boats that dock in Gela at night are circulating in Gela.)

The authorities on Sicily expect they will never find the people responsible for the killings. As one official put it, "they all see the murders, but no one talks about them." Why would anyone want to? The only reward would be death.

The saddest parts of this story are that they people responsible for the killings and violence, the people actually pulling the triggers are young. They are not lifetime members of the mafia. They are young people from the slums of Gela. For them, crime is the easy way out. It is a quick alternative to years of struggle. There certainly are few alternatives available to them in Gela. The other sad part is that the cause of all this bloodshed is modernization. A desire by the government to make life on Sicily, life in Gela, better. The people on Sicily who will benefit the most from modernization are not the people who live in the slums of Gela. They are the same ones who have kept the island so primitive.

THE UNITED STATES

Hurricane Hugo, one of the worst tropical cyclones in years, devastated the Caribbean Islands and Puerto Rico earlier last week. By the time it made direct hits on the South Carolina coast with almost 140 mile-an-hour winds, it was officially listed as the tenth most intense hurricane of the 137 that have ripped into the United States since the turn of the century. A dozen people died and thousands lost their homes.

THE SOVIET UNION

A new law legalizing opposition groups and giving them equal rights with the Communist Party has been drafted by a committee from the Soviet Union's legislative body, the Supreme Soviets. The legalizing of other political groups would create a multiparty government, adamantly opposed by hard-liners. The law will come up before the full legislature by the end of the month, where it is expected to meet with resistance. The proposal came in response to the burgeoning of unofficial parties in almost every republic. It would be "the most dramatic step towards democracy" since the introduction of a popularly elected Parliament in March, some say. Mikhail Gorbachev, besides saying that the introduction of a multiparty system is premature, has not taken a firm stance in favor or against the law.

COLOMBIA

Many Colombians are angered at the US for allowing the collapse of an agreement that kept up the prices of coffee—its major legal export—by setting quotas on exports. Since the international agreement was suspended two months ago, coffee prices have dropped more than 40%. The industry employs three million Colombians and creates monies for the armed forces, the building of roads, hospitals and schools. Many are worried that the rising tide of unemployment will wear away the public's support of President Barco's drug war. Money lost due to the drop in coffee prices could mean a severe decrease in military spending which makes up 14.5% of the national budget.

Minorities adjusting at Washington College

by Kate Absher
Features Editor

Washington College, dripping with 18th century America, mirrors the time period she was founded. The student body consists mostly of students with northern European ancestry; minorities make up a small minority here. Attending are ten Asians, twelve Hispanics, and eight full time blacks. Because of this lack of ethnicity, many minorities have difficulty in adjusting, others have found their niche.

On October 9, 1989, Senior Jin Kyung Pak celebrates her eighth year in the United States. To cap off this anniversary, Pak returns next summer to Korea, a land she has not seen since her arrival to the US. A Korean art book, she came upon in the library, sparked her urge to visit Korea: "The whole book brought back the forgotten Korean heritage. All of a sudden I [missed] Korea a lot."

Explaining why she forsook her Korean heritage for the US, Pak gushes forth compliments about the US educational system and how it provides opportunities for all. But when asked if she would like to continue to live in the US, her voice breaks: "I don't plan to live in America because I will always remain as alien no matter how many years I stay here."

Pak does not accept her minority status: "I never felt myself as a minority. I consider myself more of an international student than a minority student...I always consider myself a Korean diplomat." Pak holds no bitterness; she finds Americans: "very tolerating; they are willing to take anyone, especially the younger generation is more accepting. I have many friends here, and there are a few Americans here I would like to invite to Korea some day."

Sophomore Joan Koo, however, feels she has adapted well, and does not foresee any problems with continuing to live in the US: "Many places in the states are multi-cultural. I don't think I'm going to feel left out or anything." Unlike Pak, Koo yearly returns to Korea to visit her family, entrenched in the ways of Korean society. This entrenchment forces Koo to juggle her newly adopted American standards with Korean social standards: "I act differently when I'm at home than here. At home I'm more reserved, and I follow the rules of the society. Here, it is more relaxed, and I can do what I want."

Senior Laleh Malek juggles two different cultures also. Born in the US to Iranian parents, Malek returned to Iran for nine years, but in 1979 fled to the US. Malek reveals she finds it easy to cope with the homogeneous atmosphere at Washington College: "I attended a Catholic all-girls school in Baltimore where the student body consisted of maybe two or three Iranians and two or three blacks, so Washington College was not much of an adjustment." Although Malek's friends have no multi-cultural background, she dates a Washington College graduate from Jordan: "I was more able to relate to him because of his eastern background. It's not like I wasn't attracted to Mr. Blonde Lacrosse Player, but we just hit it off."

After reading Robert Sam Anson's Best Intentions, a biography of the life and death of a Harlem teenager attending Exeter Academy, freshman Tim Johnson believes he bears a strong resemblance to Edmund Perry. Like Perry, Johnson feels he is "living in two different worlds." Although Johnson is black, his parents are white: "I was adopted like [the TV show] Different Strokes when I was eight months old."

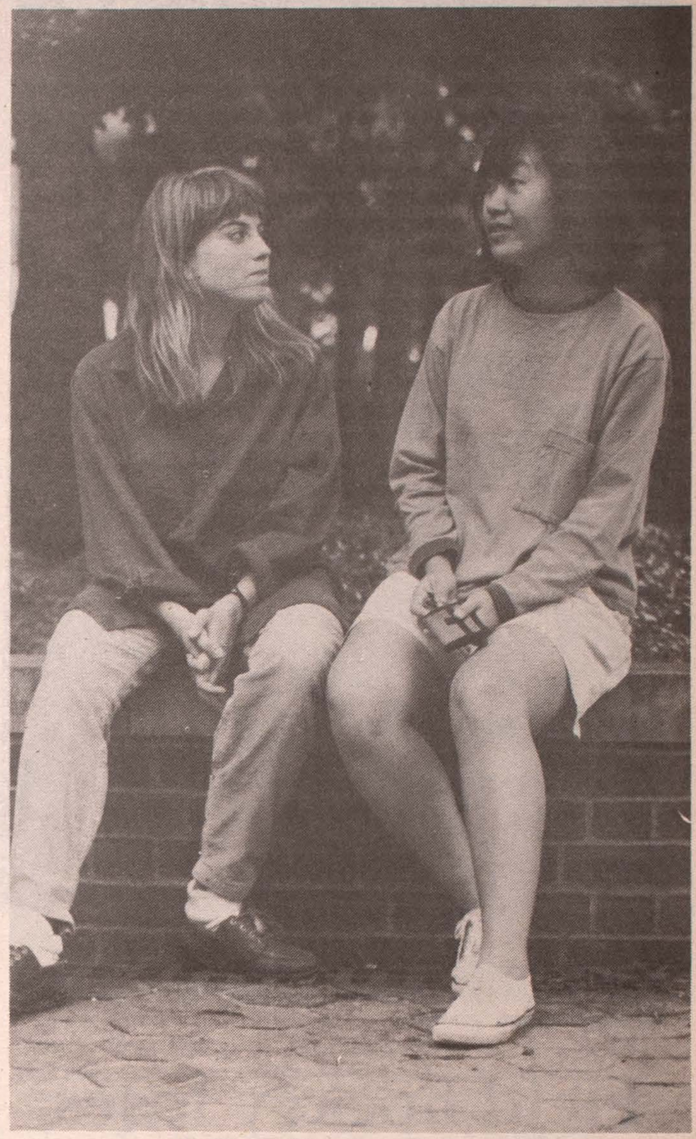
Yet while attending high school, most of his friends were black, but because of his family background, he was able to separate himself somewhat from the opinions of his black friends. Johnson explains, "I act kind of different with my black friends. White friends are more concerned with school; blacks want to play ball and pick up girls. A lot of them don't take their future seriously. I was kind of different because I went to college."

A hoodlum writhing with pain from an undercover cop's bullet represents the last image of Edmund Perry. Johnson, however, is "doing all right;" he maintains a balance between the two cultures to which he belongs.

Unlike Johnson, sophomore India Henson is not able to draw boundaries between white and black: "It all goes back to my upbringing. I can't categorize this acting black and this is not." Because her father is in the military, Henson's upbringing consisted of a very mobile childhood; she attended high school in Hawaii but graduated from high school in Aberdeen, Maryland. Her family now lives in Germany. "A guy from Salisbury said to me that [Washington College] was a predominantly white school, and you may not like it. In a military community the person across the street from you may be Korean and the person next door may be white, and I told him it wouldn't be a problem for me, and it hasn't been."

To Henson, black and white merge like her family background of Cherokee Indian, white, and black because she has never faced prejudice. "I have family that live in Tennessee. Things are still segregated— not legally but socially. . . It all depends on where the person is from ."

Heath Bethune derives from a similar background: "My parents are from South America... They didn't have to go through the Civil Rights Movement. I've been brought up to believe people are people."The senior also was brought up in a predominantly white neighborhood in Long Island, New York : "I don't follow what all the black kids do. They listen to rap; I don't like rap." Active in varsity lacrosse Bethune feels he fits well into campus life; most of his friends are lacrosse players telling him that "I'm more white than they are."



Outside Miller Library Jin Pak and Cecile Gutcher converse.

Completely opposite to this experience is freshman Dawn Israel. Israel, who is black, lives in Baltimore, and attended a high school that was "95% black." Israel, therefore, has difficulty adjusting to an primarily white college campus: "It's like going to a new planet or something. The parties are especially different. [At home] there was different music. Parties didn't have a lot of drinking in it, and we danced a lot and ate. The emphasis wasn't put on drinking as much as it is here."

Because there exists such a small minority of blacks on campus, Israel thinks "a lot of black students are trying to hide their true identity. I don't want a black clique walking around the campus. I just want them to know that I'm here."

Although he went to a primarily white high school, senior Charles "Tank" Duckett supports some of Israel's thoughts: "This school is about the way I grew up. The only think that bothers me is the numbers— because you can't establish a black social club or minority fraternity." Duckett also says that the lack of courses geared toward minorities is discouraging: "Since I've been here, I've seen blacks come and go— within a semester or two."

Duckett also senses he is living in two different worlds: "When I'm here, I'm Charles; when I'm at home, I'm Tank." At college, Duckett separates himself from his black neighborhood of Severna Park; he states he did not join a fraternity here because he could not imagine inviting his black friends to come up and party with him. Definite boundaries form themselves in Duckett's world: "If you go out and be pro-black, you can really alienate yourself. You can dig yourself a hole."

According to Duckett, the location, social life, and price of Washington College hinder minority enrollment. Kevin Coveney, Director of Admissions, adds,"We have been able to recruit minority students...Not until they come here for a campus visit do they see the lack of community."Still, Duckett yearns for a more well-rounded campus. "The only blacks you see are the people in the food service, and it's kind of a slap in the face that there can be black employees and not black administrators."

Women's tennis plays well in Division I tournament

by Fred Wyman
Men's Tennis Coach

Washington College women's tennis coach Holly Bramble was concerned that her players would be "in over their heads" at the Division I Mount St. Mary's Fall Tournament held at Emittsburg, MD over the weekend. She was very pleased with the team's performance, however, as Tracy Peel, Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice proved they were able to compete at the Division I level.

After bowing to Seton Hall's Gina Pileggi, Tracy Peel reeled off three straight victories to advance to the semifinals of the #1 singles flight consolation tournament. Peel defeated Seton Hall's Stacy Loring 6-1, 7-6 (10-8), Mary Washington's Christy Copper 6-4, 6-0 and West Virginia's Carrie King. Peel eventually lost to Howard's Anjanette McIlwan in a close match 4-6, 6-3, 6-4.

Unforced errors plagued Peel in her opening round match. The WC ace played very tentatively and was never able to find her rhythm, falling 6-3, 6-0. Her most satisfying win came over Division III rival Christy Copper of Mary Washington. Copper was nationally ranked in both singles and doubles, thus becoming the second nationally ranked player that Peel has defeated this fall.

The team of Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice were Washington College's only entry in the doubles competition. The tandem played in the #2 doubles flight, falling in their first match to a duo from St. John's 6-3, 6-2. They were able to rebound and defeat Loyola's #2 team in three sets, but were eliminated by a doubles team from West Virginia. In any case, all three players displayed poise in their performance against tough Division I competition.

Schwartz shines at Swarthmore

by Fred Wyman
Men's Tennis Coach

Sol Schwartz could not crack the top six spots on the men's tennis team as a freshman last year. The sophomore has come into his own this fall, playing well at Millersville and giving an inspired performance at Swarthmore over the weekend. Schwartz was the only WC netter to advance to the semifinals of both singles and doubles in his flight at the ninth annual Tim Berman Memorial Tennis Tournament.

Both of Schwartz's singles triumphs were three set victories. After winning only one game in the first set against George Washington's John Kraushaar, Schwartz swept the final twelve games to take the match 1-6, 6-2,6-0. In the quarterfinals, Schwartz's blistering returns and accurate passing shots enabled the lanky righthander to oust Temple's Kyle Hawthorne 6-3, 3-6, 6-3.

The eight team tournament featured four flights of both singles and doubles play, and was loaded with top players from both Division I and Division II. Host Swarthmore was the only other Division III school to participate in the tournament. George Washington, Temple and Penn State were the Division I schools participating in the two day event.

All-American Scott Read was Washington's only entry in the #1 singles flight. Read maintained his poise in upending a tenacious Lee Tucker of Swarthmore 6-7,6-4,6-3. in his first round match. Penn State's Jason Rayman came up with the big shots when he needed them, nipping Read 7-5,6-4 in the quarterfinals. Rayman went on to win the tournament without dropping a set.

Alberto Diaz had another good tournament playing in the #2 singles flight. The freshman phenom rallied to edge Millersville's Dean Edgehill 3-6,6-2,6-4 in his first match. Diaz then lost to Bloomsburg's Marc Lupinacci for the second consecutive week. This match ended with the same score of last week's match, 6-2,6-4. Diaz and Sol Schwartz were the only doubles team to win, defeating Millersville's duo 7-5,6-4. The men's tennis team continues to display an amazing amount of depth and talent during the fall season. The squad is also showing a great deal of promise for upcoming league play against Division III competition.

Field hockey loses, record drops to 1-3

by Jennifer Stickney
Reporter

For the second time in a week, Washington College's field hockey team met its opponent on foreign turf, muddied by the cold, driving rain. As a result, the Sho'men bowed to Elizabethtown 7-2 in their game last Saturday, dropping their record to 1-3.

Elizabethtown struck quickly with two goals early in the first half. The team bounced back, however, on a goal from senior Carole Reece. The goal was assisted by Jen Blenckstone at the 21:04 mark and brought the score to 2-1. For the remainder of the half, Elizabethtown bombarded goalie Brigid DeVries with shots. DeVries performed well, collecting six saves in the first half. Elizabethtown was still able to score twice before the half, extending their lead to 4-1.

Washington College improved their play in the second half, yet they were able to do little about the score. The team, led by Reece, Blenckstone and Amy Tiehel, was able to settle down in the second half. They played with renewed confidence, as well as a new-found intensity. Elizabethtown, however, continued to score, increasing their lead to 6-1. Carole Reece broke the scoring streak again, contributing her second goal of the game. This score came on a penalty stroke, closing out the scoring for WC. Elizabethtown was able to score once more before the buzzer sounded, bringing the final score to 7-2.

"What was most frustrating was that we played well considering the conditions," Coach Guinan commented. "I don't believe the score was indicative of the team's play. Elizabethtown was the stronger team, but not to the degree that the score would make it appear." The team plays Albright and Goucher this week, and they hope field conditions improve as they shoot for their second victory of the year.

Student production confronts racial issues

by Stephanie Hess
Arts Editor

Esther Diamondstone is bringing social consciousness to Washington College in the form of her senior project, a production of the play "for colored girls who have considered suicide/ when the rainbow is enuf."

Called a choreopoem by its author, Ntozake Shange, the play involves monologues in narrative poem form, connected by dialogue and dance, and performed by seven women. According to actress Emily Lott, who plays one of the seven women, the goal of the play is to "depict a black woman's struggles."

Lott added that while the play is about black women, it presents problems that are universal to all women. The women deal with their experiences with men, sex, old lovers, rape and abortion, and dance is the unifying force in which all the women, relate their feelings.

Diamondstone pointed out that while each of the characters are real people, they are universal people, who speak for each other and all women. For example, when three of the women speak about rape, the audience knows that all seven of the women have experienced rape. Diamondstone explained that the characters are "bigger than people."

One concern that Diamondstone expressed about the production is that it is a play about black women, with an all white cast. She hopes that it will not be an important issue for the audience, adding, "it would be great if I could do it with a black cast, but I can't."

She is worried that the show will fail because of the color issue, but she says "it might be a total flop, but I don't think that's a good reason not to do it." Additionally, "even if the show is a flop, if nothing else, it brings up the issues."

"The issues" of which she speaks are those involving the lives of black women and the ways in which they are treated. While she believes it is narrow to view theater only as an opportunity to educate people, she wants to raise consciousness about what it is like to be a black woman. Diamondstone admits that as a white person, she is part of the group that created the problems the women in the play face and consequently, she feels slightly uncomfortable producing the play. At the same time, as a woman, she can empathize with these women's problems.

She suspects the audience will be all white and hopes that they will develop an empathy for the women also. To achieve this, she has designed the set so that the actresses can move through the audience as they perform. While this arrangement allows very few seats, Diamondstone feels it is essential to permit audience involvement in the play.

Diamondstone has seen several productions of the play, and says she knows it better than any of the plays she was considering for her senior project. The playwright, Ntozake Shange is one of Diamondstone's heroes; Diamondstone explains that as a black woman writer, Shange is conscious of herself in a way that most people are not.

For Diamondstone, who grew up in a black neighborhood of Philadelphia and attended a public school that was 90% black, Shange and this play represent a part of her life that she misses here at Washington College.

Last year she was visual designer for Gina Braden's senior project, The Eumenides, and light designer for Leocadia. She could have used either of those jobs to fulfill her senior requirement, but instead decided to direct and design lights, sets and costumes for colored girls.

The seven women in the production are played by Wendy Kloiber, Emily Lott, Michele Volansky, Nitza Morgan, Jeanette Smith, Cindy Croot, and Carey Smith, a mix of seniors, juniors and sophomores who have had extensive experience in the theater department.

Technical Director is Alistair Paget, assisted by Thomas Andrews. Sophomore Dee Reigal is the Stage Manager.

Volansky calls colored girls " an important play...not just a play for women, about women...a play for everyone."

Says Diamondstone in conclusion, "maybe some man will go home from this and look at his daughter or his sister differently; maybe some woman will go home and look at her husband differently. If that can happen, then I will have achieved what I wanted."

"for colored girls who have considered suicide/ when the rainbow is enuf" is scheduled for next Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings at 8PM. Reserved tickets are strongly recommended and can be acquired by calling 778-2800, ext. 269.

Registrar resigns

by Jennifer Golden
Reporter

On October 13, Registrar David F. Butters will leaving to become the new registrar of Glassboro State College in Glassboro, New Jersey. Ermon N. Foster will temporarily replace him. Mr. Foster preceded Butters as Registrar; he held the job for 37 years.

Butters has made numerous contributions to the Registrar's office over the past three years. Most notable was his introduction of computer automation into the his office. Butters said that Foster realized the need for computers and "recommended someone to hire with a computer background." Butters was hired and put the school "on line" within six months.

Converting to computers takes most schools many years; Washington College was successful in six months. Butters agrees, "I'm very proud of the successful conversion. We did have some problems but we were able to monitor and correct them."

As a result of the automation, Butters stated, "The volume of information now available is enormous." Computers provide more accurate class size predictions for Admissions and can help monitor budgets.

Butters hopes to take his style of the "working manager" to Glassboro. He intends to improve the communication barrier between faculty, students and administration as well as improve his new staff's ability to deal with interruptions.

Butters stated, "most people see only our errors and the personality of our workers." He will also work with a larger student population.

His departure has received some criticism, as he is leaving in the middle of a semester. However, Butters points out that Glassboro originally wanted him to start September 1st., but he chose to stay until October– traditionally the slowest part of the semester– to ease the transition. Butters informed his superiors of his decision in May.

recent actions of the Administration. "It's good that they're keeping an eye on that. Even if they find out it's dangerous, nobody's done anything wrong. Nobody can really be blamed."

According to Baer, if results of the test show that dangerous levels of asbestos exist, then the College will be responsible for developing a plan and a timetable for removal. "There is an outside chance that we might have to close the building. But that is a worst case scenario."

All of this is in keeping with the Administration's "commitment to life safety," stated Baer.

coming down there and reporting the incident, and said that this happens a lot here in Chestertown. He stated that facility calls them "walk offs," but they should be called "run offs," and a gate or fence should be put up.

Woodcock was told by Dr. William W. Tubbman, Jr., a doctor at the facility, that the term "walk off" refers to the patients in the facility who receive a calling and feel that they themselves must leave the premises.

"They don't escape, they walk away," Tubbman stated. "Often you'll find that a patient does not want to deal with a medication or treatment, and sometimes they just leave. We really haven't had any problems with this, though, because most of our patients are harmless and they have often returned on their own."

Woodcock and her friends approached Tubbman on the issue of the hospital's security. According to Woodcock, Tubbman said that he didn't believe that a fence or a gate was necessary because this is not a prison institution; people often just feel that they have to go, so get used to it, she was told.

She was offered psychiatric therapy and a tour of the facilities, but according to Tubbman "was very set on what she wanted. And that was to lock up the patient and to fence him in."

Tubbman offered Woodcock and her friends a tour of the facility to show her that the patients were rather harmless. He mentioned that other institutions, such as Hickey, offer maximum security. This often takes away the purpose of the institution, making the inhabitants focus more on their therapy. Woodcock refused the tour.

"We have a pretty good record with this over the past few years," Tubbman said, "Three thousand admissions, one discharge and one admission on average every day."

The program that the admittees go through lasts 30 days. Through activities, the patients progress through certain activities so that they can function properly in society. After a period of time, they are given passes to go out shopping in town and to see what is around them. This hasn't resulted in any problems as of yet.

Woodcock asked the question,"If these are voluntary patients here at the hospital, why are they being chased? If they aren't voluntary, why isn't there a fence or something to slow them down? Something like they have around elementary schools."

Mr. Tubbman said in response, "These are human beings that we are treating at the psychiatric ward, trying to help their problems, not trying to put them in cages and turn them into animals."

In any event, the Washington College Security system has taken measures to increase safety of poorly secured areas on campus. Measures are being taken by Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, and maintenance to make certain nightly that all current lighting is operational. Lighting is also being considered for the north end of Kent House and the area near Wicomico as well as the walkway between Middle and East Hall (at least until the path behind Middle Hall is opened).

signs are expected to be completed and submitted to Benney by the first or second week of October. As soon as the plans are presented to the College, Simmons will proceed with the installation of cable in Caroline, Queen Annes, Kent House, Hodson Hall, East, Middle, and West dorms while waiting for the college's decision.

In the future, Simmons expects to set a day at the beginning of the next school year when the it will come to campus instead of students traveling to Simmons' office to pay their bill and get cable equipment.

Cable is expected to be installed in Caroline, Queen Annes, Kent House, Hodson Hall, and the Hill dorms by the end of October if no other significant changes occur within that time.

TABLE TALK

It is documented that the average American adult gains 1 pound per year. That does not sound like much until you figure that it adds up to a 30 pound gain by age 55. There are exciting and enjoyable approaches in order to maintain the weight gain. Just think activity. If you engage in some kind of activity you burn up calories faster than if you are inactive. Climb stairs instead of using the elevator. Eat lightly in the evening when you are least likely to be active, or take a stroll after dinner. A 30 minute walk of about a mile each day will use up 75 to 120 calories. That's enough to prevent that yearly weight gain.

Canadian filmmaker Ron Mann's third documentary about American art is a lively and informative walk through American history as seen by the eyes—and characters—of America's comic book artists. The film has wonderful newsreel footage of censors from the early 1950s, who suggested the country's youth were being corrupted by Spiderman and The Hulk. More than a film for comic book fans, this is a masterful look at American pop culture and a complex art form that has thrived despite repression and in the process created dreams that transcend generations.

Asbestos test results announced: Tawes safe

by Tracey Connell
Staff Writer

Asbestos test results have deemed the Daniel Z. Gibson Fine Arts Center safe for occupancy, according to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects.

Oneil M. Banks, of Oneil M. Banks, Inc., an accredited Industrial Hygiene and Toxicology testing laboratory, notified Baer of the results last week in a letter dated Wednesday, September 27.

Four samples were taken, two in the stage area and two in the seating area of the theater. All readings were .01 percent. This is well below the Action Level for General Industry, the Action Level for Construction and dangerous levels of air born concentration, which are all set at .10 percent.

Baer stated, "we definitely have asbestos in the Fine Arts Center. That's the bad news. The good news is, it is not dangerous." He did add that additional tests will be conducted in the shop area of the theater. "Somehow that was overlooked before." According to Baer, there may be more asbestos present in that location, but it is presently "safe."

Asbestos has been used in thousands of manufactured products for its strength, flexibility, resistance to acid and heat, and durability. It is used in cement pipes, brake linings, packing and gaskets, thermal and electrical insulation, flooring and roofing products, paper, plastic and textiles. The asbestos in the Fine Arts Center is the spray-on type, used in the past as an insulation material and fire retardant. This process, as well as all other uses, has since been outlawed by the EPA.

Though asbestos can no longer be sprayed on or installed, the law does not require complete, immediate removal. Only consistent monitoring and then removal is necessary if dangerous levels are found and it must be removed before renovation or other types of construction which may disturb it.

Asbestos is not dangerous unless its surface has become disturbed or worn and then only at certain levels in the air. At the same time, replacements are not as economical. "They just cost more," said Baer.

Related diseases are recognized as an occupational health hazard with individuals who work directly with the material, installing insulation, etc. Said Baer, "People who are involved in the industry can be affected over a long period of time."

Regulations now require Washington College to notify effected employees in writing within fifteen days. Baer said that Oneil M. Banks will conduct another survey. "We need a recommendation about what the asbestos removal plan aught to be over the next couple years."

Until that time, when asbestos is completely removed from the Fine Arts Center, Baer said that tests will be done "from time to time. Basically once a year. If we find more insulation we will do more frequent testing."

Police Chief Stetson comments: invites students to voice their concerns

by Amanda Burt

Increased numbers of college students living off campus have elicited a response from the Chestertown Police Department.

"The behavior of college students who elect to live off campus will be made to conform to that of other residents," says Police Chief Mauritz Stetson, in a letter dated August 1 and addressed to students. The letter was sent to of campus students together with one from Student Affairs.

Stetson admitted that in the past law enforcement officers have been more tolerant of students' off campus behavior. However, last year the Police Department received excessive amounts of complaints from local residents.

In an effort to prevent problems this year, Stetson stated that the law will be enforced uniformly and students cannot expect to be treated differently than other residents of Chestertown. "Students are no exception to the law."

He also responded to allegations of unfair treatment and of illegal searches in recent arrests. In The Kent County News, he stated, "When we get a complaint of noise, we'll look for every violation we can...possession of drugs, underage possession of alcohol or serving alcohol to minors...until these kids learn their lesson."

Stetson denied making the statement and denied that students are being persecuted at all. He also refused to comment about particular cases.

"In general we're glad that Washington College is here. If [students] would conduct themselves in the same way as they would in their hometown, there would be no problem. We're not after them to treat them unlike anyone else," he said.

"When you elect to live in the residential areas of Chestertown you come under the laws and ordinances which have been passed so that the desired tranquility can be maintained."

Stetson remains positive toward students despite several minor incidents earlier this year. "It's unfortunate to start out on the wrong foot," he says, "but by and far, the college students are really a good bunch of people."

Stetson cited that there were nine different civil citations in the first five days of the semester. He added that there are also more complaints than last year. This may not be due to more off-campus students, but rather it could be due to a change in how those students are acting.

Stetson said that intensity may also be a possible cause of the problem. "Everyone in one spot."

Decker Science Center to be rededicated this week

Washington College will rededicate its newly-renovated science building, Dunning Hall, on Saturday, October 7, with a 3 PM ribbon-cutting ceremony on the campus lawn.

Theodore Kurze, Professor Emeritus of Neurological Surgery at the University of Southern California at Los Angeles and currently a senior fellow at Washington College, will speak. A 1943 graduate of Washington College, he was presented with the College's honorary Doctor of Sciences degree at Fall Convocation on September 14.

Last fall, the college opened a new wing of Dunning Hall, the Alonzo G. Decker Science Laboratory Center. With construction of the Decker Center and renovation of Dunning Hall now complete, Washington College has launched a year-long "Celebration of the Sciences." Throughout the academic year the College will bring to campus experts in various scientific fields of study sponsored by the Washington College Chemists' Lecture Series and the William James Forum.

Dunning Hall, built more than 40 years ago, has been converted to accommodate the departments of physics, psychology and chemistry. It contains four research laboratories and two teaching laboratories for chemistry, four teaching laboratories and two research laboratories for physics, and four teaching laboratories and six research laboratories for psychology, as well as instrumentation rooms for each department.

College handled asbestos swiftly and honestly

Kudos to the College for finally dealing swiftly with a potentially dangerous problem and for being honest with students about its existence. Administrators were made aware of asbestos in the Fine Arts Center, immediately hired a firm to test the levels of the substance, and within a week notified the college community that the concentrations of asbestos were—thankfully—not hazardous.

This incident smacks nothing of last year's distasteful PCB scandal, where students were told by administrators that the details of the issue were none of their business; students who were really concerned had to contact the Environmental Protection Agency to get a straight answer.

President Douglass Cater has said that he would rather err on the side of ignorance than dishonesty. With the Administration's continued competence and honesty in handling problems like asbestos, he will have to do neither.

Deter and punish the few, or revoke freedom for all?

To the Editor:

Should Americans have the liberty to physically desecrate the American flag? This question has recently been debated and reviewed in the classrooms, households, media, and of course the Congress of the United States of America. Approximately three weeks ago a motion was passed in our national legislature that an amendment banning flag desecration be brought to the floor and voted upon. Many congressmaen are proposing to change the constitution of the United States by not only adding the amendment, but also encroaching on the rights of every Americans freedom of speech and expression. I personally feel the burning of the American flag is a horrible act. I would undoubtedly look down upon any individual who maliciously destroys our national symbol. I also believe the question we must ask ourselves is wether we as Citizens of this country believe congress should infringe on our principles of freedom of expression in order to deter and punish the few.
The founding fathers of our constitution created the bill of rights to protect our freedoms. We view the freedoms granted to us by law as being sacred. No matter how evil and unpatriotic the act of flag burning is, a constitutional amendment banning this behavior will be a breech upon one of our many constitutionally granted freedoms. If we allow congress to take such an act of freedom from us, we must also contemplate if they will try to retract more in the future. We as American citizens must ask ourselves if we are ready to accept the sacrifices of adding an amendment banning flag desecration. In my opinion this amendment would be in direct violation to one of the underlying doctrines of our government.

Congress must view this issue on a larger scale and carefully decide if their constituents are prepared to suffer the consequences that will accompany the addition of this amendment. This is a very important issue in our lives. American citizens must cautiously consider whether it will be beneficial to deter and punish the few, or revoke freedom from the many.

No need for extra precautions in the case of mentally ill patients

To the Editor :

Many people have read or heard about the escape of a local mentally ill patient whose pursuants knocked down a Washington College student named Lisa Woodcock. I have no right to judge Lisa's reaction to the incident. I too would be concerned about my safety if such a situation had happened to me before I started working with the mentally ill.

For the most part, people fear the unknown. Mental illness is scary - especially when you don't know much about it. I have spent approximately 100 hours working at the Upper Shore Community Mental Health Center. Through an internship and volunteer work, I have gotten a chance to meet many wonderful people. Not only the staff, but also the patients, are some of the best people I've ever had the pleasure of meeting.

Lisa Woodcock refused to take a tour of the facility. Somehow I think she would feel the same way as many volunteers and I do if she would have given the patients a chance. I think that fear got the best of her, and she was shocked at the hospital administator's response to her fear.

Dr. Tubbman's seemingly nonchalant attitude toward the incident has a sound basis. As he said himself, "... most of our patients are harmless and they have often returned on their own." I must be realistic and mention that some of the patients do show violent tendencies. In my opinion though, there is no need to take extra precautions. The patients should neither be "fenced in" nor "locked up". Dr. Tubbman is a responsible man with a moral obligation to the community. He would not subject us to impending danger.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Editorial Board.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Students should give Convocation a fair chance

To the Student Body:

Having read the "Convocation" edition of the Elm last week I felt inspired to write a letter to you, the student body, concerning my feelings on the attendance. To err is human, and I realize that occasionally we all miss a convocation in our 4 years here at Washington College, I've even missed one or two. But there is absolutely no excuse for not attending at least one to see what it's all about.

The point of convocation is to assemble everyone in the college community together to celebrate the commencement of academic year 89-90. There are many features of convocation that make it worth attending, for example the keynote speaker, granted he was a little long-winded but his points were well articulated. President Cater always makes knowledgeable comments, and the Lindback teacher is a guaranteed success. The main reason you should attend is that your elected SGA President gives a speech which takes time to prepare. I directed my speech on student unity, something I feel we all need and must work on together. My sentiments were directed to you the students, imagine how I felt when the majority of the audience were townspeople, faculty, and administrators. How can a message be heard if the people who it is meant for are not even there to listen?

Not everyone has the opportunity of being "blessed real good" by Louis L. Goldstein, the comptroller of Maryland and Chairman of the Board of our Visitors and Governors. If you don't know what that means come to Convocation February 20th and find out!

Thank you,

Reports make students aware of their responsibility

Sean Murphy

The recent addition of the police reports to The Elm has incited yet another controversy at Washington College. This section performs an essential function in the life of the student: it promotes responsibility.

Until recently, responsibility has been a taboo word on this campus. Students have continued to exploit the community through their behavior. But why? you ask.

They assume that they can get away with it. The presence of the police reports, however, is an unequivocal message to the contrary.

Students need to know that we are neither isolated from, nor place above, the law. Reading about our friends, peers, and neighbors every week brings the issue much closer to home. Now we students know it can happen to us; we are not immune.

The reports function as a medium by which the police can convey their intent to the students. The gist of the matter is that the police are serious. Chief Stetson has already made it clear that disorderly conduct and disturbance of the peace are criminal statutes. Furthermore, if they receive a complaint regarding noise, they look for other violations, too. It is no longer unusual to see police, both local and STATE, on or about campus. The Bash concert last weekend serves as evidence of this.

But regarding the police, the reports also serve as a vehicle informing the students as to their level of response. The theft of furniture from Kent House several weeks ago is now a case in the Kent County court system. The reports also serve as a measure to monitor the College's response to students' activity. Students involved in the furniture incident have since been dismissed.

Furthermore, despite the tendency to separate WC from Chestertown, we are still part of the community. As such, it would be in our best interest to promote the establishment of good relations among all of the sectors of the community. This task cannot be taken lightly; we must learn to uphold the same responsibilities that other community members are expected to fulfill.

Obviously, this is not a unilateral effort. Chief Stetson has written, "Washington College has always been an asset to our town and the students add to its life and vitality." By continuing to promote the awareness and responsibility of students, police reports facilitate this status.

I think it's wrong not to allow the student to have his name withheld in such incidents. What actions the school imposes should be punishment enough.

I think it's ridiculous to print crime reports, then print an editorial pompously stating The Elm's right to do so, and then print two corrections stating that their reports were incorrect. It seems like poor journalism on The Elm's part.

The Elm staff should cast no stones unless they have no sins

Tanya Cunic

In the beginning, the idea of printing WC student arrest reports may sound like a good thing to do. It was not only news but "public information." Obviously, with these two concepts in mind, The Elm went full steam ahead and used the idea "freedom of the press" to its very limits. Unfortunately, while picking up momentum, The Elm violated individual rights.

It is understandable and encourageable for every aspect of WC to voice opinions through writing. Since this is a college that thrives on new, fresh (and often outspoken) ideas, it would be hypocritical to deny the chance or right of voicing an opinion. The newspaper is undoubtedly included in this category. Yet, while every single person has the power to say what they feel, they also have the right not to say anything. The freedom of speech and the freedom of privacy go hand-in-hand. To take the Buckley Amendment one step further, if a student won't give a written consent to release school records, why would they release a police report? Most people (including myself) would rather the world know that they failed a course, then broke the law. A school record when put on an application for a job won't necessarily mean not getting the job, while a police report may have to carry that burden alone, they don't need WC's nosiness to add to it.

Let's approach the idea "what's the point of printing a description of the alleged offenses or phantom students? To do so would only encourage rumors to fester rather than put them to rest, which is what good journalism sets out to accomplish." "Good journalism" means getting the story straight. The Elm does "fester" rumors when they misprint stories, as in the cases of Ronald Council, John Manning, and Daniel Pratt in the September 8 issue. It is fully acknowledged that a correction was made in the September 22 issue, but by then rumors have been set in motion. A small paragraph in the right hand bottom corner of page two does not constitute "good journalism." Also, when the bare truths about a crime is printed such as name, date, place, and a brief description, this does not satisfy human nature. By giving these naked facts, it leaves room for the imagination to fill in the nitty-gritty. The published reports only add a new height to the curiosity factor.

Let's take a realistic view at the people who commit these crimes. They do not shudder at the thought of having their names published in the newspaper. It is hardly an incentive to prevent them from doing something illegal. This may sound twisted, but there are probably some people who would go purposely out of their way to do something illegal to see their name published in the newspaper. If the publishing of police reports of WC students is being used as a scare tactic, it's working as well as a two-year old child saying "BOO!"

A few final thoughts, college IS the "real world." I hold the same views on this topic whether it be The Elm or The Baltimore Sun. Also, college students are not beyond or above the law. If they choose to break it, then they choose to pay the consequences. If in paying for the crime, their action is made public-so be it. Yet it is not The Elm's (or any other news publication) responsibility to cast stones-whether they be truth or not. Unless, of course, they have no sins.

Something's going to give in Yugoslavia

Laura Hopper

Ethnic conflicts seem to be spreading throughout Eastern Europe. There is a potential conflict between East Germany and Hungary over the East German and Polish refugees who Hungary allowed to cross the border. There is ethnic strife in the Soviet Union between the Baltic States and the Soviet Union, and Yugoslavia is joining the Soviet Union as a country with deepening divisions between ethnic groups. One group is more pro-western, the other more pro-Soviet.

Yugoslavia is a collection of six provinces; Slovenia, Croatia, Serbia, Montenegro, Macedonia, and Bosnia. There are also two autonomous republics with in the province of Serbia, Kosovo and Vojvodina. All six provinces are under one central government, and they all share the same currency. Although Yugoslavia is not aligned with either the Soviet Bloc or the West, some of the six provinces have very different political ideologies.

The trouble is in the republic of Slovenia. Out of the six republics, Slovenia is the most liberal, and has close ties to Austria. It is also the most economically developed republic in Yugoslavia, producing one-fifth of the national income and one-fourth of Yugoslavia's exports. The standard of living is much higher in Slovenia than in the rest of Yugoslavia.

The Slovenians consider themselves close to Austria, and not communists. Recently, the Slovenian legislature passed amendments to the republic's constitution which state that the republic has the right to succeed from Yugoslavia. However, Slovenia is not the largest republic in Yugoslavia, or the most powerful.

Serbia is the largest republic in Yugoslavia. Serbs account for 36.2% of the population, versus 7.8% for the Slovenes. It is also the most pro-Soviet republic. Serbia has historic ties to Russia. It was Russian support of the Serbs against the Austro-Hungarian Empire that led to the issuing of the famous "Blank Check" by the Germans before World War One.

The Soviet influence in Yugoslavia diminished after the 1948 split between Tito and Stalin. An economic blockade of Yugoslavia by the Soviet bloc from 1949 to 1953 led to the reorientation of the Yugoslavian economy towards the west. The Yugoslavian government borrowed heavily during the 1970's to finance the development of import-substitution industries. This led to Yugoslavia's large foreign debt. The central government has tried various austerity programs to attempt to lessen the foreign debt which were very unpopular. Recently, they changed laws making investment in Yugoslavia more attractive to foreigners.

One of the fears in Slovenia and its neighboring province, Croatia, is a Soviet-backed bid for power by the Serbs. The Central Committee of the Yugoslavian Communist Party met in Belgrade and denounced the amendments to the Slovenian constitution calling them a "threat to the territorial integrity" of Yugoslavia. The Serbs have already warned the Slovenes not to succeed from Yugoslavia.

These are not good signs for a country in Yugoslavia's condition. Inflation has been running as high as 900%, and there have been ethnic riots by Albanians in the province of Kosovo. Yugoslavia has also accumulated a large foreign debt, 20 billion dollars. High inflation and a relatively high unemployment rate underscore Yugoslavia's shaky economic condition.

If the Slovenes do succeed from Yugoslavia, they will face many of the same problems that the country as a whole now faces. Inflation, unemployment, and a devaluated currency do not go away with a change of government. Perhaps the Serbs should let the Slovenes go and try being independent, the Slovenes might decide they don't like it. But somehow, watching the numbers of East Germans who left everything behind to start over in the West, I doubt it.

The Serbs, however, do not feel this way. For them, it is imperative that Yugoslavia remain intact. Slovenia is rich in industry, specifically textiles and electronics, and metals. The Serbs won't let them go without a fight. But then, what democracy was ever founded without bloodshed?

In the world: At the UN, Bush makes chemical arms reduction proposal; Congress debates capital gains tax

THE UNITED STATES

The visit of Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze last week brought with it much progress in strategic arms talks, specifically the reduction of chemical weapons. On Monday, during a UN General Assembly session, President Bush made a proposed to cut chemical arms stockpiles by 80%, provided the Soviet Union do the same (this would be in advance of an international ban on all chemical armaments which will be at earliest completed in two years). The next day Shevardnaze responded by accepting and even amplifying the proposal to embrace a ban on all chemical weapons. The Soviet proposal would prohibit production of new weapons which produce the most lethal poisons, binary chemical weapons. American officials said the Administration will continue the development of the weapons.

The House of Representatives approved the proposed cut in the capital gains tax by a 239 to 190 vote. A highly partisan issue, the approval of the cut marked a major victory for President Bush and the Republicans and conversely a great upset for the Democrats. Capital gains are the profits from the sale of investments, including stocks, real estate, farms and timberlands. President Bush argued that that without the tax, businesses and individuals would be motivated to make more investments, thus stimulating the economy.

President Bush pledged to overhaul the educational system in an "education summit" at UVA last week. The two day meeting between the President and state leaders set a new precedent for education in the US. No longer should education be only a state concern, they decided, but a national responsibility as well. The state and federal government will work together in close cooperation to attain national education goals, which include higher salaries and more extensive training for teachers; improved academic performance of students, using international tests to rate them; the reduction of the dropout rate and the functional literacy of adult Americans. Also emphasized was parental involvement and allowing parents to choose the schools their children attend.

Federal Health officials are allowing the distribution a drug which may combat the AIDS virus, dideoxyinosine (DDI). The drug is still in its experimental stage, and has not undergone the usual years of thorough testing required. Officials have decided to break with their cautious procedures in this case because thousands of desperate patients who could perhaps be helped by the drug would otherwise die during its years of testing.

EAST GERMANY

Erich Honecker, the leader of East Germany, arranged for the departure of fleeing East Germans to West Germany, negotiating with Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the West German Foreign Minister last week. The refugees were allowed entry to West Germany with the stipulation that they come home first to East Germany. 5,500 East Germans came from Czechoslovakia, where they had sought refuge at the West German Embassy in Prague. Another 800 came from Warsaw, Poland. Their trains made detours through East Germany, to fulfill the terms of the agreement, before arriving to West Germany.

LEBANON

A peaceplan, calling for an immediate cease fire in the 14 year civil war between Christians and Muslims in Beirut was accepted by General Michel Aoun, a Muslim military commander. The ceasefire was put forth by the Arab League, and negotiated primarily through the efforts of the Algerian diplomat, Lakhdar Ibrahimi. A country without a president for a year, the truce will enable the election of a Lebanese president and reuniting of the national government. The ceasefire was hailed as "a miracle" and has ushered in hope for permanant peace.

GREECE

The Greek Parliament voted to order former Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou to stand trial on charges of bribery and receiving stolen funds.

Papandreou will be the first Prime Minister in Greek history to be indicted. Four other ministers from his Administration will also stand trial, reflecting incipient corruption in the former government. Papandreou is 70 years old and still "a popular hero" in Greece, and is campaigning for re-election in November.

East Germany: stubborn or steadfast?

Steven Bruchey

In a changing Communist world, there is one nation that remains steadfast: The German Democratic Republic. As East Germany turns forty, its Communist Party Chief, Erich Honnecker, has denounced any deviations from the present path of governmental policy. This island in a changing political sea is frustrating the government and the citizens to the point where some compromise must occur before a massive social upheaval.

The government is clouded with confusion as it sees its most talented and promising citizens, mainly youth, streaming to the West. While trying to retain its legitimacy, the government is only displaying a paralyzed image to its people.

One of the dominant reasons for this resistance to alter the status quo is the average age of the members of the Politburo which is 68. These men were coming of age and taking power when East Germany had the highest standard of living in the Eastern Bloc. Now that same system is out-dated and rundown. The G.D.R. does not know where to turn for help because they are the only system resisting this inevitable change.

This lack of help is exemplified by the Soviet Union's policy of noninterference. The government is not alone in its confusion. In this regard, they are very similar to the people.

This island of steadfastness is angering the citizens of East Germany as they look around and see other Communist countries that are much older and deeper in tradition than the G.D.R. implementing reforms. Irritation deepens within the public as the government deplores any type of shift from the status quo.

Now, the people are tired and are leaving the country by the thousands through Hungary. The main reason for this fleeing is the pervasiveness of the the government into every aspect of life.

With the outpouring of citizens to the West, East Germany is on the verge of social upheaval as it stands at a threshold of indecision. The government can either remain on their present course and keep their citizens suppressed until they become so frustrated that thev use violence to attain their goals or the government can begin to implement changes and swim in the current of political change that is consuming the Eastern Bloc. The choice is theirs and the time has come to decide.

East Germany: the great escape

by Janine Bohlainger

Three weeks ago, Hungary, to help East German refugees escape to West Germany, decided to open its border with Austria. With this act, Hungary openly challenged the Warsaw Pact by collaborating with the West. So far, about 20,000 people have crossed the border, and more than 100,000 are expected by the end of the year. What caused this sudden exodus and how are the East German being welcomed in the Western and Capitalist part of their country?

To open its borders, Hungary suspended key paragraphs of a 1969 treaty between Hungary and East Germany which forbids the unauthorized passage of citizens of either country into other countries. By breaking this treaty, Hungary has shown the fractures within the Warsaw Pact which have been taking place since the reform politics of Gorbachev began.

While East Germany has stubbornly tried to follow the political and economic rules of Marxism, several other Eastern bloc states are working along with Gorbachev toward an opening to the West and the gradual transformation of Communism. The indoctrination of the state, the inability to travel freely and the very restricted freedom of expression led many East German to decide to leave their country for the West. While the East German government charged Hungary with violating legal treaties, Budapest asserted that it is not willing to let Hungary become "a refugee camp" for East Germany's problems. Instead, the Hungarians have claimed to have embraced the higher principles of human rights.

Since Bonn recognizes only one German citizenship, the refugees were automatically acknowledged as citizen and welcomed with gifts and benefits. Clothing, unemployment payments, and a minimum of $125, helped the new arrivals over their first few days. Job openings for the East Germans are surprisingly large, considering the West German unemployment rate of nearly 7%. But the East Germans are young, well trained, and willing to work hard in jobs that West Germans consider beneath them.

The other advantages that East Germans have over other immigrants are language and culture. They are very willing to assimilate into the West German culture, and many have relatives in West Germany who are willing to help them start new lives. However, with the refugee camps overcrowded, and the winter approaching, it remains to be seen if the Bonn government will be able to its new citizens, and finally give up its undecided attitude toward the German question.

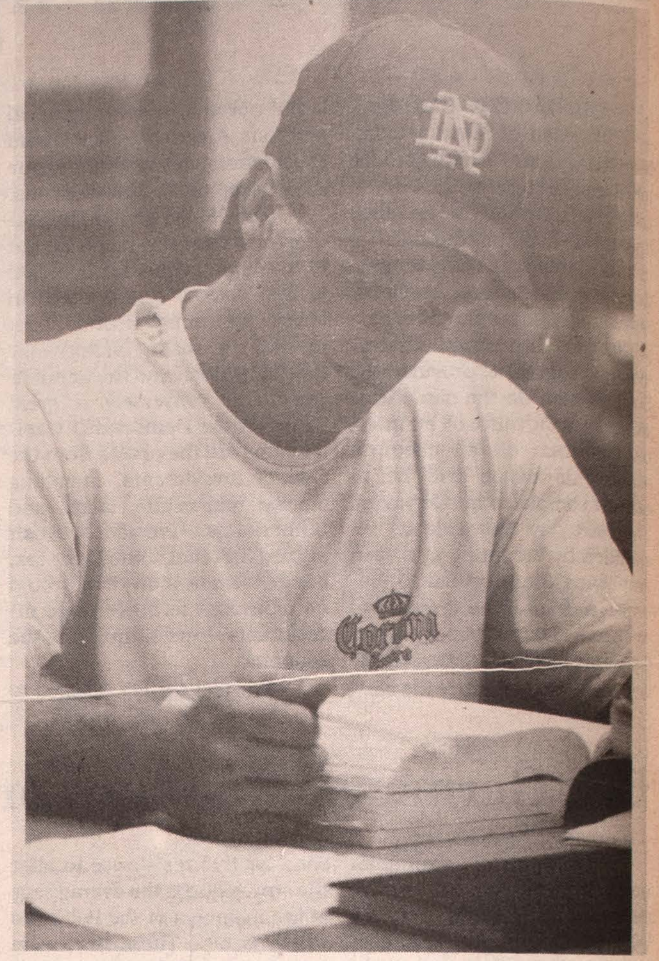
"Ray bans, black flats, pearls, and blonde hair"

by Kate Absher
Staff Writer



Not living up to the stereotypical lacrosse player image, junior lacrosse player David Slomkowski studies in the library.

Drawing from stereotypes, certain campus groups are easily caricatured.For example, in later years, an Alpha Chi busing her children to ballet classes in her Volvo station wagon; the lacrosse player cleaning up saloons in Dodge City; the AOΠ with Cary Grant driving recklessly along the roads of Monte Carlo, or a Literary House writer planting turnip seeds by Walden Pond.

Absurd as these stereotypes are, they bind the student body into a rigid class system where students formulate opinions about each other based on group image. Why can't a Theta dine with a hippy art major in the Dining Hall without his brothers' mouths hanging in horror? The answer to this question is because stereotypes hinder individuals into only associating with their own clique.

Life in the fast lane characterizes the Alpha Omicron Pi sorority. Junior AOΠ President Debora Hitchcock laughingly contradicts this: "I thought we were Ray Bans, black flats, pearls, and blonde hair."

But she accepts that some of the student body views her sorority stereotypically. Hitchcock feels these views cannot be supported for the student body is not present at their meetings, social gatherings, and excursions to benefit the community.

Senior AOΠ Susan Stobbart agrees, "We do a lot for the community which is recognized really by no one, including the Administration." Both of them stress the ridiculous side of stereotyping, especially because their sorority is composed of individuals, not manufactured Malibu Barbies.

Feeling the AOΠs represent a diverse group of girls, sophomore Karen Brady comments, "You really can't classify us. We kind of wear the same thing, but there is so much variety in our sorority; everyone is in a different sports group."

Brady also believes the AOΠ's reputation for promiscuity is unfounded: "The rumors just get around. We have had that reputation, and it's hard to break even if the sisters are not like that." Nullifying the stereotype is the fact that many AOΠs presently have long term relationships. The reputation, however, still lingers for the present sororities are usually judged by the actions of their past members.

The Zeta Tau Alpha are also trying to squelch their negative image on campus. President of Zeta, Chrissy Wiant, describes the stereotypical Zeta: "We're weird. We're cows. Cows is a big one."

As for the origin of the stereotype, she reasons it bubbled up from the lack of a set type of Zeta girl. But Wiant hopes this unfavorabl description crumbles: "I hear from the Administration and others that Zetas are really changing. We are finally getting it through people's heads of what we are."

Zetas have the highest sorority grade point average on campus, and because of this they were honored with the Loving Cup at Fall Convocation recently. The honors, a sorority is given, represents them, not the stereotype.

Junior Zeta Debbie Smethurst notes, "On this campus stereotypes tend to be more negative than positive." Commenting on Zeta's reputation she adds, "If there's one sister that is into the arts or heavy metal music, you can't stereotype the rest of the sisterhood. Each person is unique in her own way and brings something to the sorority."

The sorority, however, does not limit the uniqueness of the individual. According to junior Alpha Chi Beth Karukas, the sorority is "only an enhancement of our college years." Karukas perceives her sorority as not hindering her from establishing other relationships or joining other organizations outside of Alpha Chi Omega: "It really shouldn't be taking away from independence; it just should be an added plus. . .[In the Dining Hall], I'll sit everywhere with everybody anytime." This Alpha Chi does not allow anyone to stereotype her.

Before pledging some of her fellow sisters were wary of being stereotyped. "When I was pledging, I was a little concerned about being stereotyped, but I figured I'm going to be stereotyped if I'm an Alpha Chi or not," explains Jennifer Golden.

Alpha Chi Amy Deszeran argues stereotyping "limits the people you're allowed to date, or people you are actually allowed to meet. It puts people into roles they are supposed to play, and we should not have to play those roles." To combat their stereotypical image, all the sororities look for a diverse group among their pledges, but stereotypes are nevertheless still constructed.

Also, non-Greeks hold the opinion that sororities force one into a narrow realm of friends, but many sorority girls interviewed feel their sorority influences them into becoming more active and therefore more broad minded; it is only their image that narrows them.

Senior Theta Chi Tim Keehan points out that the different pursuits of his brothers tear down the Theta image: "We are not the Thetas of old. We graduated six or seven basketball players. If you look at the frat, it's a very diverse group, atheletic-wise. Every sport is represented down to crew, except tennis."

As well as being a fraternity of basketball players, the Theta image also portrays Thetas as dumb jocks. Yet, the Theta's GPA is above average; Keehan himself earns Dean's List status every semester. Because of the OX image, some people find Keehan's grades shocking: "The first time I went to the Dean's List reception, the only time I went to the Dean's List reception, people were thinking I was working for the Dining Service."

The AOΠs sing a song in which one line states, "Don't sleep with Thetas"; the Theta stereotype also includes using and abusing women. Sophomore Theta Doug Sarno responds to this lyric, "If there is something girls didn't like, they wouldn't joke about it. It just wouldn't be talked about."

Theta Will Braddenburg also comments on this image, "I think a lot of freshman girls are scared of us—big, bad Thetas. My dad was a Theta in '59 and my mom went here too, and even then they were thought of as dumb jocks. They were cocky and would not associate with people and abused girls."

"It's all a tale," concludes Keehan.

The Kappa Alphas, however, must live up to a certain stereotypical image based on their founder Robert E. Lee. Senior KA Joe Van Name lists the requirements, "Look out for God, community, women, [be] virtuous, good grades." These requirements inspire KAs to work for the community, have a friendly relationship with the Administration, and win the loving cup for the highest fraternity GPA.

Yet, the KAs interviewed believe their role model Lee does not restrain them from being individuals. Van Name admits, "I personally don't have good grades, so it doesn't mean I'm a study geek. Everyone in the order would like to be intelligent, popular, but people are going about doing their own things."

Because the Lambda Pi Delta fraternity is always associated with the lacrosse team, it is difficult to discern the difference between the two. Every member of the lacrosse team, however, is not a Lambda. But the Lambdas and the lacrosse team are stereotyped as bad boys, encouraging and instigating fights whenever they go out: "Lacrosse players are associated with fighting, so if one gets in a fight, the whole group is labeled. It's one individual's actions, not the team or the group, but it's the team or the group that's portrayed [as fighters]," challenges Senior lacrosse player Kevin Colbeck, who is not a member of the Lambda fraternity. Breaking the Lamda's belligerent stereotype, junior Greg Rupert reveals he has never been in a fist fight at WC.

Overall, the lacrosse players think the student body does not recognize the positive things the lacrosse team accomplishes: "This past Saturday we got out and gave a clinic for St. Benedictine. People look past that. People think of us as bad boys, not helping people, " argues Senior Lambda Heath Bethune.

Bethune also feels many students consider the lacrosse team above the Administration's rules and regulations: "Say we do get caught at something. People think we get pat on the back and nothing is done about it." But Bethune stresses lacrosse players are subject to the laws of the campus just as much as other students.

Lambdas also have a reputation for being on academic probation; Colbeck refutes this. "Obviously, that is not the case because we wouldn't be allowed to play lacrosse if we had a low academic average." He lists Tim Hornes and Bobby Martino, for example, as lacrosse players who produce Dean's List status grades. Colbeck sums up his feelings about being stereotyped by commenting, "What's it matter that I'm a lacrosse player? I'm a WC student."

They wear black, dye their hair funny colors, and have watched Pink Floyd's The Wall too many times; they are the writers, the theater people, and the art majors. Sophomore writer Joshua Buchman responds to this stereotype, "What do you want? We are weird, strange and dark side. Who wouldn't be proud to be? Grow up in this country and you get stereotyped. No one cares." Senior Art major Denise O'Connell also prefers her image, "I hear voices from afar saying, 'tree hugger.' I like it."

Junior drama major Felicia Shakman rebels against the theater stereotype. "I've been called a Dead Head. I like this band, but I'm me. Sometimes I wish we were all blind, and then we couldn't judge people on their appearance."

Shakman adds that one morning she walked to class and spoke to everyone she met on her way. Half of those she said hello to responded to her good morning, and half returned her salutation with a strange look. She argues, "We are at a small school were there is no need for people to purposely act like strangers."

O'Connell agrees, "You both came to this school; you both drink beer. Therefore, you both have something in common."

Cousineau and Beckett's Waiting for Godot

by Jennifer Del Nero

Croissants, champagne, Perma Soft: these constitute the image most Americans hold of France. But for Tom Cousineau, France took on a whole new meaning as he spent the past two years there teaching in French universities and researching for his soon released book.

Offered a contract in 1987 to teach and research abroad, Cousineau, Associate Professor of English, began his initial six-month long appointment at the Sorbonne. Spring of '88 brought him to the Nanterre campus of the University of Paris. This was followed by an appointment to the University of Lyon, 300 miles from his home in Paris. Commuting was made possible by the TGV, a high-speed train which completed the trip in two hours.

A graduate of Boston College and University of California, Davis campus, where he received his Ph.D., Cousineau joined WC faculty in '78 after a year's stint teaching French in a New York City high school for intellectually gifted students. Beginning his career in France in '71, he remained in Paris for five years thanks to annually renewed appointments.

Cousineau points out many differences between the French and American education systems. In order to be admitted , students attending French university must be awarded with a baccalaureate, or a national diploma.

After the obtainment of this diploma, they usually attend the school nearest to their homes; therefore, student housing is not necessary. Since the French system is nationalized, all important decisions are decided by the Ministry. With the exception of modest registration fees, tuition is non-existent for French students.

As a result of the free education policy, there exists little motivation for French professors concerning students passing. Compared to the United States where the goal is to maintain as high a retention rate as possible.

Cousineau explains, "The goal of professors is to winnow out the students who really don't have the capacity to do university work. Students have to prove themselves; it's a real struggle to succeed."

Another factor hindering students from receiving a passing grade is students are not graded by their own professor, but by a colleague of their professor. He admits, "It's hard to learn to conform to their grading system."

Emphasizing the disparities between US and French grading policies, Cousineau describes one particular class of 80 seniors. Of those 80 seniors, only 12 of the students passed and received their bachelor's degrees.

Yet, what he finds so attractive about the education system in France is the quality of preparation for university work, which he describes as "impressive." Conceding that "...there's been a decline in the quality of elementary and secondary education." Cousineau believes, however, that "French students are quite well prepared to do rigorous university work."

He also notes the attentiveness of his French students as compared to American students, who tend to be more casual, particularly about taking notes. Because students are so talkative with each other, the volume level of French classrooms is higher in contrast with WC classrooms. When a professor begins class, however, students immediately settle down and prepare for class.

To give an example, he describes this scenario: "The moment a professor starts talking, students bend over their notebooks, writing down every word that is said." He adds, "It's very flattering, but it imposes a strong obligation on you [as a professor] to say something worth writing down."

Teaching classes in English and American literature, English and French grammar and even a class on the United States Constitution, Cousineau experienced first-hand the feelings students possess toward foreign professors and holds firm to his belief that French students are "extremely appreciative of American teachers."

"No one in Europe is without an opinion of the United States...both pro and anti-America. You endure the prejudice people have against you or benefit from their positive opinions," he explains.

The principal reason for Cousineau's two years in France was for him to author a volume devoted to Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot, as part of publisher G.K. Hall's Masterwork Studies Series. Beckett wrote Godot in Paris in 1948. Cousineau, therefore, was especially intrigued by the prospect of returning to Paris to write his own book. He was also struck by the further symmetry he would be writing his commentary at exactly the same age as Beckett was when he wrote the play.

Instead of discussing only the written play in his book, Cousineau plans to focus on and emphasize the production aspect of it as well, where he finds "tremendous attention to movement and precision of gesture." While living in Paris, he first saw Beckett's production of the play in 1976. Since the play was done by a Berlin company, he found himself "not paying attention to the words [which were in German] but to the visual elements."

Not only did Cousineau learn more about Beckett through research, but Beckett personally taught him what he fondly refers to as a "lesson in humility."While in Paris, he wrote to Beckett inquiring if there was some way he could locate a videotape of the Berlin production of the play. Since Beckett found Cousineau's signature to his letter illegible, he addressed the envelop of his reply using the return address from the original letter. The reply contained the precise information he requested with the salutation, "Dear ?" What impressed Cousineau about the correspondence was that "someone as illustrious as Beckett should write to someone as obscure as me.

Also during his stay, Cousineau met Pierre Chabert, an actor who has worked closely with Beckett, and invited him to perform at WC.

Scheduled for release in December, Cousineau's work, titled Waiting for Godot: form in movement, received favorable prepublication reviews, including one which described it as "an excellent example of a book written for the general audience but valuable for Beckett specialists."

Seeing the R.E.M. concert tour: the finest of hours

Any night sitting on saturated dirt in forty-five degree weather listening to Mike Mills, Peter Buck, Bill Berry, and Michael Stipe is "the finest of hours" for me. R.E.M. played Merriweather Post Pavilion on Saturday, September 23rd, and you may have the stage, stood on amps, gave the crowd a show...something to watch.

This past concert, he tended to sing with his back to the crowd; this was a show to hear rather than watch—it should have been both.Ironically, I had a great time at Merriweather Post, only because I already felt so far removed from the band by being on the "lawn." I concentrated more on having fun, listening to the songs, singing the songs, dancing around the bonfires that were made out of empty beer cups (bonfires for which I was threatened with arrest).

They played good songs—seemingly conscious of all their fans—old songs which have had no airplay for their dedicated fans, new songs which have been played til they're worn for their recently aquired fans, the combination of new and old songs was seemingly for their born-again fans.

Kimberly Coburn

The other aspect of the concert that made it a tad bit drab was the crowd. Since the release of GREEN, R.E.M.'s fans have extended into the Top 40 crowd. I found myself surrounded by people (a lot of teeny-boppers) who didn't know the songs that were being played. It's understandable that I would notice this—they're my favorite band, but I think that many people heard "Stand" on B104, thought they liked R.E.M., came to the concert and were very disappointed. R.E.M. is not a pop band, as "Stand" might suggest.I hear myself ragging on the band, and I don't mean to. I think they are the hippest guys in the business. I'd leave any day, anytime to see R.E.M.

Maybe I expect too much. Or maybe I wish all the people who just want to see a concert, but don't give a crap about R.E.M., would stay home. People think my liking for R.E.M. is a bit excessive, but what the hell? I gotta get psyched about something.

R.E.M. tries to convey a message with every song. The simplistic lyrics are not lacking in meaning, though. "Take your instincts by the reigns. It's better blessed than rearranged"; these words do more than rhyme. They challenge us to evaluate ourselves. They also urge people to be less selfish and to think of others more: "what we want and what we need has been confused."

I realize I'm only quoting from one song ("The Finest Worksong"), but this song offers a lot. Next time you hear an R.E.M. song, try to listen to the words—decipher Stipe's slurred speech, and think about what the band is saying. By the way, "this is the easiest task I've ever had to do."

Sports Profile: Scott Read, talent from Texas

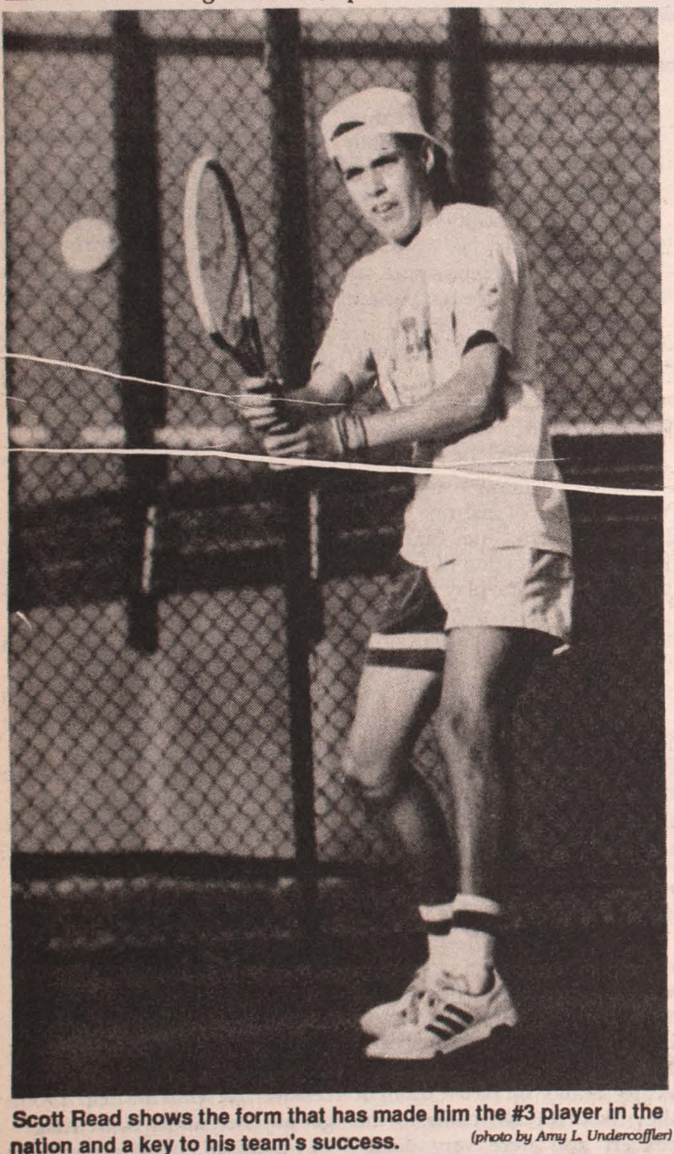
by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

His success in this past weekend's Navy Tournament should come as no surprise to anyone who has been following the men's tennis team the past three years. Scott Read is a tennis player with an unlimited amount of ability. Currently ranked third in the nation in Division III singles, this lefthander from Houston, Texas is one of the key figures in the amazing success of the men's tennis program.

Read has only been playing tennis for nine years, making his success all the more incredible. He decided to devote all of his time to tennis at age fourteen, and by fifteen he was ranked in the state of Texas. He dominated the high school circuit in his junior year, ranking ninth in the state of Texas. Coach Fred Wyman was impressed by Read's abundance of talent, and Read arrived at WC in the fall of 1987.

Read was just one of many excellent recruits Fred Wyman has brought into the program over the past few years. "Fred is a great recruiter, and that's played a key role in our success the last few years."

The coach also excels in many other facets of his job. "Fred analyzes what we're doing wrong, allowing us to correct our own mistakes. Most of all, he's a great motivator, a positive influence in pressure situations. He has the ability to calm us down in pressure spots and allow us to concentrate on the situation at hand."



Scott Read shows the form that has made him the #3 player in the nation and a key to his team's success. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

Read has used the combination of Wyman's coaching and his natural ability to make his mark on the Division III rankings. Along with his #3 ranking in singles, Read teams with senior Larry Gewer to form the #1 doubles team in the nation. Their success in doubles is mainly a result of their different styles. While Read's serve and volley game is best suited to hard courts, Gewer's superior ground strokes are perfect for clay. The different styles work well together, and the duo have an excellent chance to retain their #1 ranking this season.

The lefthander's strength comes in the serve and volley game. Read also uses his quickness to get to a lot of tough balls, forcing his opponents make good shots to beat him. Still, Read believes his biggest asset comes in his concentration and ability to perform under pressure.

"My greatest improvement since my arrival has come in the mental aspect of the game. Before I would lose my concentration during points and I didn't use any strategy. These are things that I need to do to win pressure points, and I feel comfortable in pressure situations."

For this reason, Read has joined Gewer in a leadership role on the team. "Larry and I are able to lead by example in most cases. There's a lot of pressure in the #1 and #2 spots on the team, but I like to be in that role. If there's an important match to be played, I want to be out on the court. I have confidence to come through in these situations."

Read has been blessed by the opportunity to play on a team that could legitimately be called a powerhouse. The team was undefeated his freshman year, but were upset in the NCAA Tournament by the closest of margins. They ended last season in the top five and have maintained that status this year.

"I'm happy to be part of this team, and I enjoy playing a role in the start of a winning tradition at this school. The team my freshman year was the strongest team we've had so far, and it will be tough to ever be that strong again. Fred is still getting a number of good players every year. The recruits want to go to a team with a high ranking, and this is an excellent place for them to play."

As for his future in tennis, Read plans to play it by ear. He participated in pro tournaments while in Africa over the summer and was happy with his play. After graduation, Read plans on taking one year to try to play on the pro tour. If he meets with success during that year, he plans to continue on the circuit. If unhappy with his performance, Read will pursue a career at law school. Still, Read says there is nothing he would rather do than make a living playing tennis profesionally.

And which player would he most like to play after joining the pro tour?

"Jimmy Connors is my idol, and we have very similar styles. I had the privilege to meet him and hit with him a few years ago, and I would love to play him. We're both very emotional players, and we like to play around with the crowd. That type of personality brings the crowd into the match, and it makes the game exciting for both the players and the spectators."

With Scott Read's ability on the tennis court, there is no telling how much excitement he may cause throughout his tennis career.

Read wins big at Navy tourney

by Fred Wyman
Special to The Elm

In a final tuneup prior to defending his Eastern Small College Championship, Scott Read captured both the singles and doubles titles at the Navy Fall Invitational Tennis Tournament held over the weekend. The Rolex Eastern Small College Championship takes place this weekend.

Playing superb serve and volley tennis, Read never lost a set en route to the singles championship. The All-American stopped Howard University players in the quarterfinal and semifinal matches, then defeated American University's #1 player in the finals. Read dropped Jay Merchant 6-2, 6-1 to win the singles title.

In doubles, Read teamed with freshman Alberto Diaz for the first time. Read and Diaz defeated doubles teams from American and Navy in the quarters and semis, setting up a final against Howard's top doubles team. After romping to a 6-1 first set victory, WC's duo had to win an 8-6 tiebreaker in the second set to win the championship.

Newcomers Brian Nilstoft and Greg Coss also showed promise in the tournament. Freshman Nilstoft won the #4 singles flight, while Coss captured the #3 consolation championship. The team hopes to continue their stellar play in the Eastern Small College Championship this weekend.

Soccer reaches halfway mark

by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

With a 3-2 record in their past five games, the Washington College men's soccer team has shown signs of breaking out of their season-opening slump and fulfilling the promise shown in the preseason. Their record now stands at 3-6, with victories over St. Mary's, Salisbury State and UMES. With home games upcoming against Western Maryland, Albright and Ursinus, the team could reach .500 by this time next week.

Their first victory was a 4-0 win over St. Mary's. This was the first game where WC's offense realized its potential, while the defense continued their strong play. Goals were scored by Pete Van Buren, Mike Bishop, Enrique del Prado and Ken Hutchins. Hutchins' goal came on a great pass from freshman Kevin McCarthy.

The team was brimming with confidence going into their home game against Franklin & Marshall. Their offense never got untracked in the first half, then was demobilized in the second half by a storm that rolled in at halftime. The team spent most of the half having passes knocked down by the wind, and much of the half was played in the defensive half of the field. Franklin & Marshall tallied single goals in each half, and WC dropped the game 2-0.

Salisbury State was the next opponent, and WC got off to a very slow start. Salisbury scored in the first minute of the game and seemed destined to keep their momentum, but the Sho'men were able to come back quickly. They scored twice in the first half, taking a lead they would never relinquish. Kevin McCarthy and Mike Bishop scored the goals, leading the team to a 2-1 win. The offense continued their on again-off again pattern in the Swarthmore game, managing only four shots in a 2-0 loss.

Their game against UMES was a late addition to the schedule, but the team had no problem performing in the extra game. The squad won in a romp, beating UMES by a score of 15-1. Coach Bowman did everything possible to keep the score down, but the Sho'men proved to be too strong. Ten players scored in the game, led by three more goals from scoring leader Mike Bishop. Tom Bowman tallied a hat trick, scoring his first three goals of the year. Three goalkeepers combined for three saves on the game.

The team is nearing the halfway point of the season, with six of the last ten games scheduled at home. The team needs to make their move soon if they are to have a chance for a strong finish in the conference.

Sho'men return to the sea

by Colleen Moran

Having recently been upgraded from associate members to regular members of the Mid Atlantic Intercollegiate Sailing Association, the Washington College sailing team is back on the Chester River practicing for upcoming regattas. As regular members, the team will compete in more regattas than in past semesters against other schools in the mid-Atlantic region.

The sailors spend 18 hours a week on the water working on tactics, drills and racing. The team also gathers two nights a week for chalk talks with Coach Mitchell Grieb. Coach Grieb is also working to help the team achieve varsity status, which would allow them to receive the proper funding necessary to purchase more boats and other necessary equipment. The team is presently funded by the SGA and is recognized as a club. Still, the members hope that through their hard work and dedication, it won't be long before sailing is a developed sport at WC.

Volleyball shines

by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

The women's volleyball team seem well on their way to a storybook season, with Coach Penny Fall and her four-year seniors trying to reach those goals that were set three years ago. The team has been the most pleasant surprise of this fall season, racking up a record of 8-5. They have won six of their last eight matches.

The team started to show their promise in a dual match against Hood and Notre Dame. The women lost only one game in sweeping the two matches, despite playing without the services of Sharon Orser. The team played well in Orser's absence as seniors Debby Cohn, Ann Marie Urban and Valerie Williams displayed their leadership during the first month of the season. Despite a conference defeat at the hands of Dickinson, the team still gave an indication of great things to come.

A dual match against Widener and Bryn Mawr brought out the best in the Sho'women. They were repeatedly frustrated by the play of Widener's six-foot hitter in the first game, losing 15-3. The team's chances looked dim, but they used finesse and strategy to take command of the match. They rolled over Widener in the next two games by scores of 15-1 and 15-7, then swept a tough Bryn Mawr team in two games to win the dual match. Gettysburg dealt WC another conference loss, but the team received a big boost by the return of Sharon Orser to the lineup. Despite the loss, the team was brimming with confidence as they prepared for their dual match against Johns Hopkins and Goucher.

The team won the first game against Johns Hopkins, then played poorly while losing their next two games. The team was one game away from losing the match, but coach Fall and the players refused to die. Debby Cohn dominated the fourth game with a series of excellent serves to even the games at two apiece, then won the fifth game to defeat Johns Hopkins. The match took over two and a half hours, but the team still had enough energy to sweep Goucher to win the dual match. The victory over Johns Hopkins was also the team's first conference win.

These wins lead up to a big weekend for the women's volleyball team. The Washington College Invitational Volleyball Tournament begins this evening at six o'clock. Gallaudet, Scranton, Washington & Lee and Wilmington all visit Cain Athletic Center for this two-day event. Play begins Saturday morning at ten, with semifinals scheduled for 1:30, with the tournament final beginning at 2:30. The Washington College games will be played in the small section of the gym, and should present a wonderful opportunity for both alumni and students to see this season's women's volleyball team against tough competition.

Field hockey at .500

by Jennifer Stickney

Things are looking up for the WC women's field hockey team. The team came away victorious in both of last week's games, scoring wins over Albright and Goucher.

On Tuesday, the team dominated conference rival Albright, winning by a score of 2-0. Karen Reck, Marie Mohler, Amy Tiehel, Jenifer Blenckstone and Carole Reece all shined for the team. The women used a combination of hustle, determination and talent to notch their second victory of the season. Mohler and Julie Schram scored the goals for the Sho'women. The scores were assisted by Karen Reck and Carolyn Athey, respectively. This victory raised their record to 2-3.

"I was pleased with the way we dominated the play on the field," Coach Guinan commented after the game. "The hockey team is continuing to progress, making strides toward reaching their full potential."

On Thursday, the rejuvenated Sho'women defeated Goucher 1-0. The only goal of the game was scored in the first half on a shot by Carole Reece. Julie Schram was credited with the assist, giving the team a lead they would never relinquish. The team was led by Mohler, Athey, Blenckstone and Reece, and Goucher was never able to dent the net against the Sho'women's defense. The win brought WC to the .500 mark at 3-3.

"We played a great game," said Coach Guinan. "I was pleased with our passing, movement, courage, and offensive strength. I'm now hoping for an increase in scoring."

The Washington College women's field hockey team will be looking to move above .500 for the first time in their upcoming games. The team meets Catholic University and Lebanon Valley in home games this week.

Tennis suffers first loss of season

by Fred Wyman
Special to The Elm

The Washington College women's tennis team suffered their first dual match defeat of the fall, bowing to Washington & Lee 7-2. Coach Bramble expected the Lady Generals to be good, yet she was surprised by their depth.

Despite only winning one singles match, the Sho'women battled W&L on even terms at the top four singles positions, losing in close matches. The Lady Generals' depth was most apparent at the #5 and #6 spots.

Tracy Peel was victorious in her #1 singles match, stopping Jean Stroman 6-3, 6-2. Stroman is currently ranked 30th in the Division III rankings, making for the second consecutive weekend that Peel has defeated a ranked opponent. Peel's victory upped her fall record to 7-2 and solidified her #4 national ranking.

Monica Blanco and Miriam Dittman both played solid matches before losing in three sets. W&L's Kelly Martone edged Blanco 6-3,3-6,6-4, while Dittman bowed 2-6,7-6,6-3 to Colleen Quinn. Meg Wheatley played well in a close match, losing in straight sets, 6-3,6-4.

The team's other victory came at the #1 doubles position. Peel and Blanco teamed up to defeat W&L's #1 by a score of 6-0,7-5. The women hope to bounce back from the loss this weekend in the Catholic University Fall Invitational Tournament.

Rec Sports

by Deeann Pinczok

This year's Theta Chi Softball Tournament was won by Surf & Turf for the fourth consecutive year. The team came from behind to defeat the Alumni 7-4. They also won in a close game against Oedipus & MoFos in a semifinal match by a score of 12-11. Surf & Turf then clinched the championship by beating the Theta Shooters 9-3.

In Rec Football, the Alpha Babies captured the women's championship by defeating the Silver Bullets 33-0, the Flamin' Alphas 52-0 and the Alpha Chi's 47-0. The Flamin' Alphas placed second with wins over the Silver Bullets and the Alpha Chi's. In the men's division, the Dawgs scored a big win over the Multi Offenders 19-0, while the Pseudo Lambdas defeated the KA's 7-0. Salt & Budha won twice, beating No Names 25-0 and Hard & Clueless 7-0. Alpha Rejecta one once and lost once, beating the KA's 21-6 and losing to Hard & Clueless 8-4.

Rankings as of September 29

1-Pseudo Lambda	4-0
2-Salt & Budha	5-0
3-Dawgs	3-1
5-Multi Offenders	1-3

All the sororities and fraternities on campus participated in the Greek Games last Saturday. The day began with a series of fun games, such as a sack and wheelbarrow race, body toss, chariot race, balloon toss and orange pass. Two teams of six from each Greek organization then played in a tournament of games such as of volleyball, soccer and flag football. Each team was made up of six girls and six guys with games lasting fifteen minutes. Other games ensued, including an egg toss, a clothes race, and leap frog. The day ended with a pie-eating contest. Theta Chi won among the fraternities and Alpha Omicron Pi won among the sororities. It was a day filled with fun and friendly competition for all participants.

NEA grant brings bilingual writer to campus

by Stephanie Hess
Staff Writer

By virtue of the Sophie Kerr Committee and an NEA grant, bilingual novelist and critic, Raymond Federman will be visiting the Washington College campus for two days of lectures, readings and meetings with students.

Federman's visit will begin with breakfast on Monday morning October 16. In the afternoon he will present a talk on "Contemporary Fiction, Here and Elsewhere" and in the evening he will read from his works of fiction. On Tuesday, in addition to meeting with the French Club and Creative Writing students, he will give a lecture in the evening entitled, "The Voice within a Voice: the bilingual writer as self translator."

Federman is the first in a series of four writers from bilingual cultures who will be visiting the campus. The series was established by Director of the Literary House, Robert Day and French major, Jennifer Eisberg, after they applied for and were granted an endowment from the NEA.

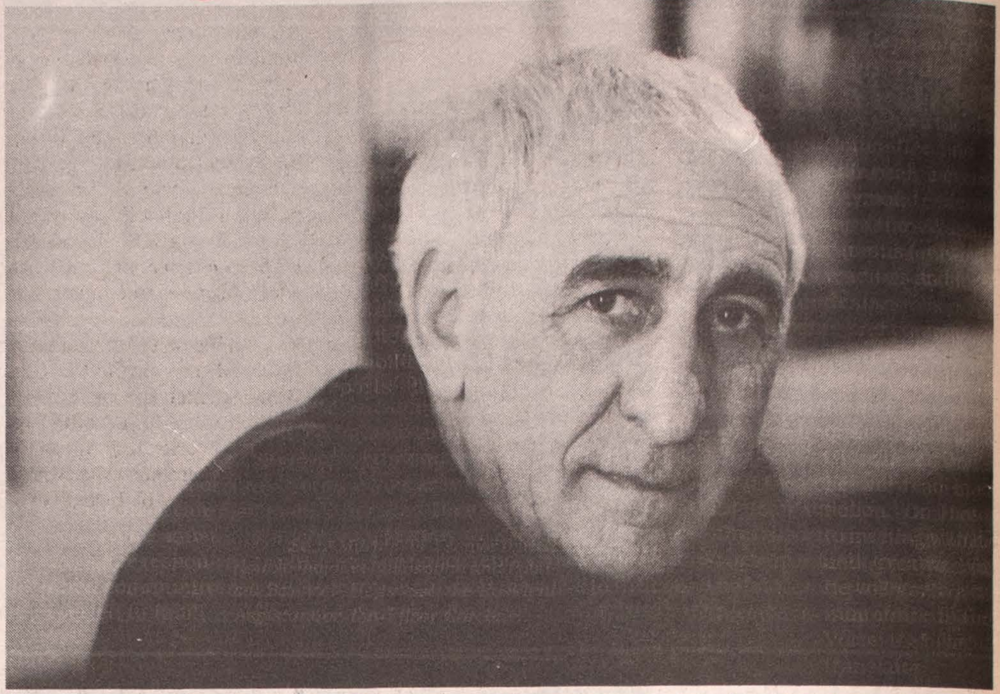
Born in Paris, France in 1928, Federman has published six works of fiction, two of which are award winners; Double or Nothing was the winner of the Frances Steloff Fiction Prize, and the Panache Experimental Fiction Prize, and Smiles on Washington Square won the American Book Award in 1986. A seventh novel, To Whom It May Concern, is in progress.

Federman also works in writing forms other than fiction, but admits in his resume, "Though I have published two volumes of poems (Among the Beasts, 1967 and Me Too, 1975), several books of criticism, and numerous articles and essays, I consider myself primarily a fiction writer."

He worked on three published translations of works from French to English, and several of his novels have been translated into German, Polish, Hungarian, Rumanian, French, Greek, Hebrew, Chinese, Italian, Spanish and Japanese.

Federman came to the United States in 1947 and served in Korea in the US Army from 1951 to 1954. He graduated cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa from Columbia University in 1957, and went on to graduate work at the University of California at Los Angeles where he received his MA and his PhD in Comparative Literature.

A recipient of numerous fellowships and awards, including a Fulbright Fellowship to Israel and an NEA Fellowship in 1984 for creative writing/fiction, Federman has taught at the University of Montreal and the University Of California at Santa Barbara, and at San Diego, and is presently a Professor of English and Comparative literature at SUNY-Buffalo.



Novelist, poet and critic, Raymond Federman, will be on campus for two days to lecture and read.

In the Dictionary of Literary Biography Yearbook, Welch D. Everman says of Federman's fiction, "Building on the work of Joyce, Celine, Beckett, and other twentieth-century masters, his fictions are fascinating constructs that combine a brilliant style, unorthodox typography and a masterful new approach to the development of characters and literary structure." He calls Federman's novels "literary events," and adds, "Federman questions the very nature of fiction."

In an interview with Contemporary Authors, Federman said, "I write to gain my freedom and hopefully to liberate my readers from all conventions. Anything goes because meaning does not precede language, language produces meaning. There is as much value in making nonsense as there is in making sense; its simply a question of direction."

When speaking of his own work, Federman alludes to a critical study which he wrote, Journey to Chaos: Samuel Beckett's Early Fiction. He says, "My entire writing career has been a Journey to Chaos."

Federman's talks will be held in the Sophie Kerr Room. The discussion "Contemporary Fiction, Here and Elsewhere," will be at 4PM on Monday, October 16; the fiction reading will be at 8PM Monday; and the talk "The Voice Within aVoice: the bilingual writer as self translator," will be at 8PM Tuesday.

Philosophy scholar speaks about feminism in USSR

by Stephanie Hess
Staff Writer

The William James Forum presents "Feminism and Justice in the Soviet Union," a lecture by James Sterba, Professor of Philosophy at Notre Dame University, who has recently returned from a year in the Soviet Union.

Sterba, who spoke to the Forum about five years ago on "How to Make Men Just," is a very prolific writer, whose books include Morality in Practice, Contemporary Ethics, and How to Make Men Just. These and several of Sterba's other works can be found in Miller Library.

Sterba graduated with a BA from LaSalle University in 1966, and did graduate work at Duquesne and the University of Pittsburgh, where he attained his MA and his PhD. In the past, he has been a liberal arts fellow at Harvard Law School and the President of the North American Society For Social Philosophy. He is presently a full professor at Notre Dame University.

Last year, Sterba was awarded a full grant to teach courses on peace and justice in the Soviet Union, where he lived for a year in Latvia with his wife and daughter.

As a writer about justice, Sterba was very interested in and paid special attention to the liberalization activities in the Soviet Union under the leadership of Mikhail Gorbachev. He noticed that despite the other liberation movements, there was no feminist movement going on in the USSR right now, and was curious why.

His talk on Wednesday night will address the question of why there is no feminist movement, and will also discuss when such a movement is likely to emerge.

Knowing that he would be in the area next week speaking at schools in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, Sterba called the organizer of the William James Forum, Professor Peter Tapke, and asked if he would like him to speak in the Forum. Tapke, who said Sterba "gave us a fine program before," accepted the offer.

Sterba will speak on Wednesday, October 11 in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library at 7:30PM. Admission is free and the lecture is open to the public.

Works in new exhibit transcend traditions

by Jennifer Del Nero

Sponsoring its second art show of the fall semester, WC Arts Exhibits Committee presents Maryland Art Place (MAP) with a collection of recent prints by well known regional artists, opening on October 11.

Pyramid Atlantic and Brandywine are the two workshops from which Jan Howard, Baltimore Museum of Art curator, collated the prints displayed in the MAP show.

Says Art lecturer Tex Andrews, "It'll be an interesting show, an interesting cross section of contemporary printmaking techniques that include traditional printmaking techniques."

Andrews adds that the prints on display aren't merely images, but "examples of process" that "transcend traditional aspects of prints where they're all identical." Traditonal prints involve only one process, such as etching or woodblock, whereas contemporary prints are combinations of processes.

As he describes the show, Andrews emphasizes the materials used by the artists, specifically the handmade paper, explaining, "The handmade paper is further evidence of the kind of care these people exert on the process itself."

To Andrews this awareness of resources can be credited to the crafts movement where artists "get intimately involved with their materials." He notes that artists "are beginning to show more care for their material."

Baltimore Sun Art Critic John Dorsey reviewed the print show last May and wrote, "There is everything from David Chung's expressionist linocuts (Pool) to Kevin MacDonald's series of three delicate seascapes (Untitled , a pulp painting with colored pencil) to Charlie Risselada's White Map in cast paper that has the effect of a reverse relief sculpture...."

In his write-up, Dorsey also reviewed the prints of Gillian Brown, which are based on old photographs and said Brown "creates works that have to do with the persistence of memory and the refusal of the past to die." The print to which he referred is a simulation of the background of an old photograph with figures painted in it. The result is the image of a person superimposed on the scene.

One painting by Rick Morris is critiqued by Dorsey as "chilling." It is of a little boy in the middle of a tree gazing at a flying bomb. Morris is an artist with Pyramid Atlantic, which Dorsey believes to be the more versatile of the two workshops.

Both Brandywine and Pyramid Atlantic are non-profit organizations "dedicated to providing collaborative environments for experimentation and innovation in printmaking," as described in an essay of the workshops written by Howard that is included in the catalog of the show.

Brandywine, founded in 1972 in Philadelphia by Allan Edmunds, is recognized for its commitment to minority artists. Howard explains in her essay, "Forty percent of its artists are African-Americans, and its current Visiting Artists series focuses on the work of Native Americans."

Pyramid Atlantic was founded nine years after Brandywine in 1981 by Helen Frederick. Frederick, after being introduced to handmade papermaking during a visit to India, decided to set up her own paper and printmaking shop. Not only is there a Pyramid facility in Baltimore, but three years ago, a second location opened in the outskirts of Washington, DC.

The MAP show will be on display in Tawes Lobby of Gibson Fine Arts Center beginning October 11 with an opening reception at 5 PM and will continue through November 5.

October 6, 8, 9

The Washington College Film Series presents Voices of Sarafina!, about a touring musical production from South Africa. The movie shows pivotal scenes from the musical, which is essentially a re-enactment of the children's uprising in Soweto in 1976, interwoven with the life experiences of the teenagers in the production. The film will be shown in the Norman James Theater at 7:30 PM.

October 6,7,8

The play, for colored girls who have considered suicide/ when the rainbow is enuf, directed by student, Esther Diamondstone, will be presented in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center at 8PM tonight and tomorrow night, and at 1PM on Sunday afternoon. The play is a choreopoem revolving around the lives of seven black women. Reservations are required and can be obtained by calling ext. 269.

October 6

The new campus band, SPG, will play in the Coffee House from 9-1 tonight. Admission is $3 dollars.

October 7

Washington College will rededicate its Dunning Science Building in a Ribbon Cutting Ceremony at 3PM on the campus lawn. Keynote speaker will be Theodore Kurze, class of 1943. Tours of the building and a reception will follow the rededication and ribbon cutting.

October 9

Lucille Sansing, Professor of Sociology and Associate Dean of the College, will present a lecture on "Stress in the American Family." The lecture deals with domestic violence, her area of study as a sociologist, and is part of the Monday Series held in the Literary House at 4:30. Tea is served at 4:00.

October 11

The Washington College Arts Exhibits Committee presents "The Pyramid Atlantic and Brandywine Workshop Print Show," an exhibit of recent prints by well-known regional artists from the Baltimore and Philadelphia areas, on loan from Maryland Art Place. The opening reception is at 5 PM in Tawes Lobby and the exhibit will be on display through November 5. A related article appears above.

Also Wednesday night, the William James Forum presents "Feminism and Justice in the Soviet Union," a lecture by James Sterba, Professor of Philosophy at Notre Dame University. Sterba has recently returned from a year in the Soviet Union. The lecture begins at 7:30 PM in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library. A related article appears on page 10.

October 13 to 16

The Washington College Film Series presents A Taxing Woman, a Japanese comedy with English subtitles, about Japan's dauntless tax auditors and inspectors who ferret out hidden riches from the country's innumerable cheats. It is a convincing look at the pressured vitality of modern Japan. The film will be shown in Norman James Theater at 7:30 PM.

October 14

The Kent County Historical Trust presents its fourth annual tour of historic homes in Kent County, "Three Centuries of Kent." The driving tour features ten homes in the Chestertown and Quaker Neck regions of Kent County, Maryland. For information and tickets, call 778-4195.

October 16 to 19

Washington College Health Services presents a week of films and discussions focusing on National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week. Monday: "The Nature of the Beast: Alcoholism and Addiction." Tuesday: "Within Our House: Effects on Family Members." Wednesday: "Getting High Naturally: Options for Young Adults and Adolescents at Heart." Thursday: "A Blow for Responsibility: Drunk Driving and Breathalyzer demonstration." Discussions will be held in the Coffee House at 7 PM each night.

October 16 & 17

Bilingual novelist and critic Raymond Federman will be visiting the College for a series of lectures and meetings with students. His public talks and readings will include a talk on "Contemporary Fiction, Here and Elsewhere, given at 4PM on Monday afternoon, a reading of his fiction at 8PM Monday evening with a public reception to follow, and a talk on "The Voice within a Voice: the bilingual writer as self translator," at 8PM Tuesday evening. All three gatherings will be held in the Sophie Kerr Room. An article about Federman appears on page 10.

October 18

In an effort to keep in touch with the problems of the student body, President Cater will hold an "Open Season" in the Hynson Lounge at 7 PM on Wednesday evening to answer any questions and address any concerns students have about the College. It is, as the name suggests, open to all students, and attendance is encouraged.

Fund allocation

by Kyndra Ponder

During the SGA's second regular meeting on Tuesday, the club funding for the fall semester was approved as follows:

Campus Christian Fellowship $150, Margaret Horsley Society $600, Foreign Language Clubs French $350, Spanish $ 350, German $350, International House $500+$1000 from school, Resolve Magazine $250 + $150 from Writer's Union, Sailing Club $ 850, Men's Swim Club $350, Dutch-Dumschodt Society $150, International Relations Club $300, Translations Magazine $100+$200 from Writer's Union, Amnesty International $200, William James Forum $1250, Phi Sigma Tau $400 (Philosophy Honor Society), Best Paper In The World $198, Roto Gravure $500+$250 from Writer's Union, Psychology Club $200, GALA $ 25

SGA Treasurer Joe Van Name added that if the clubs run out of approved funds, supplemental funding forms are available and that students who forgot to request funding can still get money from the SGA. For more information contact Van Name at ext. 485.

In addition, the SGA discussed the "Open Season on President Cater". Students will be able to meet with the President and discuss their views about his term. The "Open Day" will be held Wednesday night, Oct. 18 in Hynson Lounge.

Finally, Sophomore Stuart Nieman was appointed as Student Ombudsman for the SCC. Nieman will serve as liaison between accused students and the SCC to be sure that students know their rights.

The Decker Science Center will be rededicated this Saturday. The public is welcome to come to ceremonies. See story page one.

Dunning has also been outfitted with a darkroom, a shop and an environmental room for the biology department. It houses the main lecture hall, three classrooms, and office space for physics, psychology faculty and visiting faculty.

The new wing, the Decker Center, contains four teaching and research laboratories for biology and three teacher laboratories for chemistry.

Major donors for the $4.5 million science complex and its instrumentation include: the A.S. Abell Company Foundation, AT&T Foundation, Black and Decker, the Booth Ferris Foundation, The Brown Foundation, Inc., Campbell Soup Company, Chevy Chase Savings & Loan, CSX Corporation and the Jessie Ball DuPont Religious, Charitable and Educational Fund, the Jacob and Annita France Foundation, the Charles A. Frueauff Foundation, the Noxell Corporation, Olin Corporation, The Pew Charitable Trusts, the State of Maryland, the Starr Foundation and USF&G.

Upgrading Washington College's science facility is part of one of the largest and most successful fund-raising campaigns ever undertaken by any of Maryland's small private colleges. Of a $41.1 million Campaign for Excellence goal, to date the College has raised $38.7 million in gifts, pledges and anticipated endowment. In addition, special gifts not included in Campaign goals total $3.8 million.

Tours of the facility and a reception from 4-5 p.m. will follow dedication. The public is cordially invited to attend.

Ticket holders will enjoy the ribbon cutting at 3:00 p.m., tours of Dunning from 3:30 - 4:30, a Reception from 4:30 - 5:30, Campus Tours from 5:00 - 6:00, cocktail hour at the Hodson Hall Student Center from 6:00 - 7:00, and dinner in Hynson Lounge in Hodson Hall at 7:00 p.m..

October 18 will be Lobster and Steak Night. Speaking of steaks we served 516 Cajun Steaks on September 27. We had very good comments on how well seasoned they were. Hopefully, we will have them again sometime in the future.

Food For Thought

"You are what you eat!" It's true! There's no way around it. What we eat and how much we eat directly affect how well we feel and look.

Our diet can influence our risk of developing life-shortening and typically American diseases such as heart disease, cancer, stroke, diabetes and high blood pressure, not to mention less-threatening problems such as tooth decay, bone fractures, and America's leading ailment - obesity.

Diet affects our physical appearance as well as our emotional and psychological health.

Such subtleties as how well you study and how restfully you sleep can be affected by the way you eat.

Unfortunately, despite a growing awareness of nutrition and wellness, Americans continue to eat too much fat, sodium, sugar and protein.

Hope everyone has a great week. Take care. T.T.

Open Season declared on the President:

Cater hears student criticisms

by Kyndra Ponder

Nearly forty students and faculty attended the Open Season on President Cater Wednesday evening in Hynson Lounge. Open Season was preceded by a Student/Faculty dinner in the Dining Hall. The SGA sponsored the dinner which was met with a positive reaction from students and faculty alike.

After introductions President Cater gave his views on current issues at Washington College. Cater felt that "Washington College has the capacity to be something special," and he highly praised faculty here. In addition, he highlighted some of the current construction on campus and optimistically stated that the fire lane should be complete within the next two to three weeks.

Cater went on to address some of the changes that his "Master Plan" will bring about, including changing W.C. from a "one dimensional campus with a pretty front yard and a rat-tail back street running through it" into a three dimensional college with an impressive entrance and an equally impressive campus throughout.

He apologized for what he described as "not the best season that Washington College has ever had" and hoped that all in all, students might look back and think that the school's actions were right.

President Cater turned the floor over to the students.

During the two and half hours of discussion that followed, three topics emerged which clearly concerned a large number students.

One major theme was the new Washington College alcohol policy. Students felt that the stricter policy contributes to fragmentation of the student groups on campus because most students are under the legal twenty one year old drinking age. In order to drink, then, many students opt to attend private parties or the "special interest" functions instead of one big all-campus party.

SGA President Steve Attias stated that the issue of campus

Renovation plans depend on availability of funds this year

by Sharon Bonner

Extensive plans for the renovation of William Smith Hall, and Hodson Hall will begin to go into effect when Washington College receives a response from the college's request for a state grant. The College has applied for Maryland state funding to cover forty-nine percent of the expenses for renovation of these buildings. To cover remaining expenses, the College will organize fund raising events.

A matching grant was requested to aid in the costs of improving the building construction in Bunting Hall, Dunning Hall, Decker Science Center, Creative Arts Center, and the Eugene B. Casey Academic Resource Center.

Originally, Miller Library was involved in the renovations proposal expected to be funded by the state grant. However, because the college's main priority is the renovations of William Smith and Hodson Hall, the library plans were deferred at this time.

"We were working towards an addition to the library and internal renovations, but over the summer the administration decided that first we needed to make sure we were using the library to its full capacity", explained Mr. Tubbs, of the Miller Library.

Library staff expects to explore other possible improvements to be made without need of funding through the state grant. President Cater has received a proposal consisting of the first estimate for installing additional shelves to provide more book space. Suggestions are currently under discussion for rearranging of space in the library to create more room for periodicals and books to be placed.

The renovations of William Smith include improving the landscape in the rear entrance to the building, repair work, and the renovations of the entire basement.

Renovations in the basement incorporate: refinement of the electrical system, installation of a new heating system, increasing of classroom and office space, and installation of elevators for the handicapped. The lighting system and stage area in Norman James Theater will also be upgraded to improve William Smith Hall.

Plans for Hodson Hall renovations consist of: establishing a student study center in the space presently occupied by the bookstore, and remodeling the Coffee House and Snack Bar. Some additions in the Coffee House will be air conditioning and providing of handicapped accessible entrances.

The student study center will provide comfortable seating, and an atmosphere for study other than in the library. The fireplace, set in the bookstore when it was previously a student lounge, and the floor of the bookstore will be restored.

"The Student Study Center is proposed to relieve study pressure in the library, and it is located close enough to the library for students to make use of both facilities.", said Clint Baer,

Students and local business work together

by Jennifer Del Nero

Washington College's first student owned and operated delivery service began early this fall in conjunction with Subway, a local fast-food franchise.

The Sho'men Delivery Service, comprised of junior Frank Cabreja, president of the business, and sophomores Jason Imber and Ed Schroeder, treasurer and public relations respectively, debuted September 18.

Although Subway ran its own delivery service with its employees last year when the shop first opened, that practice was terminated over the summer. Subway National management prohibited all deliveries by its franchises because of an accident that had occurred elsewhere in the country involving a pizza deliverer.

Cabreja explained, "It's a liability thing."

He remembers Glenn Tosten, co-owner of Chestertown Subway, discussing the effect of the decision on him. "Glenn had told me this would take a toll on Subway by the end of the year." Not long after the conversation, Cabreja approached Imber and Schroeder with the idea of forming a partnership.

The Sho'men Delivery Service then drew up an independent contract with Tosten and his partner Michael Bonnett.

The life of the contract lasts one semester, at which time it can be renewed, amended or terminated. Also included is a clause specifically stating that during the life of the contract, the

Open seasons need more student attendance

Wednesday night's "open season" on President Cater was a successful and informative forum where students voiced their concerns about everything from heating in dormitories, to the alcohol policy, to the fragmentation of the campus social life.

The turnout of more than 30 people was impressive enough to maintain an ongoing discussion in an informal setting, but that number pales in comparison to the 800+ students who have a stake in Washington College. Ironically, student apathy was one of several issues addressed in the forum.

It doesn't matter that attendance was comparatively low, because 30 people are enough to accomplish things, to act on the concerns which were raised at the forum. Still, I know there are more than 30 people out there who will voluntarily deliver a lengthy monologue on the ills of the College, the bureaucratic bull, and so on. For one reason or another, they passed up a golden opportunity to address the head bureaucrat himself!

Why? It's a testament to the student-faculty-administration gap. Perhaps some students are wary of these forums, suspecting them to be more of an exercise in public relations than an genuine effort to improve the College.

Cater was attentive to what students were saying at the forum, so the public relations theory is a moot point; we'll see if there are changes and improvements in the alcohol policy and board policy, for example, and then we'll know whether the open season is worth our while. It is, judging from Wednesday, worth the effort.

The open season is an excellent tool for administrators to reach out to students, but, of course, students must respond in kind with their attendance in order for these forums to fulfill the potential shown on Wednesday evening.

According to members of the Student Government Association, we can look forward to future open seasons with various administrators. Be there, and have your ammunition ready.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by The Elm.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Police reports: public has right to know

To the Editor:

In response to Tanya Cunic's opinion editorial, in the October 6, 1989 issue of The Elm, I can say this-Ms. Cunic does not know very much about the politics of the real world. In the real world people are held responsible for their actions (except for the government since they are not the real world).

If someone breaks a law or ordinance, whether they are punished or not, their peers and the community have a right to this information. It is not just "freedom of the press." If a student is arrested or fined for distributing drugs, the community has a right to know about it. If Ms. Cunic feels this is spreading rumors and not public information just how far do we expand this boundary of not reporting it? If a student is arrested for rape, do we not report it? Is that spreading rumors? I say the public has a right to know.

I understand that there are individual rights and someone arrested or fined may not want it published, but what about the individual rights of those in the surrounding community?

Ms. Cunic is right to say that a police report on someone's record may affect their nor getting a job. It is the employer's right to know the criminal history of a possible employee and also the responsibility of that employer to note the substance of that police report. Violation of a noise ordinance will most likely not affect whether or not the person gets the job.

Ms. Cunic criticizes The Elm for putting the correction on page two in the corner. This is standard practice not only for the Elm but for any major newspaper. No major newspaper makes a major news story out of a correction. That is also standard practice.

Furthermore, I am confused by Ms. Cunic's statement about the people who are in the police report. She stated that they "do not shudder at the thought of having their names published in the newspaper." Then why is she making such a big deal about the police reports? If the people in the police reports are not writing to the editor to complain, then no one should be doing it for them. Also, how does The Elm "cast stones" by printing plain facts?

Ms. Cunic stated that this college "thrives on new, fresh (and often outspoken ideas," this letter is just one student's opinion, although I know I'm not alone.

Julie Greene
Sophomore

Writer angered by "butchered" article

To the Editor:

I am angered and frustrated to the extent of being speechless. I ask a simple question: Why should I contribute my time and thoughts to The Elm when my words will be butchered? It is especially devastating to me because I carry such a passion for R.E.M., and I devoted time, now apparently wasted, writing my article only to have it completely screwed. I enjoyed writing my article; I did not enjoy reading what was printed in The Elm (or what was not printed).

God forbid printing an article as the writer has written it. When I questioned the editor of features about what had happened, her comforting reply was: "I don't know. Maybe something happened when I cut and pasted it?...I didn't read it before it went to the printer." Now I ask what is the obligation of an editor? Are they not responsible for what is printed in their particular section?

I value my writing, even if The Elm does not. I can't wait to see how this letter is jumbled.

Sincerely,
Kimberly Coburn

Editor's reply: The error was due to a regrettable combination of computer error and human error, not intentional "butchering" on The Elm's part.

However, Miss Coburn refused to give equal gravity to the time and thoughts of the Features Editor, preferring to consult the Editor-in-chief directly. Consequently, the Features Editor was unfamiliar with the final editing the article received when she pasted up her pages.

At any rate, The Elm apologizes for the error. The article should have read as follows:

"Any night sitting on saturated dirt in forty-five degree weather listening to Mike Mills, Peter Buck, Bill Berry, and Michael Stipe is "the finest of hours" for me. R.E.M. played Merriweather Post Pavilion on Saturday, September 23rd, and you may have guessed that I didn't have pavilion seats; I had so-called "lawn" seats (it was like playing King of the MUD hill). It was obvious that R.E.M. is nearing the end of a tour that has been much too long.

When I saw them on April 7th in West Virginia, I was more impressed. Michael Stipe didn't tell the crowd to "shut up" nearly so much. He also didn't get pissed when people reached out to touch his damn feet. The show on Saturday night was the same show as in West Virginia-minus energy. In April, when the band played "Stand," Stipe jumped onto a platform and did the dance from the video. He ran around the stage, stood on amps, gave the crowd a show . . . something to watch. This past concert, he tended to sing with his back to the crowd; this was a show to hear rather than watch-it should have been both."

ISSUE: At mid-semester, do you find that the academics at Washington College are fulfilling your expectations?

College allows students curricular freedom

Kyndra Ponder

I transferred to Washington College after spending a year at Loyola College in Baltimore. As soon as most people find out I am new here, I am usually hit with the inevitable question, "So how do you like it here at WC?"

Well, as I'm sitting here trying to draw a conclusion about WC, I think that, all in all, I'm going to like it here. Socially, it's a little boring, but then again Chestertown is just not Baltimore! Academically, I'm really happy here. Having just finished midterms, I think I can make that statement safely.

To be truthful, when I looked at the school and found out that four classes made up a full schedule, I thought, "Well, I've got it made. Next year will be so easy!"

At Loyola, I took five classes and two four-hour labs each week.

Since I've enrolled, I've found out that those four classes are just as consuming as my five classes were last year. I don't spend quite as much time studying, but then again, reading Beowulf or Utopia is very different from trying to understand biology, chemistry or integral calculus!

Last year, I really hated almost every minute I spent in a classroom. My major was so competitive, that just to have survived freshman biology and chemistry was a big accomplishment. The professors seemed to be more interested in completing their research than in teaching students, and as a result, nearly 60% of the students failed out of the pre-med program by the the end of the first semester! In all fairness, most of the faculty at Loyola was great. I just think that the general spirit of Loyola is much different than it is here.

The faculty here are far more nurturing than most I encountered last year. The professors in the English department whom I have been in contact with this year seem more interested in teaching than in publishing articles to gain tenure. I feel that graduating with a B.A. from WC will be a sign to me and to those I will encounter that I have looked for the best qualities in myself and have worked hard to enhance them. I think that is the spirit of WC and I definitely think that is the spirit for me!

Most of you, I will assume are familiar with the distribution requirements here: one full sequence in each of four areas and a second sequence in one of the areas of your choice. I think that is great. The system allows for a great deal of personal freedom but still lets students experience a little of everything. At Loyola, students also take classes to fulfill core requirements. Unfortunately, the classes are strictly regimented. Students must take the specified course in World History, US History, Freshman Writing, Sophomore Literature, Philosophy, Ethics, Theology, Math/Science, and Sociology/Psychology. There is not much time left to study art, music or drama.

After one year at Loyola and six weeks here, I really am not sure if I can fairly judge academics at WC. I have taken one midterm and written two papers and I feel comfortable with them. I could have never said that last year—especially in my major! I think Washington College is equally as demanding of its students as most other selective colleges—but I think what it demands challenges students in different ways. A combination of factors here—the Honor Code, teacher attitudes, distribution and even senior comps. demands students to demand the most of themselves. I definitely think I'm going to like it here!

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

Janice Bohlinger
Frankfurt, Germany

I really like the faculty and the way the professors get into contact with the students. They care and they encourage everybody to come to their office hours and talk about problems. On the other hand the educational system is very different from the German one: I miss the opportunity and encouragement for free and personal thinking and ideas.

Jim Seeley
Greenwich, NJ
Freshman

I find the academics at WC very adequate to what I was looking for. The professors look to help, rather than just giving grades.

Sally Haynsworth
Columbia, S.C.
Freshman

I am very happy here with the academics. Some classes are more challenging than others, but overall I feel challenged by all my classes. There is a lot of outside work but I feel I'm getting an extensive view of the courses. Now that midterms are about over, I know what the teacher is expecting and how to prepare for the class.

Merideth Gibson

I'm happier now then I was in the beginning because now I know what to expect of my teachers and what they expect of me. I think I'm a lot more adjusted now.

I feel that up till now the academic side of life here at WC has been challenging, yet not overpowering, allowing me as a freshman to develop in other aspects of college life.

Brian Simpson

Freshman-Transfer

I was surprised at how difficult the academics turned out to be at WC. It's the only school I know of where you can take 2 years of school and still be a freshman. If that's not intense then I don't know what is.

High school expectations blend to form a true idea about college

Michelle Harrison

Does the academic scene at Washington live up to my expectations? That depends on what my expectations were and how they were formed. If you really think about it, we develop our expectations of college in high school. Do you remember all the wild exaggerations you heard as a high school freshman or sophomore? "The academics are so hard. The subjects you study are simple, but the way they teach it to you will make you think you have to be a rocket scientist to just pass the course!" "You have to pull all-nighters every night. After all that work, you probably will flunk anyway!" These exaggerations made practically all underclassmen cringe at the thought of college. How many of you told your parents they could save their money? "I just won't go to college!"

But then, as juniors and seniors, the partying attitude settled in. The next extreme of exaggerations began to creep into the ideas of college. "You'll love college! It's so different from high school; you don't study every night. In fact, you don't have to study at all. You pay all that money; they have to let you graduate. And what's even better is that instead of partying on Fridays and Saturdays, you party all the time! College is one huge party!" Who hasn't heard that story before? Fess up! Finally, about the time of graduation, these two extremes blend together to form a true idea of college life. The academic life is difficult, but you don't have to study all night every night. You have to study and work hard! Then, on the weekends, PARTY!

Now, the question is "is that what it's like here at Washington?" Yes and no! You do have to work hard, but the courses don't seem to be extremely difficult. Of course, there are a few exceptions. Ugh, physics! I never liked it in high school, so why did I take it here? Well, it keeps me on my toes and thinking. It is one of those subjects that does not come naturally! As for my other courses, they are pretty easy. I don't think they are simplistic. I understand the lessons perfectly (so far). That is what makes them seem easy! I thought that I would be struggling more than I actually am. I would like a little more of a challenge, but I do not want to overdo it! It is very similar to high school, with the exception that there is more time to study and get involved with extracurricular activities. Altogether, I think I am going to like it here. It is not too demanding! It could be more so, but I'll settle for this. After all, I've only had 1 1/2 months of classes. I have over 3 1/2 years left to prove my opinion wrong!

Panamanian Daze:

Coup leader's widow: "The next time, he (Noriega) has to be the first to be killed."

Laura Hopper

This man has more lives than a cat. General Manuel Antonio Noriega is sitting pretty in Panama after the aborted coup attempt on October 3. The attempted coup, which lasted approximately five hours, was led by Major Moisés Giroldi Vega. Although the coup failed, and Major Vega's wife and forty Panamanian officers were forced to flee to Miami, the repercussions are just beginning to take effect in Washington and Panama City.

In Panama, the dictator remains in power. He is hardly popular. During the coup, the rebels led by Major Vega broadcast a message on a state controlled radio station announcing the retirement of General Noriega. In response to this, several parties broke out in different government ministries, and civil servants tore down an oversized portrait of the dictator. The puppet ruler of the Panama, President Francisco Rodriguez, did nothing to aid the man who placed him in power.

The failure of the coup may be attributed confusion among the rebels, and confusion in Washington. In Miami, a participant in the failed coup told of how he and others involved were informed of the coup only hours before it occurred. In Washington, President Bush found himself reading contradictory material on the situation in Panama due to his desire to receive information directly from the US Embassy in Panama, the US military in Panama, the State Department, and the CIA. There were various reports that the coup's leaders had General Noriega and wanted to turn him over to the United States, or that they had Noriega and were going to kill him. What the US was not prepared for was the rebel's plan to send Noriega into a forced retirement in the Panamanian countryside. And unsure of rebels' plans, they were unable to provide adequate support.

The failure of the coup finds Noriega firmly entrenched in power, and US officials fear for the lives of those involved in the coup. Regarding the fate of people involved in a coup against Noriega last March, one US official in Panama said those caught in March were tortured until they were nearly "turned into vegetables." Following the failure of the coup, Noriega is expected to crack down and has announced a new group of "war laws" that will give him even more power.

In Washington, the repercussions concern the handling of the attempted coup by the administration, which is under fire from some members of Congress for its handling of the coup attempt.

The president has promised a reevaluation of crisis management. The goal of this reevaluation is to make it easier for US officials to question participants in coup attempts, and to inform them of US objectives. The prime US objective in Panama is the ouster of General Noriega and his deportation to the US to stand trial on drug charges.

But the chances of Noriega surviving a successful coup attempt are unlikely following the comment of Adela Bonilla de Giroldi, the widow of Major Vega, "The next time, he has to be the first to be killed."

Vice Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Senator William S. Cohen of Maine stressed the need for clear guidelines on permissible conduct for American personnel involved in coup situations. There is a presidential order that prohibits officials and agents of the American government from participating in assassinations, and consequently some congressmen have complained they are unsure to what extent American military personnel and diplomats can offer advice and assistance to the leaders of potential coups against undemocratic governments.

Regardless of the results of the White House investigation into crisis management, the fact remains that an opportunity to get rid of a parasite was missed. Whether or not another opportunity comes along remains to be seen. In the meantime, the president's credibility among other nations in Latin America is at stake. If the Administration was unable to support a coup against Noriega, who has been a thorn in their side since the Reagan Administration, then why should the president of Colombia believe the president's promise of support in Colombia's war against the drug cartels?

News from the world:

UNITED STATES:

An earthquake measuring 7.0 on the Richter scale struck the San Francisco Bay area on early Monday afternoon. The earthquake was centered twenty miles north of Santa Cruz on the San Andreas fault. The earthquake has knocked out power, water, and telephone service to the Bay area, as well as causing highways to buckle, and one of the segments of the upper tier of the Bay Bridge to collapse trapping motorists.

Early reports from San Jose indicate that some buildings have collapsed, and other appear to be in danger of collapsing. AT&T has asked that people do not attempt to call into the Bay Area, but rather that they wait for people to call out instead.

In San Francisco's Marina district, buildings collapsed, and a gigantic fire broke out. Fires were also reported at the University of California at Berkeley. Policemen and emergency services officers warned residents to turn off gas and electricity, store water in bathtubs and not to expect utilities for atleast three days.

The quake struck at 5:04 in the afternoon, during the rush hour, and has caused the cancellation of the third game of the World Series. Cracks in the structure of Candlestick Park as well as the power outage led to the cancellation.

Vice President Quayle, who is currently visiting the West Coast, has decided to stay out there. He is in San Diego. Scientists say this earthqauke is as large as the one that struck Armenia last year. It is the largest earthquake to hit the San Francisco area since the city was nearly destroyed in 1906

Since the Supreme Court ruled on July 3 in the Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services to grant states the right to impose greater restrictions on abortion, or even ban it altogether, abortion has emerged as a very emotional issue for many Americans.

It was returned to the forefront last week as several state legislatures and the House of Representatives considered the issue. In Florida, Governor Bob Martinez made five proposals for tougher laws, but all five were quickly killed by the legislature. This incited both pro-choice and pro-life demonstrations in Tallahassee. Then, two days later, Democrats in Congress urged President Bush not to follow through on his pledge to veto a bill allowing the Government to pay for abortions for poor women whose pregnancies result from rape or incest. Such cases would demand a negligible amount of federal aid, as they account for only 1% of all abortions.

Having espoused strong anti-abortion views in his campaign, President Bush does not want to seem self-contradictory by not vetoing the bill, but at the same time does not want to alienate pro-choice voters.

U.S.S.R.

The Communist Party leader of Azerbaijan, Abdul Rakhman Vezirov, ended the rail embargo against Armenia by signing a pact with the unofficial nationalist party, the Popular Front of Azerbaijan. Vezirov met the most radical of the demands detailed in a protocol with the Popular Front: arranging for the passage of a new sovereignty law. The law would allow Azerbaijan to defy federal authority, but more importantly, to secede from the Soviet Union. This nationalist crisis, as opposed to that in the Baltic States, is not fueled by the desire for independence, but rather, for the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh, an Armenian enclave in Azerbaijan. While the majority of the population of Nagorno-Karabakh is Armenian, Azerbaijan claims the land as it is geographically in its republic. The issue has locked the two republics in a bitter dispute for the last 20 months, and spawned a "potent mass movement" which united workers and intellectuals in Azerbaijan. Most recently, Azerbaijan cut off the flow of goods from the city of Baku to Armenia with a train embargo, crippling the Armenian economy. The embargo ended, Azerbaijan nationalists still threaten to secede "as a last step" if the land they claim is not returned to them.

HUNGARY

The Hungarian Communist Party last week voted to transform itself into a socialist party and assume a dramatically different program as well as a new name, the Socialist Party. Important changes agreed upon by delegates were more democratic procedures for choosing the leadership and new organization in which members would be voters and "not be a flock of sheep following a bellwether." Also, they agreed to do away with the Politburo, Central Committee and the post of General Secretary, now occupied by Reszo Nyers. Nyers, in power for only 2 months, would lose virtually all his influence. He has repeatedly been opposed to reforms and pursued a more hard-line policy. Other disenchanted hard-liners announced 5 days after the watershed vote that they were forming their own Communist Party. Roland Antonwewicz, leader of the new opposition group, said the new Socialist Party has rejected all the fundamentals of Communism. Specifically, he noted the call for free parliamentary elections next year, the growing tolerance for opposition parties and the move towards capitalist elements in the economy.

Notes from a freshman on dorm experience

Living, surviving, and attempting to wash laundry in Kent House

by Raphael Koster

Early Friday morning at the pay phone:

Ring .Ring.

-Hello? Maintenance?

-Yeah, listen, I live in Kent, and...

-I know, I know, but people actually do live in Kent, you know.

-Well, I just happened to be walking by, and I noticed the lobby is flooded.

-Uh, yeah, flooded.

-Well, I think the washing machine exploded. I was doing my laundry and...

-Well no. I know it's four in the morning, but...

-No, I,didn't expect you to come over immediately, but...

-Next Thursday? Okay. Sure, I don't care. I mean I just live here.

-No, man seriously, I do live here...

So, what's wrong about the above conversation? First of all, Maintenance is hardly going to come over in just one week. Second of all, they sure wouldn't answer the phone at four in the morning. Third of all, people in Kent do care about their laundry. After all there is a sign on the door about it: "Will the censored who stole my censored laundry please return it censored now?????"

Welcome to idyllic life in Kent House, haven of hapless hippies, loads of lacrosse players, boatloads of beer drinkers, and oddly enough, the Freshman Class President.

Kent has an unsavory reputation among the upperclassmen: some because they know what has happened in past years, and some because they helped do it. It is know as the drinking party dorm: a dangerous to be on weekend nights, when drunks wander the halls freely, grab you by the collar, breathe in your face and hoarsely ask you where Bill lives.

During the day, it is reputed to be quieter - probably because the inhabitants are all sleeping off their hangovers. Well, this article is meant to shatter some of these stereotypes and to describe what life in Kent is really like from the viewpoint of someone who lives there.

First of all, the guys living in Kent do attend class, sometimes. After all, classes are the reason they can't do their laundry until four in the morning - during the day the machines are occupied, and people start going to bed around three, so the machines are free after that. Classes taken by Kent men range from calculus to 400-level English courses, Music to Chemistry.

So you see that contrary to public opinion, there are students in Kent. Just because they may not have time to study doesn't mean they aren't students.

Secondly, people in Kent are not all dangerous when drunk. There have only bee two broken windows this year, and only one of them was actually punched out with a bare fist. Besides, he apologized afterwards and promised to pay for it. Of course, they aren't fixed yet, but it's not Kent's fault that Maintenance doesn't dare set foot in the building.

I would also like to point out that everyone in Kent knows everyone else. People might think of us as sticking to our hall or our friends from home who happened to get stuck here too, but that's just not true. We have gatherings of Kent people! The steps are a favored spot to have a few laughs, yell loudly, and keep a watch out for security.

I remember a couple of weeks ago, during that false fire alarm, how we all gathered at the steps (those of us who were in condition to walk) and wondered who had set it off and how we were going to kill him in the morning. So we enjoy cordial relationships with each other.

Life during the average Kent day is quite normal: people stumble out of bed five minutes before their 8:30 class, maybe wash their faces, run out the door, forget their books, and so on. Walking the halls, music adds to the atmosphere. Who cares if it changes every time you amble past a door? It's variety, right? And it's clearly audible!

People in Kent are great. Everyone says hi to everyone else, and continually bang down other people's doors hoping to join them in a friendly computer game, or borrow their printer, or get them to fix their MacPlus, which keeps bombing mysteriously. It is after all, the home of the avid BroadCasters; Asmodeus, Archangel, Big 10-Inch, Kingsnake, Barney and John Wayne.

The RA's who actually choose to live there, are uniformly helpful when it comes to hall problems, and they become friends of their charges quickly. One is so popular he already has a WANTED poster on his door!

I don't want to hear any more bad rumors about Kent. There are great things in this dorm, and we, the inhabitants, can't let them spoil because of some pesky inconveniences like broken windows or exploding laundry.

After all, the stolen shirt was recovered, eventually, and the guywho broke the window won't have a scar. These things are no more than minor bobbles in the tranquility of Kent House, and shouldn't be made to stand for the whole dorm.

Ring. Ring.

- Hello, Security? Listen, I'm in Kent, and...

-No, I'm not turning myself in for anything.

-Well, you see, someone seems to have ripped the wiring out of the ceiling on the second floor, and it's sparking all over the place.

-Whaddaya mean, call Maintenance? They can't come 'til Thursday!

-Well, what is it with you guys? You come when you aren't wanted and never when we need you!

-No, this isn't a crank call. I actually live in Kent and I am asking Security to come over.

-OK, well, then, see ya...

So don't judge Kent by what you hear. We aren't anonymous names that go by that collective name of a building. People actually do live in Kent, and we're not afraid to say so, or tell you about it.

Thank you, and good night (it is four in the morning, and my laundry is done...)

Spending junior year abroad in Europe

by Jane Horsefield

So, you want to spend your Junior year abroad. Great! Great idea! After all, going away for a year to a foreign country can be the most incredible experience of a lifetime. Seeking out adventure in strange new lands, learning to communicate with people of another culture, and tasting fine native cuisines. These are superior reasons for wishing to go abroad. Not to mention a year away from Chestertown can do a body a world of good!

But how does one go about finding a suitable way of pulling off a year abroad? While I certainly do not have all the answers, allow me to give you a few basic pointers that helped me during my year in France.

First of all, the best way is to find a "study" program in the foreign country where you would like to stay. This will allow you to carry on the luxurious life of a student and earn credits while you travel and experience the specialties of your new home. Don't worry too much about having to work so hard that you will not have any fun. Most Junior year abroad programs, while they do place an emphasis on academics, are liberal enough to allow you the flexibility and free time you need to truly experience a new culture. In my case, I took five classes (all of which were in French) and had a job as an English assistant, yet I rarely felt overtaxed with work. Also, it was true most of what I learned during my time in France was not taught to me in classrooms but was knowledge I acquired simply by living and opening myself up to different people, places and things. I often felt I learned more in a one hour trip to the market than I did in a three hour lecture at the university.

When choosing the country where you will live for an entire year, please reflect on what you are doing. The decision you make will have everything to do with the type of experience you will have, good or bad. For instance, it may seem to you a very glamorous idea to go to Dakar, Senegal for a year. But if you don't speak French, don't like hot weather, and have a hard time eating anything other than hamburgers then this would not be the best place for you to go.

I would also like to emphasize if you choose to go to a non-English speaking country you must not expect to pick up the language right away. I had studied French for six years before I went to France and was amazed at how little of the spoken language I understood when I first arrived.

Even after being in the country for months, I still found myself struggling at times to understand and make myself understood. This came as a big shock to my friends and me since we had expected to be "fluent" within the first month of our arrival. When this did not happen, we began to hate the word "fluent." We started calling it the "F word" and cringed and whenever one of our friends at home would ask, "So, are you fluent yet?"

It was then we would start to feel more than a little disheartened and wondered who had ever told us it was going to be easy. We each remembered someone must have told us at some point it would not be easy. But it was not easy, not at all. And we were often left wondering why we were there, and why hadn't someone explained to us how difficult it was really going to be. Why didn't anyone fully explain what it is to leave your home and all familiar surroundings in exchange for an incredibly different country where the people don't look, speak, act, or even smell like you do? Why didn't anyone mention how much the homesickness hurts at times (especially when it is the first time you have spent the holidays away from your family)? Why didn't anyone tell us not everyone in the world likes Americans? Why didn't anyone mention people in banks and post offices can be some of the nastiest, most miserable folks? But most importantly, why didn't anyone ever instruct us in the proper ways of using a bidet? These were some of our chief concerns at the time. They may seem trivial or silly, but they were our anxieties nevertheless.

My aim in expressing these questions we shared is not to whine. I simply wanted to say what no one ever said to me when I was a sophomore. That is, "Doing your Junior year abroad is one of the best things you could ever do in your lifetime because you will never be this young and this free ever again. But it is also one of the largest challenges you have probably ever taken on in your very short life, and IT IS HARD!" There, I said it. I have done my duty and can now rest easy with a clear conscience.

My best advice to anyone who goes abroad, especially in Europe, is to TRAVEL! Do it as much and as often as you can because god only knows when you will have the opportunity to do it again! Don't sit around on your butt when you can be out seeing and doing something exciting! Don't worry about studying. Don't worry about money. Just get out there and experience life in another world. When at last it is time for you to return to the boring old US of A, try not to get too bummed out. Eventually you will get the hang of things American style once again.

Seeing ourselves as saviors of the world

by Katherine E. Absher
Staff writer

I was born in the summer of 1969; it was the summer of love, the summer of the first moon landing, and the summer when the Vietnam War raged to no foreseen end.

In 1969 Nixon had served one year of his term in office, and although the debauchery of Watergate would not climax until 1974, I have no recollection of the scandal. The disillusionment that permeated the United States during my infant years did not invade my childhood.

The anniversary of the signing of The Declaration of Independence in 1976 marked my first sense of nationalism. With the American flag forming the backdrop, my classmates and I dressed in red, white, and blue for our class photos; we practiced "It's a Grand Old Flag" and learned our first square dancing steps for the school's bicentennial pageant. In my six-year-old mind, the US was flawless, ranking with God and Santa Claus.

Because my history classes never covered material beyond World War II, and my encyclopedia really couldn't convey the pain a man experiences when he is cut down by machine gun fire, my six-year-old interpretation of the purity of my country lasted. It lasted until I blew a kiss to a portrait of Ronald Reagan and boarded a plane to Australia.

In January of 1987 I was chosen to represent the Rotary Club of Fairmont, West Virginia as their outgoing exchange student. On August 17, 1987 I flew to Tamworth, New South Wales Australia. Upon arrival, I quickly understood that not only was I representing a minuscule rotary club from the mountains of West Virginia, but I was representing my country, my flawless country.

To the Australians the US was not flawless. Suddenly, I was thrust into a school uniform and ushered into a year 11 history class, dealing with the beginning of the twentieth century to the present. Unlike my American history class filled with the flamboyance of General MacArthur and the bravery of US marines at Guadalcanal, I was taught that the US was responsible for World War II in the Pacific for they ignored Japan's first aggressive act of invading Manchuria.

Required to read a biography of Ho Chi Minh, I learned of Minh's compassion for his people in their long struggle for a nation. I learned of his several failed attempts to contact President Truman to solicit the US's help against French imperialism because he saw a parallel between America's revolution against Great Britain and Vietnam's revolt against France. Minh's basing his Vietnamese declaration of independence on Jefferson's Declaration of Independence. further proved to me the blindness of the American government.

From the Bay of Pigs to the Iranian Hostage Crisis, I learned of the bumblings of US foreign policy. Although I rebelled against this interpretation at first, my country tarnished before my eyes.

Outside of the classroom, my patriotism dwindled further. When I visited Sydney, US ships, carrying nuclear weapons, docked in Sydney Harbour, and American sailors poured onto the streets, instigating fights and trying to pick up women. The scene was so stereotypically American—another example of the US's reckless attitude toward the feelings of citizens of foreign countries.

As I watched the Stars and Stripes flutter from the masts of the ships, automatically I began to sing "It's a Grand Old Flag" to my Australian friend. I belted out "Every heart beats true on the red, white, and blue, and there is never a boast or brag"; my friend quickly interrupted me with, "Never a boast or brag- - you've got to be kidding."

With that statement, the last of my patriotism crumbled. Seeing my country as an Australian and not as an American, I was not pleased by the view.

Upon returning home, some of my patriotic feeling reappeared, but the US, to me, is no longer flawless. As East Germans swarm into West Germany, and Glasnost pervades the Communist world, I believe the necessity of heavy defense spending has ended, and our nation should look past the arena of superpower politics.

Nations are now warring economically, not militarily, and the US is falling behind. Defense spending should be redirected into public education and the economy. With this redirection, the image of the US seeing itself as the savior of the world will die, and other countries will truly be our friends and not just our allies. As the bloodiest century of human history ends, a new century begins, and I hope that human nature will finally realize the immorality of war, and Americans will realize their imperfection.

Soccer team getting hot at right time

by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

Coach Tom Bowman's preseason prediction of success for the men's soccer team is beginning to look promising. The team has won their last five games and six of their last seven, led by a combination of brilliant defense and solid offense. The men now have a record above .500 for the first time this season, and the team is on a roll just in time for the stretch run.

The team started their hot streak in a 1-0 conference victory over Western Maryland on October 5th. Peter Van Buren scored the game's only goal in the first half on an assist from Scott Smith. The WC defense took it from there, led by seven saves from goalie John Thomas. The victory over Western Maryland raised the team's record to 4-6.

Bowman's squad creeped one victory closer to the .500 mark two days later in a game against Albright. Tom Bowman supplied the team's offense, tallying a goal in each half. Ken Hutchins and Enrique delPrado assisted on Bowman's goals, which proved to be the only scoring of the game. John Thomas ran his shutout streak to two games in the win.

Ursinus was the next Sho'men victim, and the team played their best game of the year in the victory. Both teams were held scoreless in the first half, but Washington College exploded for three goals in the second half and a 3-0 lead. The Sho'men dominated Ursinus both offensively and defensively, outshooting their opponent 16-4. Van Buren, Mike Bishop and Benji Ward scored the goals, with assists from Bishop and Ken Hutchins. The defense played brilliantly in front of John Thomas, who was only required to make two saves in the game. This was the goalie's third straight shutout, and the team raised their record to 6-6.

The fun continued last Thursday as the Sho'men won on the road, defeating Gallaudet 3-1. The offense peppered the Gallaudet goal with 18 shots, scoring twice in the first half and once in the second half. Andrew Prevost and Van Buren tallied goals in the first half, and Bishop drove home a penalty kick to end the scoring. Van Buren, Prevost and Hutchins were credited with assists in the game. John Thomas allowed a goal in the first half, but the defense shut down Gallaudet's offense in the win.

Only four games remain in the regular season, and the Sho'men hope they can maintain their level of play from the previous seven games. The next three games are against Haverford, Widener and Johns Hopkins, and the team hopes to continue their solid play. The Sho'men must win these games to secure a spot in the MAC playoff picture.

Women tune up for Rolex

by Fred Wyman
Special to the Elm

The Washington College women's tennis team has played extremely well within the last few weeks, showing the talent that should have them contending in their division in the spring. The team took the unofficial team title at the sixth annual Catholic University Tennis Classic, then played well in a loss to Division I opponent Villanova. Coach Holly Bramble was happy with their performance, and the team seems prepared for the women's Rolex Tournament to be held this weekend in Fredericksburg, Virginia.

The Sho'women outpointed seven other schools at the Catholic Tournament. The team was led by some great individual play. Tracy Peel continued her solid play in both doubles and singles. Peel did not drop a set as she won the #1 singles title. With the win, she also remained undefeated against Division III competition.

Meg Wheatley also gave an excellent performance in the #4 singles bracket, capturing the title with her superior baseline play. Her championship victory over Catholic's Jenny Dowd took three sets and avenged her defeat in last year's final. Monica Blanco also reached the finals in the #2 singles competition.

The team performed equally well in doubles play. Blanco and Peel were runners-up at #1 doubles, while sophomores Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice took the championship in the #2 doubles competition. The title match took three sets, but Dittman and Rice were able to defeat Mary Baldwin's #2 doubles team by a score of 7-6,4-6,6-4.

Their next opponent was Division I power and Big East team Villanova. The Wildcats' victory raised their record to 19-5, but the Sho'women still played very well in defeat. Tracy Peel was especially impressive, defeating Villanova's #1 singles player Sue Bernardi in three sets. Peel dropped the first set 6-3, then won the next two sets by scores of 6-3,6-4.

The other two victories over Villanova came in doubles matches. The #2 doubles team of Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice won in straight sets, while Marty Rougher and Meg Wheatley were victorious in #3 doubles. The #3 doubles match was extremely close, with the WC duo winning in a third set tiebraker. This match, coupled with the team's victory in the Catholic University Tournament, suggests that the women's tennis team should make a strong showing in the Rolex Tournament this weekend.

Gewer and Read win Rolex, move to national tourney

by Fred Wyman
Special to the Elm

Larry Gewer and Scott Read rolled onto victory at the highly competitive Rolex Eastern Regional Small College doubles championship recently, solidifying their position as one of the top tandems in Division III. This was their second Rolex title in the last three years, and the win earned the duo an expense-paid trip to Minneapolis for the National Small College Championship to be played this February.

Gewer and Read were the top seeds in the tournament, a position that earned them a first round bye. The tandem rolled over their opponents in straight sets in both the round of 16 and the quarterfinals, then met their toughest challenge in the semifinals against Millersville's Oliver Merrill and Mike Kennedy.

The WC duo won the first set 6-0, then dropped the second set 6-4. Gewer and Read fell behind in the final set 2-1, then took five of the next six games to win the match.

The victory moved the doubles team into the finals, setting up a match with Concordia College's #1 doubles team. The Washington College doubles team played well in the first set of the final, taking a 6-2 lead. Perira was troubled by cramps and forced to retire after the first set, giving Gewer and Read the victory and the trip in February.

The tennis team also made a strong showing in the singles section of the tournament. Read also participated in singles, reaching the quarterfinals before losing in three close sets. Freshman phenom Alberto Diaz also made an excellent showing in the tournament. Diaz defeated three Division II players to reach the quarterfinals of the singles competition.

The Rolex Tournament brought the tennis team's fall season to a close. Read and Gewer will return to the courts for the National Small College Championships in February, and the team resumes play in early 1990 in pursuit of another division title.

O's in '90: Why not?

by Greg Coss

I know you're tired of hearing this, but the Orioles had a great year even if they didn't win the AL East. Forget about The Pitch by Gregg Olson in the first game against Toronto. Erase the memory of The Inning in game two, where the bullpen's wildness caused the O's downfall. The Orioles should have won these games, but O's fans still have every reason to be proud of a team that could dominate the 90's. Although the Orioles appeared to be a team of destiny this season, I believe it was their destiny to come up short. This miracle season will alert other teams to the O's bright future.

The '89 Oriole slogan poses a good question - Why Not? This is a young club that just went through the heat of a pennant race and maintained their poise. The Orioles will have starting pitching in Ballard, Harnisch, Milacki and Johnson. The staff was erratic at times, but they were brilliant down the stretch with some clutch performances. The bullpen should remain strong with Olson, Williamson and Hickey.

I also feel Ben McDonald will be used in middle relief instead of as a starter. Why? The O's middle relief was ineffective this season. A McDonald-Olson tandem in the bullpen could be devastating. This would also allow the team to make the Schmidt and Milligan for Mattingly trade that was talked about for half the season. I think the O's would be foolish to make the trade and give up youth in Milligan.

Youth abounds on the Oriole roster, and they need this type of team to realize their potential. It will be a team filled with young pitching and fast outfielders in Anderson, Bradley, Devereaux, Finley and Orsulak. The Orioles, with the signing of McDonald and a deal for a middle reliever, should be a team with no holes. Jay Tibbs should return to give the O's an excellent five-man rotation. Pitching, offense and defense should combine to lead the Orioles to a division title in 1990. Why? Why not?

Field hockey stays at .500

by Jennifer Stickney

The Washington College women's field hockey team continues to hover around the .500 mark as the season winds down. The team lost 4-1 to Catholic , then followed the loss with a 2-1 victory over Lebanon Valley.

The team started quickly, tallying their lone goal early in the first half. Carolyn Athey scored on a pass from Amy Tiehel, giving the women a 1-0 lead. Catholic struggled in the first half, failing to score until seconds before half.

Catholic University started the second half with an increased intensity, bombarding goalies Brigid DeVries and Erin O'Neal with nine shots on goal. WC's goalies played well in the second half, but Catholic eventually able cashed in on their opportunities. Catholic scored three straight goals in the second half, giving the team a 4-1 lead they would never relinquish. Still, coach Diane Guinan was positive about the team's performance.

"Washington College played an incredible first half," Guinan commented. "We played with a style unmatched to date this season. We passed the ball well, shot well and controlled the game. Unfortunately, a couple of injuries and a score by Catholic created a different style of play. We became more conservative and played Catholic's style."

The team displayed their resilience once again in their victory over Lebanon Valley. The Sho'women played well early, taking the lead on a goal by freshman Marie Mohler. Carolyn Athey was credited with the assist at the 32:57 mark, giving the team a lead they would take into halftime. The women expanded their lead to 2-0 at the 31:07 mark of the second half on a score from Jenifer Blenckstone. Lebanon Valley pulled to within one goal, but Brigid DeVries made some of her eight saves at crucial moments to salvage the victory.

Coach Guinan was very pleased with the team's performance. "This was a big win for us. Lebanon Valley competes in the Pennsylvania Region of the NCAA and were ranked eighth in the last poll. Our team played well together and maintained our efforts throughout the game."

The team plays their last regular season game at home this Saturday against Western Maryland. This game should be an indication of the team's progress this season while also preparing for the MAC playoffs. Coach Guinan and the players hope that they can come alive at the right time and perform to their capabilities in the playoffs.

Volleyball readies for CWAC

by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

The women's volleyball team has been extremely busy over the past few weeks, swamping their schedule with two tournaments and three meets. The team has played well in this stretch, maintaining a solid position in their division. The team is 16-12 with four meets and two tournaments remaining.

The team won seven consecutive matches in early October, raising their record to 13-5. They dominated a dual meet with Marymount and Swarthmore, losing only one game in their two match victories. The WC Invitational was the next meet for the team, and they breezed through the early rounds. The women whipped Gallaudet in an important match, then defeated Scranton and Washington & Lee without dropping a game. Their first loss of the tournament came against perennial power Wilmington, but the women still reached the semifinals. WC lost to Gallaudet in the semifinals, finishing fourth in the Invitational. The team performed well in the tournament, and they seemed ready to improve on their 13-7 record.

The women dropped their next meet against Western Maryland. The team lost the match in three straight games, but they played well in defeat. Their next meet was the Gallaudet Invitational, a tournament with a very strong field. The team came in fourth out of a field of ten, a place that pleased Coach Fall. Their victories came over Methodist and Christopher Newport, with losses to Gallaudet and Guilford. The team still managed to make it to the semifinals, where they dropped another match to Western Maryland. Guilford defeated the Sho'women in the consolation match, lowering the team's record to 15-12. The team got back on the winning track this past Tuesday, defeating Franklin & Marshall in three games.

Coach Fall and the players are preparing for the CWAC tourney that takes place the weekend of October 27-28. The team seems destined to play Gallaudet in this tournament, and the result of this match could have a profound effect on Fall and her four-year seniors realizing those goals they set a few years ago.

Crew team opens season

by Brett Lankford
Staff Writer

The men and women of the Washington College crew team officially started their fall season two weekends ago with their race at the Head of the Connecticut. Both the men's and women's varsity eight boats raced in Connecticut, and coach Don Chatellier was happy with the team's performance. The men's varsity eight came in 20th out of 38 boats, finishing 52 seconds off the pace. The women's eight also did well, finishing 11th out of 22 boats. Both the men and women rowed strong races and showed promise for the fall season.

The women's crew team spent last weekend in Philadephia at a Navy Day Regatta, sending a varsity four boat and a novice eight boat out on the water. The varsity four rowed a strong race, finishing fourth out of the seven competing boats. The novice eight highlighted the day, however, winning their race. Despite the fact that they only raced against two other boats, coach Chatellier said the victory was a positive experience for the novice women.

This weekend the team travels to race at the Head of the Charles. This is a prestigious race, and Chatellier was overjoyed to be competing on the Charles. "Many boats apply to get into the race and very few are allowed to enter. It is quite an honor to be invited to the Charles." This should be one of the most challenging races of the year, and it should give an indication of the talent present in the crew program this year.

Renowned pianist to perform in Series

by Jennifer Del Nero

Acclaimed by critics and compared to the likes of Leon Fleisher, Dinu Lipatti and Arthur Schunabel, pianist extraordinaire Paul Maillet honors the Chestertown community tomorrow evening in the Washington College Concert Series' first performance of the fall semester, sponsored by the Peggy and Yale Gordon Trust.

Performing on stage gives Maillet a natural high. In an article written by David Patrick Sterns of USA Today, Maillet was quoted as saying, "Once on stage and going, that's where I feel the most alive.

"All those insights and magical moments, something that went well one day and something that went well another day, it all happens, concentrated in a performance," said Maillet, describing the thrill of performing.

Salt Lake City's Desert News music critic Dorothy Stowe described Maillet as "displaying impressive artistry, versatility, and musical individuality...." His performances have taken him around the world, including Europe, South America, Canada and Mexico and throughout the United States as well.

Some of the orchestras for which Maillet has performed as a featured soloist include the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, the San Antonio Symphony, the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra of the University of Nueva Leon (Mexico) and the Heidelberg Festival Orchestra.

When Maillet debuted with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, Scott Duncan of the Evening Sun referred to Maillet's playing as possessing "poise, insight and musicianship...." A year later Duncan praised him as a "pianist of superb refinement" after attending Maillet's performance at St. John's College in Annapolis.

Of Maillet's performance in the San Antonio Festival, Larry Barnes of The San Antonio Light wrote, "His recital...overwhelmed the audience with a deep, unchallengeable musicality....The pianist wove tapestries of intricate lace, circling and enclosing the melodies with an air of refined dignity."

This past season Maillet performed in a solo recital at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, DC. From DC, Maillet traveled to France, where he was a featured soloist and chamber musician at the Chateau La Gesse Festival near Toulouse. His visit to France came about from winning the Le Gesse National Competition.

After returning from France, Maillet received an invitation to appear at the 1989 Keyboard Festival and Competition, sponsored by the New Orleans Institute for the Performing Arts, where he participated as a featured soloist, teacher of master classed and judge for the competition.

Besides winning the Le Gesse Competition, Maillet won first prize in the Sherman Clay Steinway Piano, Yale Gordon Concerto and Eastman Concerto Competitions. He was also a prize winner in Leeds International Pianoforte, University of MD International Piano and Ginal Bachauer International Piano Competitions.

Critic Gordon Sparber in the Columbia Flier explained what he felt made Maillet such a rare performer. "One always gets the feeling that Maillet is listening, filtering and streamlining in performance. The kind of bombast that so many powerhouses build senseless careers upon is alien to this patrician player."

The concert will be Saturday at 8PM in Tawes Theater. All full-time WC students will receive free tickets for the concerts sponsored by the Concert Series.

Turchi to read from new novel

by Teresa Cropper

On Monday, October 23 at 8PM, the Sophie Kerr Committee will present Peter Turchi reading from his recently published novel, The Girls Next Door. Turchi, a 1982 graduate of Washington College, was the Sophie Kerr Prize winner that year, and to date is the only winner to have a novel published.

Turchi grew up in Rockdale, a small suburban community in Maryland, and has been writing fiction since he was in grade school. In an interview for The Accent, Turchi said, "I remember writing little short stories for Highlights magazine."

Turchi was a student of Randallstown High School and while attending Washington College, he contributed to the Broadsides Series, the Washington College Review and was an editor of The Elm.

The Girls Next Door began as a short story while Turchi was still a student at Washington College. The original title was "The Girls of Summer," and in an interview with The Accent, he tells the story of when he first showed the rough copy to Professor Robert Day. "He looked at it about two weeks. Then he said, 'this is a very long piece of work.'" To be exact, it was 212 pages, single-spaced.

"The Girls of Summer" as well as several poems and essays were included in the portfolio which Turchi submitted to the Sophie Kerr Committee.

The money from the Prize allowed Turchi to complete an MFA at the University of Arizona. From there, he reviewed movies for a Tucson newspaper for two years before moving to Chicago, where he now resides. In Chicago, he divides his time between lecturing in fiction writing at Northwest University and working on his second novel.

The Girls Next Door takes place in Baltimore in 1963. It is about a young married man and the complications that arise when a group of prostitutes move into the house next door.

According to The Accent, "The Girls Next Door is based on an incident that [Turchi has] known about all his life. A couple of girls did move into the house next door when his mom was pregnant with him."

In addition to reading from his novel Monday at 8PM, Turchi will participate in a panel discussion on "Surviving as a Writer: Life after the MFA" held Monday afternoon in the Literary House.

Sweeney Todd: obsession, murder, revenge

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

Murder and revenge are coming to Washington College in the grand musical style of Stephen Sondheim's Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street. Directed by senior Drama major, Peter T. Johnson, the musical opens on October 26.

Musical direction and orchestration is by Geoffrey Girard; Thomas Andrews is set designer and technical director; Johnson is the lighting designer. Wendy Kloiber is the stage manager and Wendy Snow designs costumes. The production features John McDanolds as Sweeney, Kate Bennett as Nellie Lovett, and Drew Elburn, Felicia Shakman, Jason West, Brendan Casey, Roxanne Seubert, Denise O'Connell and Ed Schroeder in other major roles.

Johnson was considering this musical as his senior project since the summer before his junior year. He calls it a "musical with a message" and says, "it's not something you expect from a musical and I respect it for that. It has a great score and I think Stephen Sondheim stands alone as the greatest lyricist for the musical theater ever."

The legend of Sweeney Todd goes back to nineteenth century London, and the musical was adapted from a play of the same name, by Christopher Bond. The music and lyrics are written by Sondheim and the "book" is written by Hugh Wheeler.

The Broadway production of Sweeney Todd opened on March 1, 1979, in what is now the Gershwin Theater. Hal Prince, director of Phantom of The Opera, directed the show, casting Angela Lansbury and Len Cariou in the leading roles. The production ran for roughly 585 performances and won eight Tony awards.

The Broadway set represented London during the Industrial Revolution and the theme of the show centered on the Revolution. Johnson explains that the Broadway production was directed as a "Brechtian parable of class structure," adding, "our production team is going for a more human, intimate approach to the material."

This intimacy is partly achieved through the set, which is not nearly as huge as the Broadway set, and makes the production more accessible to an audience.

Johnson says the "play is about obsession; all the characters are obsessed with something. Through the movement, lighting, costumes, and other aspects of the production, I am trying to achieve the action of obsession."

In addition to the nine main roles, there is a company of thirteen men and women whom Johnson uses as "narrators and observers, like a Greek chorus."

As the musical director, Girard has his own interpretations of the production, which he calls an "ugly play about an ugly world."

He sees the music as "an outgrowth of Sweeney's own mind" and claims pessimists will see this show as an expression of our own world. He compares the music to the dionysian chaos of an early Wagnerian opera.

Through the music, he perceives Sweeney as a "man who has been pushed to the limit by the overwhelming, chaotic forces around him."

Girard's orchestra includes two flutes, one piccolo, a cello, a euphonium, a saxophone, two keyboards and a percussionist.

This is not the first time Johnson and Girard have worked together on a musical; last spring they collaborated on the Apple Tree, a one act musical which they produced in preparation for Sweeney Todd.

When asked how the earlier production prepared them, Girard said, "it helped develop a relationship between musicians, music and Peter and I."

Johnson said the Apple Tree helped, but did not completely prepare him for the work involved in a full scale production. In response to a question about the progress of Sweeney Todd, he said "it's a tough show. We are working hard and it is all slowly coming together."

Sweeney Todd will be presented October 26 and 27 at 8PM in Tawes Theater. Tickets are free and reservations are not required.

Turchi's first novel: a fresh change

by Timothy J. Madison

If Peter Turchi's first novel The Girls Next Door were a human being, it would be the type of man who would invite you to settle down on his front porch, pop open a beer and watch the sun go down. There is a gentle humanity about the novel, a love of things familiar and simple that is rarely found in novels of today. It is set in suburban Baltimore during the summer of 1963, a time when America is still poised on the brink of a decade of social upheaval and bitter disillusion with the American dream. George Willus is a young husband who has been nurtured on clean, straightforward American values - he is one of eight children who were named after the 1927 starting line-up of the Yankees. Trouble begins for George when three young prostitutes move into the house next door, making George question for the first time the foundations of his marriage.

Although Turchi's novel examines the eroticism of everyday life, the true subject of The Girls Next Door is far removed from sex; the novel is about a young man coming to realize his niche in the true order of things. The real question is whether adventure lies in temptation or commitment. As George begins to question his own role as curator of the family's extensive mythology, his own actions seem to take on a greater weight and importance. The Girls Next Door is a rare novel in that it is not about excess; it is about the unknown wealth of meaning beneath the surface of apparently mundane things - within the familiar there is usually the truth.

The primary magic of Turchi's fiction is his ability to find what is true and interesting in apparently unheroic, everyday characters. Both Turchi and his characters have the ability to say a great deal without saying much at all. The Girls Next Door isn't one of those rampaging, hyperbolic novels which dominate the market today; there is wonderful economy of prose coupled with wealth of thought and emotion which seems doubly remarkable from a debut novel. It's both funny and sad because it is true and takes genuine pride in being so.

In many ways, this novel seems like it should be cloying - aren't we all a little bit tired of hearing about the metaphysics and spiritual truths of baseball? Yet none of these nostalgic, front porch values seem manufactured or outdated. Beneath all the gentle humor, there is a very sly intelligence at work here. Wisdom and innocence can coexist in equal portions. Turchi scrutinizes the nature of commitment: commitment to a wife, commitment to family and commitment to an ideal. This is a welcome change from Stephen King's latest "99 Different Ways to Terrorize a Nuclear Family" novel or the super-slick "Privileged Youth in New York Takes Drugs" novel.

The real promise of a novel like The Girls Next Door is the promise of a young writer who is a craftsman of clean, economic prose and a lover of detail. The Girls Next Door leaves its reader with a certain faith that there are characters like George Willus and writers like Peter Turchi who still care about them.

Student safety:

facility tour dispels myth

by Ed Schroeder

Editor's Note: Dr. William W. Tubman, Jr., head physician of the Upper Shore Mental Facility, guided an Elm reporter through the hospital last week. Tubman wanted to respond to recent claims that the facility poses a hazard to Washington College students and local residents alike.

On September 6th a patient escaped and came into contact with a Washington College student, who, though physically unharmed, complained to hospital and college authorities as well as the local police. Sophomore Lisa Woodcock was reportedly knocked down, not by the patient, but by male nurses who were in pursuit.

The facility itself goes under the title of the Upper Shore Community Mental Health Center and is located here in Chestertown on Scheeler Road. According to Tubman, it has been open the last eight years and has serviced 3,000 patients. On each day of operation, one person has been discharged, and one admitted.

All patients are on a 30 day program at the hospital, staying there because of drug rehabilitation, loss of a loved one, depression, attempted suicide or other psychologically related problems.

"Our people have really done nothing wrong," Tubman emphasized. "They are not criminals, they are here because they have a problem and they are looking for a way to deal with it."

The facility is usually filled to capacity with patients and is so successful that it sometimes does not have the room for all the people who need immediate medical attention. Tubman added that should a situation arise where Upper Shore has no room, they are quick to send the person to another facility that will service their needs.

"I feel the size is good here at the institution," Tubman commented. If they turn patients away it is an effort to maintain quality care. "It's small enough where I can keep in contact with most of the members of the facility, patients and staff alike."

The facility is set up into units that correspond with the different counties of the area: Kent, Queen Annes, and the like. In each of these units there is a specialized work force that is designed to help each of the voluntary patients.

Each wing is filled with 32 beds, four of which are in single rooms and 8 of which are in double rooms. Most of bathrooms are shared and each patient is given a closet in which they can keep all off their belongings. Three social workers, two psychiatrists and one psychologist work each wing with a team of nurses.

The nurse station is at the beginning of each hall. The station is actually a glassed in office so that the staff can see if there is any commotion or problems with patients.

Nurses do not wear a specific uniform, as in most of hospitals; rather, they work in plain clothing to show the informality of the situation. Tubman cited that this subtlety helps patients focus more upon therapy instead of on the restricting formalities of a regular institution.

"We like our patients to feel that they are at home," Tubman said. "We try and give them luxuries so that they can be more relaxed, more at ease with the staff that is here."

The patients have several facilities available to them in the way of educational and recreational activities. The units have access to a quiet lounge, a TV lounge, kitchen facilities, a dentist office, beauty salon, a library, an art center, and a dining hall. The dining hall is one of the most unique areas because staff and patients eat together.

The facility brings teachers from around the area to talk to staff members and the institution encourages college student activity; many post graduate students are educated in their focused studies at this hospital and many undergraduate students volunteer.

"I bring classes that I teach here as much as I can," Tubman said. "At first some of them are intimidated, but that fear is lost after they are introduced to the concept behind it."

Tubman and his staff are planning to build a greenhouse in the future because, as the doctor puts it, "It will serve as a place where the patients and staff can learn together. It can be a growing experience, planting, nourishing and then even possibly selling some plants to make some money for our institution."

Tubman wanted do dispel the myth that the mentally ill are also always criminal or dangerous.

"Mental illness is a disease, it's just like getting a cold. Where a pharmacy can offer the cure for a stuffed up nose, we can offer a cure for someone who's not sure what is going on in their head. We encourage the community not to let mental illness scare them, our building is always open if someone wants to see what it is all about."

"We are ranked 7th in the state out of a 110 other facilities by the Governor of Maryland," Tubman said. "Obviously we must be doing something right."

Cater predicted that cross walk construction should be complete within the next two weeks. see related articles on page one. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

Sho'men Delivery Service may not offer its services to any other individual or organization nor can Subway hire any other delivery service.

However, if either party is dissatisfied with the other's business behavior, the contract can be canceled immediately.

"This [clause] was introduced to protect both of us," said Schroeder.

These students not only deliver to on campus residents but to off-campus students as well. Within the community, Sho'men delivers to the police department, Kent and Queen Anne's Hospital and the Upper Shore Mental Hospital near Kent Plaza.

Cabreja views Sho'men as a "positive social action." Adds Schroeder, "When students work with the community, it promotes positive relationships and only strengthens our ties."

Although the service is appreciated by many, Subway employee and WC junior Chris Hansen points out, "A lot of people don't understand the full concept of the delivery service." In particular, they don't understand the additional fee.

Since the service is independent of Subway, the deliverers are responsible for their own wages. For each delivery made, Sho'men charges a one dollar service fee contributing toward the salaries of the partners.

There have been some who have complained about the extra charge, but Imber said, "If we're going to take our time and use my car, paying an extra dollar for it [the delivery] is not too much to ask."

On an average night, Sho'men delivers twenty orders, but once the weather gets colder, the partners expect business to pick up. "When it's cold, [the students]

Students attend Homeless March

by Jen Golden

On October 7, there was a march and rally for the homeless in Washington, DC. Under the Housing Now! campaign thousands marched, including several Washington College students, onto Capital Hill. US park police estimated attendance at 40,000. March organizers estimated attendance at 200-250,000.

Stephen Lorenz, a senior from Alexandria, VA, was one student that went. A transfer from Rutgers University, Lorenz describes the event as "Great, with a good mix of people." He commented, however, that WC is generally more apathetic than Rutgers, but not necessarily because of size. "We're really sheltered here, maybe because the problems aren't as apparent; we don't have strong racial or housing problems."

Lorenz tried to get a culture van to bring more students to the march but sensed a lack of interest from students and administration. "There was just no consorted effort at this school to go to the rally." Having cited the apparent apathy, Lorenz expressed an interest in starting a Student Action Union chapter on campus, a national collegiate activism organization. According to Lorenz, this would help foster more organized participation in activist causes on campus. Memorable to Lorenz was a speech by Jesse Jackson. "Jesse's great. He really lays it on the line."

Other celebrities involved were Jon Voight, Valerie Harper, Susan Dey and Martin Sheen. Also present were Ohio governor, Richard Celeste and DC mayor, Marion Barry, who was jeered by the crowd.

Lorenz was pleased with the event itself yet was discouraged the next day to see the homeless back on the streets of D.C. However, he realized that the march accomplished a recognition of the homeless problem.

"You have to put things in people's faces before they decide to do something," he said.

unity is a big problem and that, while the alcohol policy may serve to fragment the campus, the Honor Code is something which could and should be used to unite the student body. Attias posed a compromise. If the Administration is concerned about alcohol related misbehavior, then the Honor Code could be applied to social behavior as well as academics.

A second big topic of discussion of the evening involved the Dining Service. Athletes complained that when they go to dinner after practice at 5:30 or 6:00, there is hardly any food left and that what is left has gotten cold or is so picked over that its not worth eating. Carrie Blackburn also asked if student could use missed Dining Hall meals for credit at Mrs. D's or the Coffeehouse? President Cater replied that he would follow-up on student complaints about the Dining Hall and work on improvements.

The third topic which caused a lot of discussion among the students was heating in the dorms. Only three dorms, Cardinal, Minta Martin and Reid, have individual thermostats in each room. Students from the other dorms told about how their rooms are either so hot during the winter that windows need to be open constantly or the rooms are freezing. Cater promised to look into the problem and possible solutions.

Other topics included Student/Faculty ratio, the possibility of making the Senior Obligation a possible fourth course during the spring semester of the senior year and a special addition to transcripts giving students special recognition for having completed a thesis.

Students also expressed an interest in having additional lighting on campus and the athletic fields. Blackburn voiced another concern over what she called a lack of "SHO'MEN" pride among the students.

Near the end of the meeting Steve Attias updated students on the selection process of the new president for Washington College. Cater assured students that they will possibly be able to meet with the final few candidates and have input into the actual selection.

One of the stages in planning for the refurbishment of Hodson Hall consists of a review on the renovation proposals with the Student Government Association.

"I think it is important that students make their voices heard and opinions known concerning the renovation of the Coffee House," commented Attias.

"The future student center should be a place to bring the entire student body together in a common place and students today can make a difference for students tomorrow."

Renovations for William Smith Hall and Hodson Hall are expected to begin in the late spring, when the state review replies to the college's proposal.

Cabreja, Imber and Schroeder agree they would like to see Sho'men Delivery Service continue in the future, but have doubts about expansion any time soon. They are waiting "to see if we'll need more people or not," as Schroeder puts it. Added Imber, "I see it going in a very large direction....I would like to see it keep going."

Sho'men Delivery Services are available Sunday through Thursday, 9PM to12AM, and Friday and Saturday, 9PM to 1AM.

SGA meets

Most of the discussion at Tuesday evening's Student Government Association Senate meeting centered around the SGA social committee, who announced that three bands will be coming to WC in the near future: Friday, October 20, Bill Breslin and the Swamp Weasels; Saturday, October 21, In the Flesh will appear : New Potato Caboose will play at WC on November 11. All bands will play at the C-House.

Writer-director Lawrence Kasdan (Body Heat) has made a detailed and pleasing adaptation of Anne Tyler's acclaimed 1985 novel about a man who has withdrawn from life in the wake of his son's death. As Macon Leary, William Hurt is often touching and funny. Kasdan has captured the deadpan tone of Tyler's portraiture; the movie is emotionally reticent but it is also very precise and, therefore, never boring. Kathleen Turner is the wife who knows Macon so well that she stifles him, and Geena Davis (who won an Oscar for best supporting actress), is the irrepressibly good woman who pretends that Macon is capable of a full emotional life.

Fire sparks good town relations

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Students, staff and faculty of Washington College were involved in all aspects of helping a local family of four, in need after a fire devastated their home and belongings on Monday.

The fire started when a furnace in the basement exploded; the house, located at 218 Kent Circle, was virtually destroyed.

Junior Matthew T. Weir, a volunteer at the local fire company, said that the station was alerted at approximately 12:25 PM. He, Russ Gardner, Mike Jenkins and Seth Powell (all students who are volunteer fireman) were among those who aided in fighting the blaze.

Students Don Diefendorf and Jim Jenkins, and Sharon Hurd, a staff member at Mrs. Dee's Snack Bar, helped as volunteers to the local rescue squad.

The Chestertown Fire Company and Kent and Queen Anne's Rescue Squad were joined at the scene by fire companies from Centreville, Church Hill, Kennedyville, and Millington. Rock Hall stood by only minutes away. Local radio station WCTR covered the event.

Hurd commended everyone who participated. "They are all volunteers. They had to leave their homes and jobs to respond. I kept thinking that it could be my home, my family, my clothes."

When the alert was dispatched it was thought someone might be caught inside, but when they arrived, Geraldine Hodges, in her seventies, had escaped with minor injuries. Hurd stated that the woman had fractured her left ankle and "she also has other medical problems." Before the day was over, she and five fireman, who were suffering from the intense heat as well as minor burns, had been taken to Kent and Queen Anne's Hospital.

"It was exhausting," Weir stated.

Bertha Cotton of the Red Cross tried to sum up the extent of the damage and the consequences. "They were burnt out. They need everything."

Cotton stated that the family now has temporary housing, but when they find a permanent residence they will need furniture.

Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, approved plans to offer the College's Pennington House to the family for one week, to give them time to find more permanent housing.

Marshall Williams, Special Events Coordinator for the President's Office, made the initial suggestion. Neither is aware whether the displaced family accepted the college's invitation.

Mabel Mumford, Secretary of the Department of Athletics at Washington College and town council representative, was named by WCTR as the individual in charge of collecting clothing, furniture, food, and cash. Mumford stated that individuals desiring to donate clothing may drop items off at Mrs. Dee's Snack Bar. June Costin, of the Washington College Newman Club, also referred to Mrs. Dee's.

Financial contributions should be made payable to The Hodges Fund , and may be sent to WCTR, PO Box 700, Chestertown, MD, 21620.

Anyone who wishes to donate clothing, furniture or money through the local Red Cross should contact Bertha Cotton at 348-5416.

Students play intramural sports on the lawn in the final days of warm weather. This occurs amidst the year's first complaints to maintenance about heating problems. President Cater fielded a heating question at last weeks Open Season. See related article, this page, for his response.

Quick responses to complaints:

Open Season produces positive action

by Gordy Scherer

Last Tuesday, October 24, the Washington College Student Government Association called a special session to order; President Cater had obtained several answers to the concerns and criticisms raised by students at the open season last week.

Cater had taken an active role toward many resolutions and fully intended to communicate his progress thus far at the Tuesday SGA meeting. He also wanted to emphasize continued interest and commitment toward better communication between students and the administration concerning such issues.

Since Cater fell ill prior to the meeting, Sherry Magill, Vice President and Deputy to the President, presented a progress report.

Questions of an unbalanced student and faculty ratio and problems with the current senior obligation system were both referred to their respective committees for review, said Magill. It was also mentioned that in the case of the Academic Council, student representation was lacking.

A major concern of several students was about the Washington College Food Services. Complaints ranged from not having the scheduled hot meal served until closing time, to catered events conflicting with planned student activities.

Dave Knowles, Director of Dining Services, stated that he was not aware of a problem with the meal time. In addition he stated that the catered events were scheduled after his meeting with the social chairmen of the SGA.

It was suggested that the social committee reserve the dining hall well in advance, prior to a confirmation. In addition, a date will soon be announced for open season on Dave and the food service staff.

The second priority of the open season was that of maintenance related problems. Upon completion of the Master Plan, permanent light fixtures will be installed along the new fire lane and the area surrounding the new dorms.

Said Magill, missing lounge furniture is just that—missing. Contrary to popular belief, there is no mysterious warehouse in which new furniture is stored. There was a brief discussion about a grace period in which such furniture could be returned with out any questions asked.

With the inevitability of winter approaching, the problem of heating dormitories was addressed. Complaints ranged from rooms so hot that personal property melted, to rooms that were freezing.

Students at the meeting attested that maintenance quickly

New fitness center proposed, planned

by Susie Mazzullo

Currently, the Cain Athletic Center is where many intercollegiate practices and games, intramural games, and indoor organized recreational sports are held. With all of these activities taking place there is little room left for those who gather for an impromptu game.

A plan for a new field complex may solve some problems as well as provide extra advantages for WC students. The Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, also known as the Field House, is the proposed name for this complex. No target date for construction has been set.

According to the administration, the new structure may alleviate pressure on existing facilities. It may also present students with new health resources.

Can life be sustained without beer?

Here we go again. Students who heard the band at the Coffee House last weekend noted the small audience, ironic given the supposedly lacking social life on this campus. You'd think the whole campus would have been there.

It seems that a significant number of students have chosen to forgo the Coffee House, bemoaning its enforcement of the alcohol policy, specifically the black book used to verify the birth dates shown on suspicious student identification cards (incidentally, the black book is not a new innovation; this is its third year of existence). An establishment is not automatically shielded from lawsuits simply by accepting any identification, false or otherwise. The validity of the ID must be confirmed by the establishment.

The Coffee House is not equivalent to the Vern, Newts, or a fraternity keg party, nor was it ever intended to be, to the best of my knowledge. At one time, a night in the C-House apparently resembled all the negative elements of a keg party. This is why we now have a policy which combines a peculiar mix of strictness with the reluctance to be strict.

It's no secret that the administration would rest easier if the drinking age were 18, and most students would be overjoyed. Until students mobilize to change the drinking age, or until we're old enough to hold government positions, we'll just have to live with the law as it stands.

The current policy certainly is unfair to the majority of us, excepting seniors, who have no firsthand knowledge about what incidents prompted the tightening of the policy in the first place; yet we're the people who suffer the consequences. But the law is the law, policy is policy: it's likely that the rules would have been narrowed for legal reasons regardless of problems in the past.

Why should the Coffee House have to even worry about competing with keg parties? There's a manager who's trying, at least, to provide events to attract students. But, evidently, there are students who find sitting around a keg complaining about the lack of social life on campus more stimulating than dragging themselves into the C-House to be subjected to something which is potentially entertaining.

Preachy as this sounds, it isn't meant as such. It's simply unfathomable that people would choose not to visit the Coffee House because they can't cradle a beer. After all, you can still drink in your room until you're sufficiently uninhibited before you head over to the Coffee House for that evening's entertainment.

Letters to the Editor

Students asked for suggestions to alleviate campus parking problems

To The Editor:

One of the most prominent concerns of Washington College students is that of parking, or lack of it. This issue is not new to the college community. Inadequate parking has been the source of added fustration for many years. The rural location of our college, combined with the inconvience of construction has created an intolerable situation. Now the addition of over 100 additional spaces through the completion of the master plan is threatened due to over budgeting.

There remain, however, several temporary solutions. Suggestions such as restricted lots for specific dorms and parallel parking in front of the Cullen dormatories remain open for discoussion. President cater is well aware of the problem, but states that the college tries to place as few restrictions on the students as possible. The President and student affairs office, in conjunction with the freshman class, are willing to support any reasonable solutions proposed by the students. In addition, the Freshman class is eagar to initiate and organize such a proposal. It is for this reason that all students are encouraged to attend the meeting Thursday, Nov. 1, in the Sophie Kerr room of the library at 8pm. With your essential input, a solution can be reached soon. Let's do something about it!

Respectfully submitted,
Gordy Scherer
President of the Freshman Class

The Christic operation

To the Editor:

Early last year, the Club presented a videotaped speech, about two hours long, by Daniel Sheehan of Washington's Christic Institute. Sheehan laid out an enormous array of criminal charges against named former U.S. officials, accusing them of a thirty-year pattern of criminal racketeering activity.

The students were left with an extremely distasteful "message."

Apparently in keeping with College custom, there was no opportunity for discussion, much less for informed refutation of these charges or the "message" which the Christics and their local allies intended to convey.

The fact that the charges were fabricated, that the case was thrown out of court, or that the Christics have been severely sanctioned for their abuse of the judicial system will doubtless come as news to Club members.

Since that occasion, which was my own introduction to the Christics, I have written a book about the Institute and its La Penca lawsuit. At the risk of disturbing the placid groupthink of the campus, the Club might consider hearing about the Christic operation.

Yours truly,
Dr.Susan Huck

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

OPINION

ISSUE: Are the athletic facilities at WC adequate for a Division III school? What facilities should be included in the Lifetime Fitness Center?

Student proposes ideal facilities

Erin O'Neal

As an athlete at Washington College, let me first say that my needs as a team player are adequately met by the athletic facilities here. But since there is always room for improvement, and I'm being asked what improvements could be made...

First, let's discuss the change necessary in the existing field situation at Washington College. Washington College's outdoor athletic facilities include five fields and the tennis courts, roughly 584,000 square feet, or thirteen acres to maintain. In short, this includes cutting, lining, construction of goals and benches, irrigation, infield maintenance for baseball and softball, aerification, herbicide application, trash removal, and fence installation and removal—and this is in short. Presently, one person is employed and responsible for maintaining all of this. It would be a gross oversight to not include more facility maintenance personnel in our lists of improvements.

Washington College has at its disposal the ability to develop at least three more full fields on "the other side of the tracks." This would mean real practice fields for men's lacrosse and soccer instead of a giant mudhole or destruction of the softball field every year, a field to give the other fields necessary rests, and a real field for REC and Intramural sports. As long as we're dreaming, let's light the fields so that the student body can play REC sports when it actually has time for them—after classes, after dinner, after practice. Even without new fields, the ones we have need protection: a chain link fence to keep out cars and motorcycles that get the strange inescapable urge to drive on beautiful, flat, green surfaces. An emergency phone on both sides of the tracks would be nice. After all, sports are fun, but they're not necessarily injury free.

As a student at Washington College, let me secondly say that the athletic facilities leave a lot to be desired. Sure, there's a fitness center—if you take your own oxygen, because there isn't any in that little sweatbox. The gym is nice, too, if you can beat your way past sweating men playing basketball to the five square feet remaining to do whatever it is you thought you were going to do. But, enough complaints; this can all be fixed by the New Improved Lifetime Fitness Center. The following is a serious proposal that is not only necessary but feasible.

Even for a college the size of Washington, a field house needs three full gym floors with separators between them so that, for example, tennis, basketball, and volleyball can occur simultaneously. Above this giant gym circles an indoor track, and beside it lies on squash court and one racquetball court. The fitness center (weight room), complete with adequate ventilation, not so many mirrors, and a few more bikes, is downstairs among the student, faculty, and team locker rooms which all connect to their own shower facilities. Also downstairs is the dance studio which this time happens to be wider than the average dorm room.

As an "athlete," I can say that Washington College athletic facilities are adequate for my needs, but a field house such as I propose could do nothing but enhance the lives of the entire Washington College community and student body.

The athletic facilities are adequate for a Division III school. Of course they can always be upgraded but as of now they are fine. As for the new athletic center I think they should consider such things as racquetball courts & possibly an indoor track.

No, I don't feel the athletic facilities are adequate but since I am a member of the staff I know that measures are being taken to improve them. In a few years a whole new huge facility will be built. I just wish it was here now.

I feel that the athletic facilities here at Washington College are fine for a division III school, especially the pool. In the new athletic facility I feel that there should be a new weight room and a few more basketball courts.

A Division III powerhouse deserves proper facilities

Greg Coss

There's so much talk about the different sports teams not using their full budgets, and what results from the complaining is absolutely nothing. What I'd like to know is, where does this extra money go? Last year the tennis team only used about half of its budget. Why?

This is the best sports team at Washington College (#4 in the nation Division III) next to lacrosse, and they can't even wear team shirts, they are referred to as "the bandits," or get occasional free string jobs. No need to even mention free shoes or anything else that could help the team. There's no need to blame the head coach, he's the best in the country for Division III and does everything he can to make Washington a big name on the tennis map. He, Fred Wyman, is stressing for the proper facilities for a tennis powerhouse and all the school has is six shitty courts and a mess of used balls only suitable for throwing across 213 and letting your five-year-old child chase!

It's not just the tennis team that is not getting what it justly deserves, but the lacrosse and basketball teams as well. Everyone gets this idea that the lacrosse players have it easy and are treated like kings. But the image they throw out on the field that has gotten them to several Division III lacrosse championships and a final four appearance last year is not an illusion. They are blue collar workers, pushing themselves very hard and not reaping the benefits. Give these guys all the sticks, balls, pads, and jerseys they want. Give them good indoor facilities to practice on the off-season so they don't lose their step in the spring. We're talking about a team that tied Duke last fall. Come on, these guys are good; let's quit jerking these guys around and give them more respect instead of making them pay for a grubby gray t-shirt. And for Christ's sake, get them a real weight room!

The basketball team got to the round of 16's of the NCAA's last year and had one of its best regular seasons ever, winning 20 games. This is a big time program which should not be playing in a gym the size of my high school's. I guess what I'm saying is let's not be afraid to spend some money on athletics for once. Let's quit building different academic buildings for a moment and work on the gym. If it takes a couple of years that's fine, it's worth the wait. Expand the gym, adding indoor tennis courts, a lacrosse training ground, and a larger basketball court. Let's spend those underused sports budgets to help sports facilities for the next couple of years. Besides, do you really think you're going to get any smarter because of a new greenhouse that might be built in 1990?

OK Tammy Faye, start singing the blues

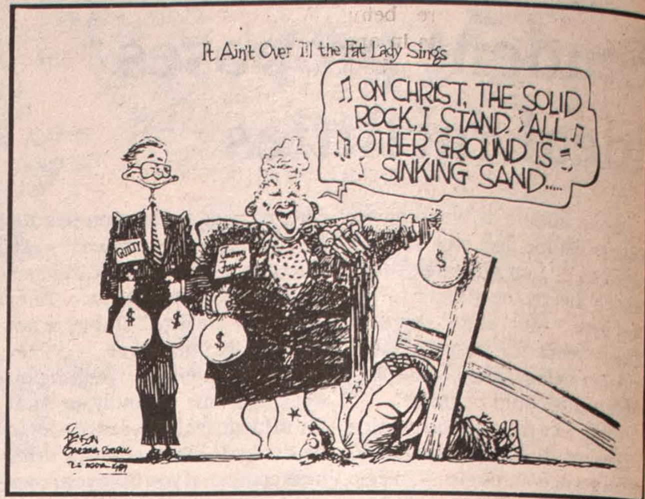
Monday was Judgment Day for televangelist Jim Bakker in Charlotte, NC. Found guilty by a jury a few weeks ago, Bakker stood before the judge for his sentence. When asked if he had anything to say, Bakker replied that he had never meant to defraud anyone. The judge replied that Bakker's seeming lack of remorse over having cheated hundreds of the faithful out of their money influenced his sentence. The sentence was 45 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. Fearing that Bakker might attempt to flee, the prosecution asked that he be taken immediately to prison. The judge agreed, and Bakker was taken from the courthouse in handcuffs to a medium security prison in Alabama. He will not be eligible for parole for ten years.

This should bring the long, soap opera saga of Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker to a close. Bakker's attorney did promise an appeal, and Tammy Faye will probably still cry for the Lord's forgiveness on cable, but for now it is over.

Other televangelists have also experienced problems since Bakker's downfall. Jimmy Swaggart, who was photographed with a prostitute just days after denouncing Jim Bakker, has lost his TV show. Oral Roberts announced he would have to close his hospital and medical school in Tulsa, OK. He has experienced a sharp drop in popularity after telling his followers that God would take him away if he didn't raise four million dollars. But seeing as Tulsa has quite a few hospitals, it is doubtful that it will be missed. Since he disbanded the Moral Majority, revenues are up for Jerry Falwell. And Pat Robertson's popularity has somewhat returned since he went back to hosting The 700 Club, a TV show carried by UHF channels.

Overall, America's romance with TV preachers seems to be over. Good. The idea of someone's grandmother sending her social security check to someone like Jim Bakker is rather nauseating. The idea of him or his wife using it to buy a multi-million dollar home and several cars is repulsive. What the judge gave Jim Bakker in Charlotte was fair. He violated the trust that the faithful had placed in him, and proved, in the end, that he was just as susceptible to greed as anyone else.



It Ain't Over Til the Fat Lady Sings
ON CHRIST, THE SOLID ROCK, I STAND; ALL OTHER GROUND IS SINKING SAND.....

As Bakker left the courthouse, his supporters sang the same hymn his wife had the day he was convicted. It just goes to show, you can fool some of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time. Go ahead and start singing, Tammy Faye.

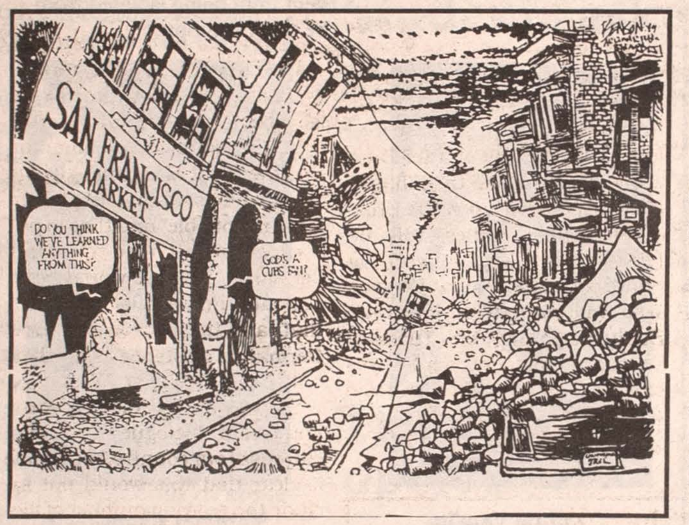
In the wake of the earthquake, life will go on

by Laura Hopper
staff writer

When the earth grinded to a halt last Tuesday, people got up in the Bay area, brushed themselves off and found that, in some cases, life is very different. One insurance company estimated that the earthquake may very well be the most expensive natural disaster in US history. Coming so close of the heels of Hurricane Hugo, which devastated Charleston, SC, the earthquake may cause yet another hike in insurance premiums.

But there is far more damage then what will be covered by insurance companies like Allstate, Farmers Group, State Farm, and Firemen's Fund, many people, especially the elderly, did not have earthquake insurance, and now find themselves without home, possessions or money. Even those with Earthquake coverage will have to pay a large deductable. Many of the people who lived in the mountains around Santa Cruz did not carry earthquake insurance. There have been reports of people setting fires in their damaged homes in hopes of collecting some insurance money. In the Santa Cruz area, mudslides following heavy rains have destroyed many already damaged homes.



SAN FRANCISCO MARKET
DO YOU THINK WE'VE LEARNED ANYTHING FROM THIS?
GOD'S A CUBS FAN?

Money and help are on the way for some victims of the earthquake. The Federal Emergency Management Agency opened its San Francisco centers on Monday, although officials did say it would take days or weeks for people to get money. Even before the center opened, over 4,000 people had already called a toll-free FEMA hotline to apply for federal assistance. The White House announced it was scrapping its plans for an earthquake relief program, and would cooperate with Congress on development of a three billion dollar plan to aid victims of the earthquake. California congressmen are saying that it will take much more to rebuild the damage. In Santa Cruz, it may become difficult to get building permits and building loans for what will be now considered questionable lots.

In San Francisco, rebuilding is slowly beginning. In general, rush hour on the first work day following the earthquake went very well. Officials credit this to efforts to get employers to institute flexible working hours but are worried that such cooperation may not last. Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) also helped. BART's subway system, which runs underneath the Bay, carried 50% more passengers to work on Monday. Ferryboats are also helping to ease commuting problems between the two cities. City officials estimate the Bay Bridge will be reopened in three weeks. One of the most spectacular images from TV coverage of the the earthquake, the two-tiered bridge was closed after the earthquake caused one of the concrete roadbed slabs to fall.

Engineers examining the collapsed Nimitz Freeway say that the freeway's natural resonance may have contributed to its collapse. Comparing it to pushing a child on a swing, they explained that when the first seismic wave hit, it made the two-tiered highway swing slightly. Successive waves hit at just the right times to make the highway swing even more, eventually causing connecting girders to break and allowing the highway fall. Once the roadbed fell, it smashed into supporting columns, knocking large chunks of concrete out of them. Modern highways and overpasses are designed with this concept in mind. But the Nimitz was built in the 1950's, well before engineers knew about resonance. Even so, scientists say it is impossible to predict the dominant frequencies or direction of an earthquake, so a structure that it may be sound during one earthquake may crumble in another.

Life will go on in San Francisco. Tourism, a major source of income for the Bay Area, is very low during what is normally one of the busiest months. But the World Series will resume Friday night in Candlestick Park, and the San Francisco Opera, which moved out of the damaged opera house and into the Masonic Auditorium on Nob Hill, will resume somewhat scaled-down performances. On Sunday, the Opera company gave an Earthquake Relief Concert in Golden Gate Park. Over 20,000 people attended, and brought with them canned food and 18,000 pounds of clothing and blankets. So, in the city by the Bay, life goes on.

International Relations Club adopts new format

by Steven Bruchey

The International Relations Club had its first meeting of the year last week and decided to change its format during the upcoming year: instead of having meetings every other week in a round-table discussion, the group will hold briefings in the future. A member of the faculty or staff will brief the club about a major news event. The topic of each meeting will be posted in the lobby of Bill Smith and in front of the Dining Hall.

On the night of the meeting, the speaker will present a 15-20 minute "run down" of the event, to be followed by a discussion. The purpose of these briefings is to help inform the students about current affairs, to bring a wider variety of people to IRC meetings, and to provide a more formal structure while also adding spontaneity to the meetings. It is encouraged for people to attend even if they only want to stay for the briefings. The IRC is hoping that this new twist in their agenda will boost an interest in the news and try to remedy the lack of available news outlets at WC.

UNITED STATES

Repercussions from last weeks earthquake are being acutely felt by residents in and around San Francisco, CA, both in the form of literal "aftershocks," continued but minor tremors, and in efforts to resume normal lives, and in a general sense of vulnerability. Rescue efforts continue in Oakland, where the upper tier of the Nimitz Freeway crashed onto its lower tier. The freeway's collapse caused the greatest amount of death and injury in the earthquake, and continues to pose residents with the greatest disruption in everyday life. Many depended upon the freeway, which was a major artery linking Oakland and San Francisco, for their daily work commute. The Bay Bridge between the two cities remains closed, so many have taken to travelling by ferry. Thousands remain homeless and an estimated100,000 people in the region are without electricity or mail. However, in many areas this is not the case; many public schools even re-opened this week.

President George Bush said last week that he would veto the bill that would provide Medicaid money to pay for abortions for women who had been the victims of rape or incest. With the veto of the Medicaid funds, abortion in such cases would only be possible for women who can afford it. Many have criticized the president's action as being implicitly contradictory and discriminatory. Bush defended his decision by saying that he did not want to "compound a violent act with the taking of an unborn life."

The proposed constitutional amendment to ban flag burning was brought to the floor of the Senate last week, where it was killed. Though it received a majority vote of 51, this was less than the minimum of 67 votes (the 2/3 majority vote) required for passage. The proposed amendment had been enthusiastically backed by President Bush since the Supreme Court ruled last summer that the flag was a form of political protest that was protected by the free-speech amendment.

EAST GERMANY

The leader of East Germany for 18 years, Erich Honecker was "relieved" of his duties as General Secretary of the Communist Party and chairman of the National Defense Council. Technically, Honecker resigned because of failing health, but ostensibly the flight of over 60,000 East German citizens since August and 135,000 this year must have caused his ouster by what has been termed a "nervous leadership." Egon Krenz, his succesor, perhaps summed this up best when he said, "Problems in recent months have not been sufficiently assessed." The question now is how Krenz will address them.

Honecker was inexorable in the face of dramatic changes rocking the East bloc, refusing West Germany's offer of substantial aid if he undertook "earnest reform." Many say that Krenz will also refuse to grant reforms East Germans are demanding and the West is urging. Krenz has already said that "socialism is not negotiable" and that to put his country under West Germany's tutelage would be to "retreat from socialist principles that are the reason for East Germany's existence as an alternative to capitalist West Germany." Krenz did promise, however, a "dialogue with all the citizens of our country," but made it clear that this would not include the growing number of illegal dissent groups. Some of the demonstrators in the group of over 100,000 demonstrating in Leipzig last week cited the new leaders' connections with the secret police and one woman said that he is "one of the concrete heads"; the stubborn hard-liners.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Sunday Walter Sisulu and 7 other political prisoners were granted "unconditional freedom." Sisulu had spent 26 years in prison because of his campaign against apartheid. His release, as well as that of the others, is part of Mr. De Klerk's program of "evolutionary change." In order to end white domination and the policy of apartheid, De Klerk must confront a system of "many interlocking regulations and customs monitored by an efficient security apparatus." One restriction is enforced by another, and allowing one freedom often means contradicting a restriction. For example, while some are facing court charges for advocating violence, others, such as Sisulu, are allowed free speech. For this reason DeKlerk is facing criticism from both sides; the conservative element who want to maintain apartheid as well as those who want to do away with it.

LEBANON

Legislators this week agreed on a new national charter that would share political power equally between Moslems and Christians, a step which they hope will bring peace to the country, where the two groups have fought bitterly for 15 years. Saudi Arabia sponsored the negotiations and delegates from Syria were also present. Though 58 of the 62 legislators accepted the charter, there was some doubt as to whether or not the military commanders would. General Michel Aoun, who commands the Christian forces, demanded that the 40,000 Syrian troops, in Lebanon since 1975, pull out before he accepts the charter. Shiite Moslem leaders also oppose the charter.

The South Korean siege

Steven Bruchey

Friday the 13th was definitely not a good day to be the US Ambassador to South Korea as six radical students armed with Molotov cocktails and lead pipes raided his home and remained for an hour. During the first few moments of the siege, Ambassador Donald Gregg and his wife fled for safety. The students used homemade bombs and tear-gas to power their way through the police protection that surrounds their residence.

The Gregg's were reportedly awakened by the explosions and waited in their bedrooms to hear where the students were before trying to flee. The ambassador and his wife made their escape while students were causing "considerable damage" to parts of their home, including pouring paint thinner on the floor and threatening to ignite the house if police attempted to overtake the students.

After about fifty minutes, police used tear-gas to overpower and remove the students from the house.

A review of security will determine how to avoid future problems; security for all US personnel in South Korea is expected to be increased.

Ambassador Gregg said that this event will not interfere with US-South Korean relations. Regardless, US officials are worried about the escalation of these types of protest tactics. It seems as though the radicals are losing support within the population. Rallies held over the weekend only received small turnouts.

It is believed that two main reasons for this clash are Gregg's former position as CIA station chief in Seoul from 1973-75 and the importation of American farming goods. The people, especially in Seoul, were irked by the appointment of Gregg to the ambassador post.

Likewise, recent visits by trade officials are infuriating South Koreans by attempting to open and widen markets in South Korea. They fear that these new levels of trade will shatter their economy and make them financially dependent upon the US.

These issues will be forced to a head this week as South Korean President Roh Tae Woo will meet with President Bush beginning on Tuesday. During his visit, President Woo is expected to address Congress and discuss the trade problem.

Soaring high with the arising flying club

by Katherine E. Absher
Staff writer

Circling the plane, we check the fuselage, oil, landing gear, and every bolt connecting the aluminum sheets that make up the wings of the Cessna 152. The pilot quickly lectures me on the instruments, and we hop into the cockpit. Anxiety washes over me; I do not hesitate to fasten my seat belt.

As the small airplane rumbles toward the runway, I breathe deeply. Maneuvering the tiny craft onto the airstrip, the pilot increases its speed, rears the plane on its back wheels, and grasps the wind. Because of the flimsiness of the 152, the walls of the plane vanish, leaving me to the sky.

When the pilot asks me to fly the plane, however, reality quickly strikes me. We are flying a training type of craft equipped with dual controls, enabling both instructor and pupil to steer.

Nervously, I place my hands on the controls. The instructor explains if I pull toward myself, the nose of the plane rises; if I push away, the nose lowers. Keeping level with the horizon, I attempt to persuade the plane to follow my lead.

I am awed by the pilot's trust in me. How easily, with me at the controls, could we plunge to our death. I can imagine the ashen heap of our plane strewn about the eleventh hole of Easton's golf course; ducks in the course's pond munching on bits of my body.

If the engine were to stop, however, at even a thousand feet, the overall weightlessness of the Cessna 152 allows a smooth landing in any emergency landing strip, such as a cornfield or parking lot. And in acquiring a pilot's license, the instructor pulls the engine on the pupil, and the pupil must land in the best sight available. By being cautious and prepared, prudent flyers try to prevent an accident such as this from occurring.

Surprising me further, the instructor orders me to turn the plane around. By now my palms are perspiring like a scene from Body Heat. But they calmly manipulate the plane. It leans to the right, and I have a wonderful view of the very hard ground. The plane responds to the slightest touch of the controls, forcing my movements to be light and gradual.

The pilot explains to me that the gung-ho, macho types he instructs are usually too aggressive with the controls, and it is the more mellow people who have a certain light touch that the airplane's controls respond to.

When I understand the control's delicacy, however, I become a little cocky. Suddenly, I am a World War I flying ace battling the Red Baron or Tom Cruise in his F-14 head to head with the Russians. My cowardliness departs, and I ask my "co-pilot" if he can fly the plane upside down. Taking the controls, my instructor makes the plane leap upward and then dart downward; my heart follows the progress of the plane by first leaping into my mouth and then darting into my stomach. With this, my bravery quickly disappears. I relinquish the controls to my instructor and enjoy the scenery until we land.

This is my very rewarding experience with the newly-formed flying club, which is just getting off the ground (no pun intended) this year.After a great surge of popularity following World War II and the Vietnam War, flying has decreased in popularity. In August, however, the Federal Aviation Administration created a new private pilot's license, dubbing it the recreational license. This license requires less hours and money while learning how to fly, and its specific goal is to increase the number of young adults involved in flying. Therefore, the student organizers of the club feel the time is ripe for this activity.

With its well-trained staff and numerous small planes, Easton Air Service is sponsoring the club. The air service will begin by giving ground classes to students, and then a training airplane and instructor will be flown to Chestertown. The club is not sanctioned by Washington College, but in the future the club hopes the College will offer credit for the course, and that the college will allow an aircraft to be always available for student use.

If interested in participating in the flying club, contact Sean Guinness or Matthew Weir at 778-4478.

Coping with aftermath of Hurricane Hugo

by Amy R. Caddle

Master of destruction. Tempest of torment. Beginning as a tropical depression off the west coast of Africa, it sped across the Atlantic Ocean, gaining ferocity with sweeping 150 mile per hour winds. Wreaking havoc from the Carribean to South Carolina, Hurricane Hugo caused three billion dollars in property damage, 39 deaths, and unprecedented emotional destruction. As students from South Carolina return from fall break, they comment on the aftermath of Hurricane Hugo.

Jennifer Rowe, a junior history major from Sullivan's Island, South Carolina, describes the effects of Hurricane Hugo as "catastrophic." The National Guard began evacuating the island 18 hours before the storm was predicted to hit. Until the storm had subsided, Rowe's family fled to the mainland. "I was really scared for my family," she reveals. "Because all power was out, I was unable to contact them until the hurricane had passed. It was a frightening experience."

135 mph winds and 17 foot waves beat down on the Charleston area, destroying almost everything in its path. "We were very lucky," gasps Rowe. "Our house was the only one standing within a four block radius. Our house did suffer four feet of water damage, and our porch blew off, but it was nothing compared to what the rest of the island suffered."

As officials were planning emergency relief for the area, Hugo even ripped off part of the roof of Charleston's City Hall. This was just one aspect of the destruction; there were approximately 60,000 homeless in Charleston alone, with local schools and hotels serving as shelters.

The National Guard was called in immediately after the storm subsided to return the area to order. Rowe complains that the National Guard expertly evacuated the area, but did not follow through with more help and leadership after the evacuation.

The National Guard was responsible for checking the ID's of the island's residents, and refusing entrance to those without an ID. "After a while, the National Guard got impatient, and just let anyone on the island," Rowe says. Scavengers were rampant, sifting through residents' belongings even before the residents themselves were able to return to the island. "My father caught someone towing our boat away. When my father asked what he was doing, the looter said he was told that whatever was laying around was free. My father got our boat back, but some people lost almost all of their possessions to looters," Rowe states.

Sullivan's Island is approximately two and a half miles square, consisting of mostly residential areas. Rowe explains, "the people of Sullivans Island are used to hurricane evacuations, and some don't take the warnings very seriously. But I think that after seeing the devastation caused by Hurricane Hugo, people will take the evacuations more seriously. Hurricane Hugo was the worst hurricane of the century for the Charleston area."

Amy Rowe, a freshman from Sullivan's Island, agrees with her sister as to the extent of damage inflicted by Hugo. "Jennifer and I watched the news all day. It was a very emotional experience to know that our hometown was in the process of being destroyed. We were just happy our family was safe."

Jennifer and Amy returned to Sullivan's Island a week after Hurricane Hugo hit to help their family. "The island was completely trashed. It was just devastated." Donations poured in from corporations, organizations and private citizens to help alleviate the problems caused by Hurricane Hugo. Amy Rowe states, "It was heartbreaking to see my friends wandering around with wheelbarrows, searching for remains of their houses and possessions. Many houses were completely leveled. The foundations aren't even left." The Charleston area still hasn't finished cleaning up after the storm.

Sally Campbell, a junior psychology major, hails from Hilton Head Island, 70 miles south of Charleston. "Everyone on Hilton Head Island took the Hurricane warnings very seriously, and evacuated quickly," comments Campbell.

Hilton Head Island was spared the brunt of the storm and sustained only minor damage. "Because of the heavy rain and wind, we suffered significant beach erosion. But it was minor damage compared to what the Charleston area suffered," adds Campbell.

Seth Powell, a senior history major, lives in Georgetown, South Carolina, which is situated on the mainland coast 62 miles north of Charleston. "Georgetown was not evacuated because it is off the intercoastal waterway," says Powell. But Georgetown was not untouched by Hugo's fury. "The rising tide caused a lot of water damage. Many trees were knocked down, and we had no power for three days. However, telephone service remained intact," laments Powell. Local authorities took charge after the storm hit. "There was no looting. The people of Georgetown were genuinely concerned with helping each other after the storm. As well, the support that poured in from all over the United States made a huge impact on the recovery of South Carolina."

Hurricane Hugo attacked South Carolina, leaving 750,000 residents without power, 70 percent of forests destroyed, and two-thirds of the state declared a disaster area. As the storm approached the Appalachians, it recoiled its deadening force, puttering out through rainstorms in West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Hugo may have faded, but the memory of its power and destruction will undoubtedly remain for those affected by its demolition. Jen Rowe adds, "It is going to take years before Sullivan's Island and Charleston returns to normal."

Soccer loses twice, misses playoffs

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

A wonderful streak came to a screeching halt this week as the Washington College men's soccer team dropped two straight games. The team appeared to be on a roll after winning five consecutive games, but they were unable to the last two important games against Widener and Washington & Lee. The team's record dropped to 7-8 and they were eliminated from playoff competition.

The first loss came on October 18 against Widener, ending the streak of solid performances the team started in early October. The offense created many scoring opportunities, but they were unable to capitalize on any of the chances. WC managed fifteen shots on goal, but the team was never able to dent the back of the net. The team was saved by a wonderful team performance on the defensive half of the field. They were led by goalie John Thomas, who made an amazing 11 saves in the game. Neither team scored in regulation, sending the game into overtime. Widener was finally able to score on Thomas in the overtime period, handing the Sho'men a 1-0 defeat. This dropped the team back to .500 and seriously damaged the Sho'men's playoff hopes.

These hopes were completely doused in a home game against Washington and Lee this past Saturday at Kibler Field. The Sho'men seemed pumped up for the game and got off to a quick start. Peter Van Buren scored the game's first goal on a pass from Enrique delPrado, giving WC a 1-0 lead. This lead held up as the teams went to halftime, then was stretched to 2-0 early in the second half. Enrique delPrado scored a goal of his own, putting home a shot off a pass from Tom Bowman. The Sho'men were playing well and seemed to be in control of the game.

Washington & Lee refused to roll over and play dead, scoring on a penalty kick to cut the lead in half. Their next goal came on a freak play, knotting the game at two. While trying to pass the ball back to his goalkeeper, a WC player accidentally put the ball past John Thomas. Washington & Lee then scored again, completing their run of three straight goals. The game ended with the score of 3-2, and the Sho'men's playoff hopes were put to rest.

The soccer team have only three games remaining in their season, including home games this Saturday against Johns Hopkins and next Tuesday against Delaware Valley. The Delaware Valley game draws the season to a close, which has proven to be a disappointing one for coach Bowman and his players. Their hopes for an MAC championship have been dashed, and the team has been marred by their inconsistent play all year. The last few games are still important to the team. The Sho'men hope to move above the .500 mark and finish an otherwise disappointing season on a very positive note.

Men's crew rows solid race

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The men's varsity crew boat gave a strong performance this past weekend in the Head of the Charles race. The four rowers join the men's and women's crew team in preparation for the Head of the Schuylkill race in Philadelphia this weekend.

Greg Terry, Whit Maroney, Than Hansen and John Mulvany made up the men's varsity four boat that went to Boston for the Head of the Charles. The boat came in 24th out of 38, finishing approximately one minute out of first place. The team, led by coxswain Mindy Stark, rowed a strong race. The boat ran a very true course, and coach Chatellier was pleased with the fact that the varsity four ran a clean race.

"The four guys rowed a very good race," Chatellier commented. "We closed ground on the boat in front of us and distanced ourselves from the boat behind us.. The Charles was an extremely exciting place for us to be. All in all it was a very successful weekend, mainly because the kids worked together wonderfully."

Chatellier also thinks that the experience of this prestigious race could help the rowers in the future. "The varsity four should continue to get better as they gain experience. I hope we've started a tradition of rowing at the Head of the Charles."

The experience may pay immediate dividends in Philadelphia this weekend. The Head of the Schuylkill is also a prestigious race, and the WC crew team will be well represented at the competition. Three men's boats and two women's boats are headed to the Philadelphia race. A men's varsity four boat will compete in their first race of the season, and the men's varsity eight will row for the second time this fall. The women's varsity four will also compete this weekend. The men's and women's novice eights should also gain valuable experience on the Schuylkill River.

"This is also a prestigious race—there should be boats present from this entire region," Chatellier remarked. "This will begin the rowing careers of some people. We would like to make a very strong showing at the Head of the Schuylkill this weekend."

Volleyball continues solid play

by Amy R. Caddle

The women's volleyball team has played very well recently, going 2-1 this past week. Coach Fall's squad is playing a good team game at this late stage of the season. The women used victories over St. Mary's and Delaware Tech to solidify their strong standing in the MAC conference.

The women were defeated by Haverford in a home match on October 18th. The team played well and managed to take a game from their opponent. The Haverford women proved to be too strong, however, and WC dropped the match in four sets.

The Sho'women came back from the loss in full force this past Tuesday, defeating both St. Mary's and Delaware Tech in a dual meet. The women slaughtered St. Mary's, allowing only eleven points in two games while on the way to victory. The Del. Tech match proved to be a tougher one for the women. Delaware Tech was anchored by four women around six feet, and their height caused the women some difficulty. WC won the first game 15-11, then fell behind by a score of 10-2 early in the second game. The Sho'women were able to rally and storm ahead, allowing only two points throughout the rest of the game. The team defeated Del. Tech 15-12 in the second game, sweeping all four games in the dual meet. The women played extremely well in the victories over St. Mary's and Delaware Tech, and the meet gave an indication that the team is coming together at the right time of the season.

Coach Penny Fall was extremely impressed with the way the team has played. "The entire team is reaching very close to their potential," said Fall. With one of the toughest schedules in years, the team is doing extraordinarily well, boasting a 18-13 record to date. Coach Fall feels that the team's makeup is well suited to its difficult schedule. "We have a veteran team, and we are qualified to take on a rough schedule," Fall added. She also mentioned that their loss to Haverford was not a lack of skill, just a lack of steam. "The team did not play to its full potential, but only because the women were exhausted. We made a good showing, but I could tell they needed a rest."

The volleyball team is now preparing for their participation in the CWAC Tournament, taking place this weekend at Notre Dame College in Baltimore. The team is also hoping for an invitation to the MAC Tournament. "Our team is ready to compete, and we are anxious to participate in the tournament," said Fall. The volleyball team is matched against Catholic University this Wednesday, then returns home to play against Anne Arundel Community College on November 8.

Reece plays last home game

by Jennifer Stickney

The Washington College women's field hockey team upped their record to 6-5 this past week. The team has won two of their last three games, including victories over Frostburg State and Western Maryland.

On Tuesday, October 10, the team put up a brave fight at Johns Hopkins University. Hopkins scored the only two goals of the first half while dominating WC on both ends of the field. The WC women were unable to get off a shot in the first half, but they were not discouraged by their performance. The team took control of the game in the second half, playing with a skillful and agressive style. Julie Schram tallied the team's first goal of the game, scoring on a pass from Carole Reece. This was the first goal scored against Hopkins at home this year. The women could not score again, however, and the final score was 2-1.

The team took the field again on Thursday, October 12, and managed to pull out a victory over Frostburg State. The first half was scoreless, but the Sho'women scored two goals in the second half to gain the win. The two goals were scored within a span of two minutes. Carole Reece put away the first goal on an assist from Marie Mohler, then Erin O'Neal ended the scoring with an unassisted tally. Frostburg was unable to muster any offense, and WC climbed back up to .500 with a 2-0 victory.

After a week of rainouts, the team met rival Western Maryland in their final home game last Saturday. The game was dedicated to the players' parents and the team's lone senior Carole Reece. The team played well in the first half, but they still left the field at a 2-1 disadvantage. Their goal was scored by Amy Tiehel, assisted by Jenifer Blenckstone.

The second half proved better for the Sho'women. They outshot Western Maryland 11-6 while scoring twice. The game-tying goal was scored by Carolyn Athey on a pass from Reece. Julie Schram put home the winning goal with only 1:46 remaining. Marie Mohler was given with the assist, and the women held on to beat Western Maryland 3-2.

"The whole team did a great job," Guinan said. "Carole Reece had a great game, and we will certainly miss her."

The team will make up two rainouts this week, playing Widener and Swarthmore. The women end their season by participating MWCFHA tournament, and they hope to finish the year on a good note.

Women's tennis finishes fall season at Rolex

by Fred Wyman
Special to the Elm

The WC women's tennis team played in Fredericksburg, VA this past weekend, competing in the Southeastern Regional Small College Championships. Tracy Peel, Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice competed in the prestigious tournament, sponsored by Rolex. The tournament was very challenging for the women, who were forced to deal with bad weather and an extremely competitive field. The women still managed to make a very good showing in Fredericksburg.

Women's tennis coach Holly Bramble has taken her squad to the Eastern Regional in previous years, when it was held at Trenton State University. The tournament was moved to a small college in Connecticut this year, creating a travel problem for the women. As a result, Bramble opted to play in the more competitive Southeastern Regional. This region was mainly comprised of Division II schools and NAIA institutions. Peace College, one of the strongest junior colleges in the nation, also competed in the tournament. Only four Division III schools competed in the tournament. WC was joined by Mary Washington College, Sweet Briar College and Goucher College. Still, the women played a strong tournament against difficult competition.

Tracy Peel continued to show the competition why she is one of the top Division III players in the country. Peel played eight matches in a three-day span and was hobbled by injuries. Despite these hardships, the WC netter still managed to reach the consolation final of the singles draw.

Peel did not start well, losing in an upset to Pam Davis of Peace College in her first match of the tournament. She played her first match in the consolation draw early Saturday morning, then played five matches over a period of twelve hours. Peel's play made for a day of brilliant tennis, winning five straight matches to earn a berth in the consolation final. Peel racked up straight set victories over Guilford's Laura Wagner 6-2,6-1, then winning over Mary Washington's Karolyn Hall by a score of 6-2,6-2. She continued her stellar play in wins over Mary Washington's Christy Copper and Atlantic Christian's Nancy Griffin. Peel's victory over Copper was the second time this fall that the Sho'women all-American has stopped Mary Washington's #1 player.

The WC star's toughest match came against Jenny Tinnell of Peace in the quarterfinals. Peel dropped the first set in a close tiebraker, then rallied to win the final two sets and the match. Peel had nothing left for the final on Sunday morning, losing in straight sets to Peace's Tiffany Harting. Still, Peel's string of victories enabled her to finish sixth overall and higher than any other Division III player in the tournament. The second semester freshman concluded her fall campaign with a sensational 16-4 record. In addition, Peel did not drop a match against a Division III opponent. Two of her four defeats came at the hands of Division I players.

Sophomore Miriam Dittman was a last-minute entry in the singles draw, yet she nearly pulled off a major upset. After defeating a Peace's Kim Campbell 6-2 in the opening set, the hard-hitting Dittman seemed to lose her concentration. She dropped the last two sets 6-1,6-0, but Dittman still managed to reach the round of 16 in the tournament's consolation draw.

Dittman also played well in the doubles draw of the tournament. She was joined by teammate Rachel Rice in the competition and managed to finish seventh in an extremely competitive doubles draw. Peel, Dittman and Rice hung tough in the difficult Southeatern region of the Rolex tournament, showcasing their ability as well as their determination.

The 1989 World Series: The show must go on

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

This baseball season has dragged on longer than any other year in the history of the game. The American League and National League playoffs ended in early October, and since then baseball fans around the world have followed the continuing saga of the World Series. The Series was preceded by almost a week of hype, then was torn apart with the rest of the Bay Area by the tragic earthquake last week. The Series is supposed to start tonight at Candlestick Park, but this was not an easy decision. Many people have suggested the cancellation of the playoffs, claiming the Battle of the Bay is secondary to the battle many Californians are fighting to survive. Still, I have to believe that commissioner Fay Vincent has made the right decision in continuing the World Series.

There is no denying the fact that the World Series has dragged on too long. The two teams may play on a float in the Tournament of Roses Parade if the games do not resume soon. The A's and Giants may finish as late as the first day in November, making for the longest season ever. If the season were to finish in early November, the players would only have three and a half months before returning to spring training. These teams will need some time to recuperate and relax at the end of this lengthy season. Players are already showing little concern about the completion of this series.

Aside from the apathy of the teams, many people argue that it is ridiculous to resume the Series in the Bay Area after the devastation of the earthquake. Hundreds of lives were lost in the quake, and it will take years for the area to resolve the economic problems caused by the destruction. The completion of the World Series pales in comparison to the other difficulties currently facing the people of California. For this reason, many people feel the Series should be cancelled to allow people to concentrate on more important problems.

I completely understand this argument, and I agree with these people to some degree. The World Series is given far too much importance. I am one of the biggest sports fans around, but I was shocked by the reaction some people had to the situation in California. Most people were more concerned about the condition of the World Series than the condition of the Bay Area. This is wrong. People's lives have been destroyed by this tragedy, and it is ridiculous to focus attention on a game instead of showing concern for the true problems. Baseball is not that important.

Still, I think it would be a mistake to cancel the World Series. First of all, the playing of the World Series will bring money to an area desperately in need of economic assistance. Baseball can also be an emotional boost to the troubled state of California. The World Series can allow people to take their mind off of the tragedy of the earthquake, if only for a few hours. The true purpose of baseball is not to make money, but to bring enjoyment and happiness to the fans. The Series must be continued, if only in the hope that it can be a boost to an area badly in need of help.

Dr. Jock: The rewards of pool exercise

As most fitness fans know, swimming is a great overall exercise. It gets your heart and lungs pumping, your legs kicking, your arms churning, all in a relatively safe and stress-free environment. The injury rate is low, and the aerobic payoff can be enormous in terms of increased strength, flexibility and the relaxed, good feeling that seems to settle over swimmers after they've done their 30 minutes.

But what if you can't swim laps? What if your crawl is crummy and your backstroke sloppy and you really never got the breathing thing down? What if swimming laps is simply too boring for you? Can you still get the benefits of swimming?

Yes, and more. Water training is getting more and more popular around the the country as a way for all sorts of athletes to stretch and strengthen their muscles. And exercise in water – basically, slow-motion versions of jogging, jumping jacks and disco dancing – is especially good for athletes who are working their way back after an injury.

Here are some things you should know before diving into water exercise, followed by some specific techniques recommended by Dr. Jane Katz in her book "The W.E.T. Workout: Water Exercise Techniques to Help you Tone Up and Slim Down Aerobically" (New York, Facts on File Publications). "Even if you can't move on land because you're handicapped, too heavy or recovering from an operation, you can work out in water," says Dr. Katz, professor of health and physical education at Bronx Community College in New York.

– The deeper the water you work out in, the greater the resistance against your body and the more aerobic your workout. If you can, try doing exercises in water that is chest-deep to chin-deep. If it's too hard, retreat to more shallow waters and build up your strength gradually.

– If the bottom of the pool is slippery or rough, wear some kind of water shoe or sneaker to help you get a better grip.

– Drink at least two glasses of water before you begin and more water after you finish. Water exercise is hard work and you'll need fluids. Don't think that just because you're in water your body is getting what it needs.

– For best results, do your pool exercises three times a week, on alternate days.

– Begin your workout slowly. Listen to your body. Sense where your tension is and allow your body to release it and relax.

– Practice mindfulness when you work out in water. Be aware of working your muscles against the resistance of the water. If your body simply floats through the different moves it is the equivalent of coasting on your bike: if you're not working, it's not working. Get it?

Here's a sampling of water exercises from "The W.E.T. Workout." For a complete (30 minutes or more) routine, buy a book, take a class, see a water exercise teacher in your area, or make up your own routine based on your understanding of land exercise. Be sure to include a warm-up, a cool-down and moves to exercise your upper, middle and lower body parts:

WARM-UP (five minutes): 1. AQUA JOGGING. Run in place or in different directions – backward, forward, sideways, etc. 2. ROPE JUMPING. In shoulder-deep water, stand with your feet hip-width apart and jump rhythmically while moving your arms circularly as if you were jumping rope.

UPPER BODY (five minutes): 1. AQUA PUSH-UPS. Stand facing the pool wall with your hands gripping the lower ledge, shoulder-width apart. Straighten your elbows and lift your body out of the water. Lower yourself back into the water and repeat. 2. MEDLEY OF STROKES. Stand in chest-deep water, practice all the arm strokes used in swimming – crawl, breast stroke, side stroke, backstroke. Balance your body by placing one foot ahead of the other. Alternate strokes. Vary speeds.

LOWER BODY (five minutes): 1. LEG RAISE. Stand with your back against the pool wall and lift one leg as high as possible, keeping it straight. Repeat. Alternate legs. 2. MEDLEY OF KICKS. Face the pool wall. To brace yourself properly, hold onto the edge with one hand, and press the other against the wall under the water. Pull with the top hand and press with the bottom as you lift your legs to the surface. Do the flutter kick or alternate with others, such as the frog or scissor kick.

TOTAL BODY (five minutes): 1. JUMPING JACKS. Stand with arms at your side. Turn your palms upward and bring them to the water surface while extending your legs into a "v" position with a low jump. Then turn your palms downward and return your arms to your sides while jumping back to the starting position. 2. TREADING. In chin-deep water, assume a sitting position with your shoulders over your knees. Move your arms in a wide, flat, figure-eight motion, while kicking your legs in a cycling (or some other) motion.

REMEMBER: Always cool down after a water workout with some simple arm and leg stretches. Move slowly and gradually, and be careful not to bounce. Increasing your flexibility in the water is a great way to avoid suffering sports injuries on land.

Retrospective set for old & new Bowie fans

by Clay Eichelberger

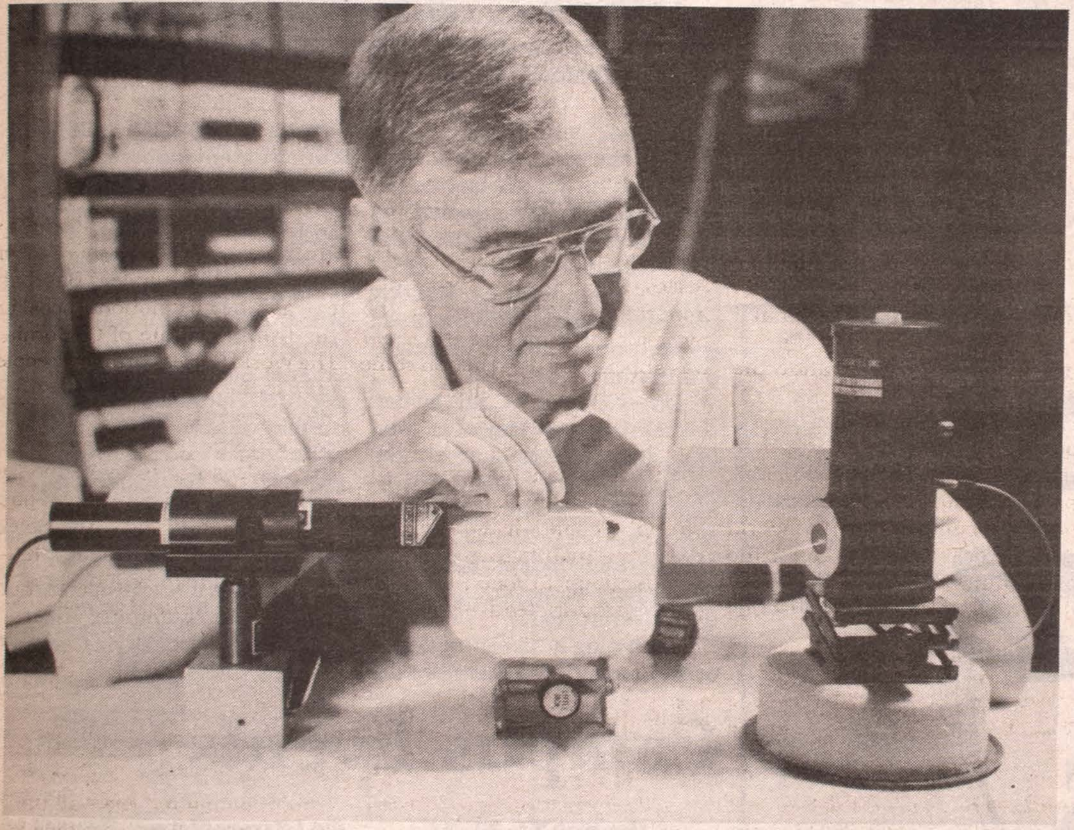
For those who first became aware of David Bowie with the release of his hit 1983 album Let's Dance, the singer's new release, Sound + Vision, will no doubt come as a surprise. The boxed-set retrospective includes none of the techno-pop that has characterized the Bowie of the Eighties. Rather, it is a fascinating cross-section of the singer's career, from the nervous young man at the beginning of the set to the confident, seasoned professional at the end. Throughout Bowie's career, the one thing that has remained constant has been the singer's chameleonlike ability to alter his style, and it is this ability that is showcased in Sound + Vision.

Surprisingly, there is very little unreleased material on the three-cassette set; much of the material was taken directly from Bowie's RCA albums. For collectors who possess the original albums, the unreleased material that does appear is the main reason for buying the set; for everyone else, it is a treat along with the rest of the goodies. The set opens with a demo version of "Space Oddity," Bowie's first successful single, recorded by Bowie in his bedroom on a four-track tape recorder with a friend singing harmony. Considering the circumstances of its recording, the track is actually very good, and surprisingly similar to the released version. There is also a fascinating, rare version of his Diamond Dogs song "Rebel Rebel" that includes a different vocal and musical arrangement, and a song from the Young Americans recording sessions called "After Today" which showcases Bowie's "soul man" phase of the early Seventies. This phase of Bowie's career took the singer into the dreaded disco style for his Station to Station album, and the set includes a wonderfully bizarre outtake from those sessions as well: a remake of Bruce Springsteen's "It's Hard to Be a Saint in the City." This is one of the most interesting cuts on the set; it shows Bowie's ability to take a song written by an artist whose style is completely different from his own and make the song work.

Throughout Bowie's career, he has traditionally had more of a following through his concerts than his albums, and the set pays tribute to his live performances; included are "Ziggy Stardust," a faithful recreation of the original; "Rock'n'Roll Suicide," which includes Bowie's infamous "This is the last show that we'll ever do" speech; and a great cover of Lou Reed's "White Light/White Heat." Also included, though not as good, are "Suffragette City" and "Watch That Man," and the excellent instrumental "Warszawa."

Most perplexing is what has been left out of the collection; it is surprising not to see "Fame," Bowie's collaboration with John Lennon and his first number-one hit in the USA. Also missing is one of Bowie's greatest songs, "Heroes," which appears on the set, sort of, but only in German (?!?) as "Helden." This is a good track, but the English-language version would have been better.

Just as the set opens with "Space Oddity," the song that introduces Bowie's alter ego Major Tom, so does it end with "Ashes to Ashes," Bowie's 1980 sequel in which he bade farewell to Major Tom and (supposedly) all his other personae. The song brings us full circle, and provides a fitting capper for the retrospective. For many, Bowie's albums for RCA represent the most creative period of his career. Throughout the set, we are given some of Bowie's best work, as well as some of his most uneven. Sound + Vision is by no means the definitive collection of David Bowie's work, but it is a faithful one.



Working in the lab, physicist Dr. Gordon Thomas of AT&T Bell Laboratories will visit the campus on Wednesday, November 1 to deliver a lecture on superconductors at 7:30 PM in Norman James Theater.

Jesuit poet's life featured in performance

by Jennifer Del Nero

The one-man play Immortal Diamond: a Jesuit in Poets Corner, written to commemorate the centennial of the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins' death will be performed Wednesday night at the Emmanuel Episcopal Church in Chestertown. The performance is sponsored in part by Washington College's Sophie Kerr Fund.

Written and produced by William Van Etten Casey, the play incorporates various aspects of Hopkins' life as depicted through his poems, letters and journals. Casey, professor emeritus of religious literature at Boston College and Holy Cross College, was praised by Brian McNiff of the Evening Gazette Boston Bureau as capturing "the poet's love of words, especially his fascination with those Anglo-Saxon and Celtic ones which undergird our language."

English Department Chairman Bennett Lamond has seen Immortal Diamond performed four times, most recently this month at Rockhurst College in Missouri. Lamond credits the play as a "splendid piece of work," adding, Hopkins is an "essential poet, and this play is a wonderful way to get to know him."

Because the play does not focus on the works of Hopkins, Lamond will give a Monday Series lecture on Hopkins at 4:30 PM in the O'Neill Literary House. His presentation will stress complex literary details left out by Casey. Lamond explains that there is a need to discuss Hopkins' poetic techniques since "Hopkins is a unique poet with a lot of special elements in his poetry."

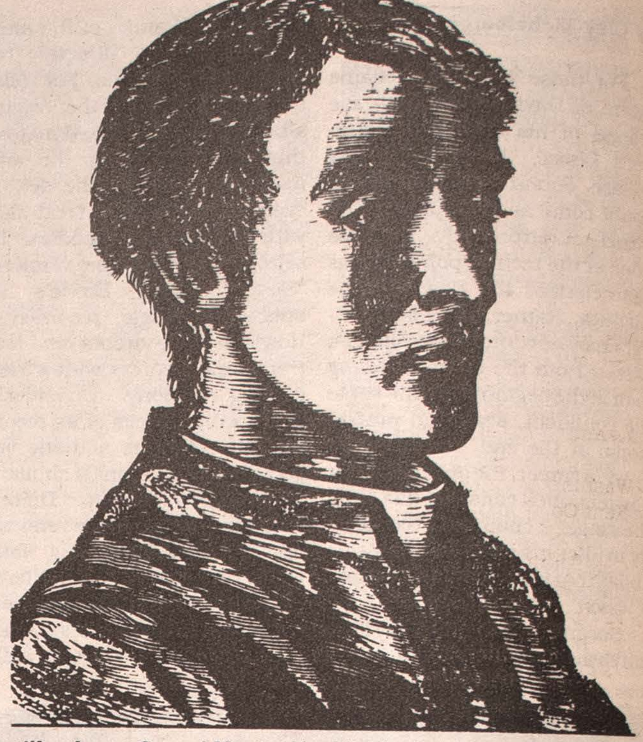
Immortal Diamond covers Hopkins' life from his schoolboy days at the Highgate Grammar School (where John Keats had also attended), to his final days in Dublin where he died of typhoid fever, and includes such highlights as Hopkins' conversion to Catholicism, his Jesuit training and his work as a poet and teacher.

Hopkins first contemplated living the life of an artist or professional poet at Balliol College, Cxford, where not only did he study Latin and Greek, but where he began a life-long friendship with Robert Bridges, who in 1918 edited and published Hopkins' first edition of Poems.

A year after leaving Balliol College, Hopkins made his decision to become a priest and a Jesuit. It was also at this time when he ceremoniously burned his poems, denouncing all possibility of a career as a poet.

Peter Levi, poet and professor at Oxford University, acknowledged the greatness of Hopkins' poetry in an address delivered at the dedication of the Hopkins Memorial in Poets Corner. "He suffered intensely in ways we can hardly understand and he could hardly express. In his lifetime he was not taken seriously as a theologian, or a poet, or a scholar....yet he had a profound and unconfined freedom of spirit." Explained Levi, "This [spirit] is what makes him so great a poet. It is something like love."

Starring in the production is New York actor and Phillips Exeter Academy and University of Vermont graduate Henry Wright. Wright, who has recently performed in such productions as The Taming of the Shrew, Twelfth Night and As You Like It, portrays the man known among his fellow Jesuits as one who was "a gentle eccentric of unpredictable ways."



The life of poet Gerard Manley Hopkins is documented in the play, Immortal Diamond: A Jesuit in Poets Corner.

Lamond has had the opportunity to speak with Wright, including when he performed at Rockhurst, and says he has reached the point where he feels as though he has grown into the part. Wright was quoted by Lamond as saying, "I feel like the play belongs to me now." Arriving in Chestertown on Monday and leaving Thursday, Wright will spend time on campus throughout his stay.

Directed by Bill Cain, Immortal Diamond has played in sixteen cities stretching across the US from Berkeley, CA to Washington, DC since its 1987 debut at Boston College. Cain is founder of the Boston Shakespeare Company where he was artistic director for seven years.

Predicting a "lively" performance, Lamond also describes the play as a "significant pleasure. It's not just entertainment; there's a sort of perfection of Hopkins that comes out of the performance."

For the Chestertown performance, members of the WC Music Department will perform Purcell and a composition of Samuel Barber which is set to a poem of Hopkins. Funding for the play was provided by the Kent County Arts Council in conjunction with the Washington College Lecture Series.

The curtain for Immortal Diamond will rise at 8 PM. Admission is free and open to the public. The Emmanuel Episcopal Church is located in Chestertown on Cross Street.

Neiman speaks:

drug, alcohol prevention

by Kyndra Ponder

Washington College hosted the Kent County Drug and Alcohol Prevention Council's (KCDAPC) fundraising dinner last Sunday evening. The dinner officially marked the end of Drug Prevention Week in Kent County, which happened to coincide with the National Collegiate Drug and Alcohol Awareness Week that the college observed.

According to Richard Gentry, chairman of the council, Drug Prevention Week was declared by mayors of various Kent County towns and has been deemed very effective.

After greeting and thanking the 75 guests who attended the dinner, Gentry introduced the evening's speaker, Washington College sophomore class President Stuart Neiman.

For Neiman, speaking to the public about drug abuse is nothing new. He has spent the last several years as a non-Professional Adolescent Addiction counselor.

He began his comments by saying that he is really confused about some things which are becoming commonplace in our society. He later asked, "at what point in our history did drugs become so pervasive as to justify the need for a special office in the President's cabinet (William Bennett, Drug Czar) to deal with the problems?"

After explaining his involvement in drug counseling, Neiman went on to discuss his personal experiences with drug abuse and the lessons he learned from his experience.

Neiman pointed out that not all addicts are junkies laying in an alley— that many are seemingly normal, All-American people who seem to have everything going for them. Addiction, Neiman said, must start with something— alcohol, marijuana, prescription, and even non-prescription medicines.

After sobering the audience with his remarks, Neiman praised them. "The cure to drug abuse is here, in this room, and in rooms like it all across the country." said Neiman. "Without people who care, we have nothing."

After Neiman, various members of the community spoke about the "Just Say No Campaign." Prizes were then awarded to students who participated in the poster playwriting and game contests. The overall winner, a fifth grade Chestertown boy, added to Neiman's message saying, "Say no [to drugs]."

Washington College and the KCDAPC plan to be partners again in the future.

Academic Board news

by Sharon Bonner

A formal letter from the Student Academic Board (SAB), stating the proposal for all majors to participate in senior seminars for credit, will be submitted to the Academic Council by the end of this month. Before submission of the letter, the SAB must wait for information from the Deans concerning faculty input on the subject.

Currently under discussion is the issue concerning the senior fifth obligation.

Mariella Ruiz, Secretary of the Student Academic Board, explained that certain departments such as psychology, history, business, and American studies have senior seminars available phrase used by F. David Wheelan, Vice President for Development and College Relations, when describing his idea of the purpose of the center. He cited the importance of lifetime fitness "in addition to intellectual growth" for every student, not just those students who participate in varsity athletics. Classes provide the intellectual aspect and the center will provide the fitness aspect.

Geoffrey Miller, Director of Athletics and Acting Chairperson for the Physical Education Department, stressed that the center is still in the preliminary planning stages. "We have not decided on a company yet. All we have is plans and I don't agree with two or three things in those plans." He added that student, faculty and staff opinions will be solicited in the "next couple of months. We need to know what they want, what elements need to be in the new building."

It is expected that the center will be built on the site of the existing tennis courts. The courts will then be relocated to an undecided location.

The athletic aspect will emphasize recreational activities already taking place in the gym. Intercollegiate practices and games as well as the training room will remain in the current structure.

The new facility is anticipated to include additional locker rooms, offices and a state of the art fitness center. The health services now located in Queen Anne will be moved there and will include health counseling.

The Lifetime Fitness Center will have an "all surface" floor in order to allow that a variety of sports can be played. Plans also include an indoor track and a room for aerobics. Final stages of design and construction, however, depend on input and fundraising results.

responded to this concern. Each individual thermostat and controls are being checked.

Students are asked to bear in mind that we are currently experiencing "Indian Summer," and that rapid temperature change is hard to accommodate using a hot water system.

Although these issues are far from being completely resolved, in the opinion of the SGA, they have been quickly addressed.

Coffee House:

abandoned by students?

by Amanda Burt

According to senior Ryder Daniels, taking advantage of activities offered at the Coffee House is not what students have been doing. Daniels, along with David Stewart, is student co-manager of the Coffee House.

"It is impossible to compete with free beer and keg parties," said Daniels. He holds that the purpose of the Coffee House is to create a nice atmosphere and give students a place to relax. Most activities are free, and this year there has been a concerted effort to provide live entertainment every weekend, at a low cost to students.

"There is more student use of the Coffee House than in the past, but I want there to be more," Daniels said. He claims that the general feeling among students is that the Coffee House is "not what it used to be." As alcoholic laws have become increasingly strict in recent years, the Coffee House can no longer serve minors.

When the Coffee House sold pitchers of beer years ago, there were excessive problems with the bathrooms being trashed, and fights were not uncommon. Daniels feels that conditions have improved, but he needs the support and input of students.

"It is difficult to anticipate what the students want, but I think we have a variety of activities which appeal to everyone."

There are rock groups, acoustic musicians, and bands similar to the Grateful Dead which perform at the Coffee House. He hopes to have the Music Department sponsor a jazz night.

Upcoming events include a performance by guitarist Karen Goldberg on Thursday, November 16. She will also instruct a workshop that day. Friday, November 17, the Coffee House will host the campus band Plaid Rabbit, an electric group. Open Mike Night will be Saturday, November 18. The SGA will also sponsor New Potato Caboose Saturday, November 11.

In addition to musical groups the Coffee House also offers movies to the students. Daniels admits the fact that several movies have not shown when scheduled is a valid criticism.

"I'd like to apologize for that," he says. "Some movies have not been picked up and I intend to correct that." He also welcomes students who wish to show their own movies.

Daniels and Stewart welcome and encourage any suggestions students might have about improving the Coffee House, either through campus mail or The Elm.

"We need the support," Daniels reiterates. "Nothing is ever over $3, and most of the activities are at no charge."

Club Unity

by Kyndra Ponder

Freshman class President, Gordy Scherer, has implemented a program which he hopes will improve club unity and general school spirit.

Scherer will head the Inter-Club Council, which members of the SGA Social Committee, one member of the Inter-Fraternity Council and all club presidents on campus will be invited to join. Scherer stressed that he doesn't want to interfere with individual clubs, he simply wants to serve as "a mediator between clubs and activities."

The ICC will serve two roles on campus.

First, the ICC plans to develop a "Community Calendar," which will be set on a first come, first serve basis so that events will not be scheduled at the same time.

Scherer feels that everyone involved will benefit and he cites last weekend's SGA dance in the Coffee House and the sailing club regatta as an example. If there had only been one event scheduled for that evening, then both clubs would have benefited more from their individual activities.

In addition, once the ICC has received notice of an event, memos will be sent to all club presidents the next day to ensure maximum coverage for the event.

Scherer hopes that the ICC will bring all the clubs together and will allow each organization to have fullest campus-wide support system available.

and that psychology and business majors receive 4 credits from the Senior Seminar, whereas other departments do not give credit.

The senior obligation is a requirement for all majors of study, in addition to completing required course work. Department requirements, such as as senior thesis research paper, comprehension exams, and experimental studies, vary depending on the major of study.

The Student Academic Board is investigating reasons why only certain majors offer senior seminars and give credit for the senior obligation. Another topic of discussion involves the possibility of senior theses counting as independent study credit for one semester.

"The Senior Seminar gives students the opportunity to do research on their thesis, discuss thesis in a class atmosphere, and receive guidance from faculty members," commented Ruiz.

The SAB consists of about 18-20 members, representing each major of study. Meetings are held every two weeks. Each representative of a major prepares a report of students' evaluation of the major.

"The Student Academic Board acts as a liaison between the students and faculty," said Tracy Coleman, Chairperson.

From discussions and reports, the board reports on the state of the College, allowing faculty to see how students view majors and departments.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

I dislike starting my article on a negative note, but it has been brought to my attention that certain students are not bussing their trays at meals. Also, certain groups are regularly leaving food on the floor, under and around their tables. Bussing tables is a rule of the dining hall, and if you are caught not clearing your dishes and trays, you could be fined Twenty-five Dollars (several students have already been fined). It isn't very appealing to those who come in to eat after a table has been left not bussed. Put your self in that position. Would you like to eat at a table laden with dirty dishes? For those of you guilty of this infraction, remember the WC Honor Code and please start bussing your tables.

Food fights, too, are another NO NO! This frequent practice will not be tolerated. So, please make life easier for all of us, BUS YOUR TABLES and NO MORE FOOD FIGHTS!!

Last Wednesday's Food Show, sponsored by HSH Food Sales was well received by those who attended dinner. Thanks to all who filled out the surveys. These surveys enable the W.C.D.S. to determine what items may be acceptable for future menus.

Next Wednesday, at dinner, Lankford/Sysco will present a Produce Show.

Hope you will enjoy the items that will be featured that evening.

The "Suggestion Board" is located on the bulletin board, on the left, as you enter the Main Dining Room. Please, feel free to use it to comment on the meals, service or make suggestions or requests. The management staff would like to hear from you; good or bad.

In closing, I would like to leave you with a suggestion. If any of you are interested in shedding a few pounds, try cleaning your room. You'll burn up 100 extra calories by cleaning for half an hour! Your housekeepers will appreciate the effort, too!

Vanished furniture plagues administration:

Thousands of dollars wasted

by Sharon Bonner

There is much confusion among administrators about the disappearance of lounge furniture from several dormitories, particularly from the Cullen dorms.

Renovated in 1985, Cullen dormitories were provided with new lounge furniture, costing approximately $11,814. A recent inspection conducted by Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, and the Maintenance Department, indicated that all of the original furniture purchased for the Cullen dormitories is missing.

"I inventoried all lounges this fall and found essentially all of those original groupings of furniture have gone and furniture supposed to be in one location had appeared in another," said Baer.

For several years, some lounges in Cullen, such as Dorchester, Wicomico, and Somerset, have been used to accommodate students for housing. In order to make use of the lounges as dormitory rooms, the maintenance department was responsible for relocating lounge furniture.

The furniture was redistributed to other lounges and there is no record of exactly what furniture was removed and the location where it was taken.

In addition, no actual inventory was done of the original furniture in the lounges.

Finally, according to Joe Cathers, Assistant Superintendent, pictures of the furniture in lounges were taken last year to keep inventory but somehow the roll of film was ruined.

Cathers explained that over a period of a few years, furniture in the Cullen basement has been both damaged and mysteriously redistributed to other places around campus. The Maintenance Department plans to begin keeping accurate records of the furniture in each lounge.

"Although we can't keep furniture forever, we would like to see the furniture last for a considerable period of time, since it was so expensive for the College," commented Cathers.

Security is taking positive steps to prevent the furniture from being taken from its original place. Lounges on all halls are

Miller Library transformer scheduled for removal Nov. 14

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

In accordance with Environmental Protection Agency guidelines, Miller Library's PCB transformer will be removed and replaced on Tuesday, November 14. On that date, the library will close from 7 AM to approximately 5 PM.

Miller Library is the second building on campus to have its transformer replaced. The first was Kent House on October 25.

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, attributed last week's all campus blackout to a problem with Kent House's new transformer.

"An arrestor was incorrectly sized. When they turned the transformer on it was like blowing a fuse. It blew the arrestor. That's why we had a power outage."

"We're not closing the building because of danger, we're doing that because there won't be any electricity," said Tubbs.

Baer stated that dealing with transformers is dangerous. "That's why we have experts to do it." Outside specialists will be doing the work, not Washington College maintenance.

The process involved is not extremely complicated, according to Baer. All of the PCB fluid is drained, sealed into a drum and removed from the building. Any fluid that has leaked is cleaned before the new transformer is brought in.

The new transformer contains

SGA meeting

by Kyndra Ponder

The Social Committee began the meeting Tuesday, October 30th, by reporting that New Potato Caboose is scheduled to appear at Washington College on Saturday, November 11, from 9:00 pm - 1:00 am in the Cain Gymnasium. Ticket prices will be announced.

SGA Vice President and Student Academic Board (SAB) Chairperson, Tracy Coleman, reported about the senior obligation. Various departments on campus deal with the obligation differently. Some offers seminars for credit, some do not. The SAB would like to see equal preparation and assistance for seniors in all departments

SGA President, Steven Attias, has been trying to incorporate a means by which the honor code can be strengthened at WC. To this end, he has developed a special committee to address changing and strengthening the honor code. Committee chairman, senior Bill Kerbin, announced that he has received copies of honor codes from other schools and plans to review them in hopes gaining some new ideas.

Attias then commented on the positive response from students who attended Open Season on President Cater. Due to its success Attias is trying to have an Open Season on Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, Joe Cathers, Assistant Superintendent of Buildings and Grounds, and Dave Knowles, Director of Dining Services. Dates and times will be announced.

Finally, three senators, Kevin Langan, Jen Rowe, and Jim Sobczak, were impeached for failing to attend SGA meetings.

The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, November 14 at 9:45.

Middle States report

by Jennifer Gilday

Washington College recently submitted its response to recommendations made in 1986 by the Middle States Commission.

The Middle States Report is issued to institutions every 10 years in order that each college or university may be accredited and may continue to exist. It involves a complicated, time-consuming process of recommendation and follow up which members of the administration hope will soon end, according to Elizabeth Baer, Provost and Dean of the College.

The Middle States Commission is a regional division which sends a team of four to five individuals to a college for three to four days. It is composed of faculty, deans, vice presidents

Furniture fiasco

Well, better late than never. It's inconceivable that the Washington College maintenance and security departments would not have considered methods of inventory other than Kodak before relocating more than $10,000 worth of lounge furniture. As we all know, things around here are easily lost, misplaced, or just mysteriously disappear; it's important to keep track of one's property. A compiled list of furniture pieces and their locations would have worked. Numbered stickers like the ones put on Macintosh computers would have worked. Even writing the name of the respective dorms on the furniture pieces in some type of invisible ink would have worked.

This isn't going to happen again, which is all very well and good. However, no mention has been made of replacing "missing" lounge furniture. If you live in the Cullen dorms, you'll get your furniture. If not, too bad. Maybe the "grace period" will see the return of some furniture, but not likely.

Is lounge furniture a privilege, or do students pay for it through their room fee? If the case is the latter, perhaps the College should consider a shopping trip.

Students are not packing

Washington College is not sending students packing. Actually, I wouldn't really know, being one of the students who choose to live off campus. My feeling is that students are simply dispersing throughout Chestertown, choosing to hang out in someone's house rather than someone's dorm room. Maybe students are choosing to stay in and study on Friday nights; then again, maybe they're heading down to Baltimore or DC.

Admittedly, keg parties have always been a kind of unifying force here, but only in the sense that a lot of people attend them, thereby nullifying the question of WC's degeneration into a suitcase school.

Take away the keg parties, and everyone worries that students are packing. Living off campus can foster this impression as well. For the most part, these are unfounded conclusions; sure, people are heading home on weekends, but not in hordes. And probably not in more significant numbers than in the past.

However, the fact remains that students are no longer staying on campus for their entertainment. We all know this is a problem which needs to be reckoned with, but no one is sure of the solution. Maybe we should have an open season on the social life at Washington College.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

MY KEEN POWERS OF OBSERVATION HAVE ALLOWED ME TO DISCERN THAT THERE ARE AN INCREASING NUMBER OF RAMPS POPPING UP ALL OVER CAMPUS!! WHAT COULD THEY BE FOR???
②
IN CONSIDERATION OF WHAT WE NOW VIEW AS THE PROBLEM OF "THE LACADAISICAL STUDENT" LET ME JUST MAKE A LONG RANGE PREDICTION: IN THE NEAR FUTURE MANY STUDENTS WILL BE UNABLE TO GET OUT OF BED TO ATTEND CLASS!
③
④
YES! IN THEORY THIS WOULD THEN ENABLE THE LESS MOTIVATED TO ATTEND CLASS... BUT IN PRACTICE THIS MAY PROVE TO BE QUITE TRICKEY!!

Letters to the Editor

Why are we losing Dean's List students?

To the Editor:

OK, Washington College Administration, now I'm really baffled. Granted, the whole PCB fiasco was undeniably stupid, but WC idiocy has reached new limits.

This week, a Dean's list student has informed me that he will not be returning to this school next semester because Washington College cannot help fund him. This student is not only Dean's list caliber, he is also a member of the Writers' Union and a coeditor of one of the college's independent magazines. Obviously, a productive, well-functioning member of the college environment. Earlier this semester another student, carrying a 3.9 grade point average, ran into financial difficulties and had to leave because Washington College could not help fund her.

I would like to clarify my point here. I believe that the WC Financial Aid office is doing the best with the funding it is given. My complaint is directed to those officials who have the potential to exhibit influence on the directions towards which donations take.

I am not unreasonable. I realize that there are bullheaded donors who will only give money for fresh flowers in front of Bill Smith every week, or a new all-brick college walk, regardless of how many students are forced to leave school as a result of lack of funding. However, optimism forces me to believe that with the right encouragement some of these generous people could be directed towards a more profitable way of spending their extra dollars. Doesn't it seem plausible that a Washington College alumni somewhere would recognize the beauty of education and want to share it with someone who has the potential to flourish in it but is without the means of acquiring it?

The problem gets uglier. As I mentioned above, both of the students pursued excellence in their studies, and both were refused financial support. This strikes me as particularly odd because I know of another student who has, in turn, has been caught by security using drugs, exhibited violent acts toward other students, and who at one point missed approximately one month of classes consecutively. Despite several complaints from students, this student is still enrolled at Washington College. This student comes from an extremely wealthy family.

A sense of discrimination at this point? While I admit that discrimination in the favor of the wealthy would be a clever, albeit unethical, policy for Washington College; I think the college's mistake is not quite as clever or clear as this. Hasn't everyone heard, "it's hard to get an 'A', but it's even harder to get an 'F' at WC"? Even unproductive, low-GPA students who have lost their financial aid are allowed to enroll again, regardless of how many times they have "almost" failed out. It seems that Washington College is intentionally trying to drive away potentially excellent members of the college community to make way for those who are academically and emotionally inferior.

So what's going on? Just getting sick of all those complaints about the alcohol policy and the construction and the mud and the PCB fiasco? Thinning out the sharper sheep?

In the hope that this is not the case, I strongly suggest that the adminstration review its policy on financial aid, with the result that such deserving students will be able to continue their pursuit of education.

Sincerely,
Elizabeth Rollins

Freshmen tell their own fortunes

This is the third year that the Alumni Association offers this unique, challenging opportunity for Freshmen: write a "Letter to Myself" and send it to the Alumni Office, to be remailed to you after you graduate in 1993. The Association has commissioned special coffee/beer mugs to trade for these letters.

In this "Letter to Myself" you should address, in as much or as little detail as you choose, "who I am now, who I will be in 1993, something/someone I will remember about Washington College and something I will not remember when the Alumni Office mails this letter back to me in 1993". This can include the best book you've read here, the worst joke you've heard here, or a detailed description of the classmate you intend to marry. Seal your letter in an envelope with your name and class year on it, bring it to the Alumni Office and collect your mug. We promise that this will suprise and delight you when it finds you in "the real world" four years from now. Upper classmen can play too.

The Alumni Office is located on the corner of Campus and Washington Avenues. The downstairs lounge is open to students every night but Wednesday. Videos from local stores can be reserved through the Alumni Office, extension 462, and shown on any night but Monday, Football Night. The resident student in the Alumni House is Matt Zuech. The Directors of the Alumni Office are Pat Trams and Mackey Streit. Everyone who respects the rules of courtesy and sobriety is welcome.

ISSUE: Is Washington College becoming a "suitcase school"?

Campus sends students packing

Carole Reece

Ask any senior their opinion on this question in light of the last four years, and I think the reply would be a resounding "YES!" A steady trend of students leaving the campus for the weekend has reached a high point this year. In connection with the weekend absences, an overwhelming number of students have moved off campus for the year. These people are losing a big part of the college experience as well as taking it away from the rest of the students. I think the issue encompasses too many aspects of the college to adapt to our situation and resources and then change our outlook on the situation to a positive one.

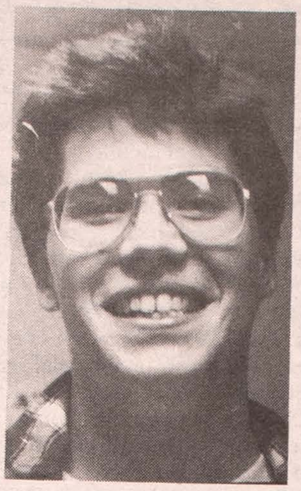
A "suitcase school," which exists on many college campuses like ours, develops as a result of several intermingled factors. First, as a small-town college with low enrollment, we are faced with the problem of entertainment for students. The only real off-campus event is the theater, and it hardly has the capacity to hold a large number of college students comfortably. In addition, the closest "metropolis" is at least 45 minutes away. Like any campus, the students are somewhat divided into "interest groups" which tend to hold exclusive events for members only. By offering students more opportunities to socialize with the "whole" campus, we could attract more of the "suitcasers" because there would be a reason to stay. This task is a responsibility of both the students and the administration and deserves extra attention if we want to curtail the trend towards a full-blown "suitcase school."

A second obstacle is the lack of communication between the students and the administration. I don't think the students formally express their interests or desires to the administration so things they may want done never reach the ears of the administration. I think the administration also needs to make a conscious effort to publicly support other programs and even sponsor some themselves. We must spend a lot of money bringing in the guest speakers for the William James Forum and similar programs. Unfortunately, very few students participate. Just think, if we put half as much time, effort and money into the social programs, such as bands, a lot of students would get the other other important half of their education, the socialization.

Third is the conflicting attitudes of the students and the administration on the alcohol policy. The attitude of the majority of the student body is that the only thing we can have fun doing together is partying, which inevitably involves drinking, and the attitude of the administration, recently, is to prevent all underage drinking as soon as possible. I think it is unrealistic to try and prohibit all drinking to minors on the campus, especially in light of the school's traditional relaxed attitude toward other activities. Alcohol is a part of life from now on and if we can't avoid it then maybe we can learn how to deal with it properly so we'll have less trouble adjusting to the pressures outside of college. Both the students and the administration need to center their attention on alternative activities rather than focus on the "problem with the alcohol policy."

The solutions are not simple and the first thing that has to change is the attitude and focus of the campus. Plenty of resources are available to us for entertainment, someone just needs to tap them. With an active student and administrative campaign, we could revive life on the campus and make our experience at WC even more valuable.

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler



Karl Seelaus
Old Greenwich, Conn.
Sophomore

This campus is so empty on the weekends that I myself have considered going home too. The alcohol policy is too strict here, and cuts on social life which is now very boring.

Lori Hastings
Georgetown, Del.
Freshman

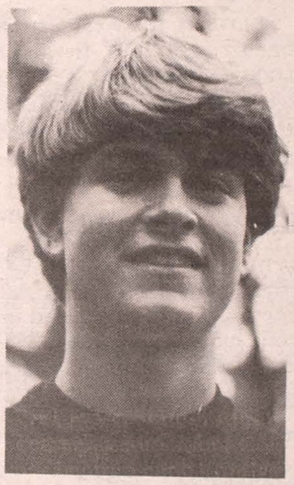
I think the alcohol policy is definitely a factor but let's face it, not much happens on campus on the weekends.

Brian Nilstoft
Wilmington, Del.
Freshman

People are going home because many people live nearby. I don't think it is because of our alcohol policy. If people don't want to drink they don't have to, and they aren't going home to avoid the situation here on campus.

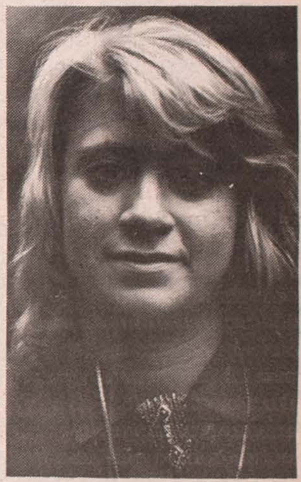
Christopher Spezio
Rockville Centre, N.Y.
Freshman

I feel that the alcohol is not the "main" cause of people going home. It's because of people wanting to visit friends and relatives. But on the other side the alcohol may have an influence on this situation; only trying to be a devil's advocate am I.



Roswell Eldridge
Chevy Chase, MD
Sophomore

Last year, the only reason people stayed on campus was for the big parties. With the new alcohol policy, attendance at these events is limited, so many people find entertainment away from campus. They pack their bags and go.



Marie Ensor
White Hall, MD
Junior

The major issue is the alcohol policy initiated on this campus. However, also the lack of interest in the SGA functions is relevant to the alcohol policy. The SGA has had many parties and bands, however, hardly any students attend these functions.

Students aren't leaving, they're just harder to find

Vanessa Post

My perception of the character of Washington College is naturally based on my own experience. If I see WC as a "party school," I either go to a lot of parties or see everyone else going to a lot of parties. Similarly, if I see it as a "suitcase school," I either go home every weekend or notice the absence of everyone in my dorm once Friday rolls around. I do neither of these. Therefore, I would not label WC as a "suitcase school."

Truthfully, I have not polled the student body to find out an exact percentage of weekend leave-takers. Nor, as a sophomore, do I have a clear picture of how many freshman stay on campus on the weekends. But not many of the people I know well choose to pack up and leave Chestertown at each week's end.

When they do leave, it is for any number of understandable reasons. One friend used home as a comfortable escape from a noisy suite during a period of work-induced stress. Others are called home, or elsewhere, at times to fulfill familial and social (or romantic) obligations. Still others occasionally leave small-campus and small-town life in search of a change of pace, typically in the form of short roadtrips to more urban settings, whether home or not. This semester I have only left campus for the majority of a weekend a few times. Home, only fifty short miles away, offers a cure to the occasional bout with social and academic burnout and a chance to catch up with friends there. But never have I left campus because I felt it was "the thing to do."

At many larger institutions, such as public universities like the University of Maryland and Towson State, however, the attitude of most students seems to be that going home is what you do on the weekends if you live close enough and if most of your friends go home as well. I've heard descriptions of College Park on weekends centering on words like "desolate" and "abandoned." This is how I define "suitcase school" in the first place; all work and partying is done during the week and then a mass exodus of homebound students takes place Friday afternoon. Considering the high percentage of WC students originating from nearby Maryland cities, it would seem that more of them would opt for home more often.

One could cite the altered social scene this semester, an issue too complicated to address in entirety here, as a point in support of the perception of Washington College as a "suitcase school." The social atmosphere on campus has changed, for whatever reasons, but just because hardly anyone goes to the Coffee House anymore or because the few fraternity houses left are no longer jam-packed and raging until all hours of the morning every weekend, does not necessarily imply that everyone has gone home. Most everyone is still here, just partying in numerous, smaller-scale groups spread both around campus and throughout the rest of Chestertown. WC students have not left; they are just harder to find.

Are you listening to us at all, Mr. Bush?

Laura Hopper

Perhaps he's just not listening to women's voices. Perhaps he's just ignoring what has been called the changing tide in America. Or maybe he's just, well, not very bright.

Yes, George Bush has vetoed a budget measure for the District of Columbia. Included in the measure, somewhere amid funds for the District's battle against drugs, was a clause that would have permitted the District to use Federal and local funds to pay for poor women's abortions. Included in this category are victims of rape and incest. Aren't they the ones for whom Bush supported abortions? He intends to use this to block public financing of abortions on the whole. Medicaid is now only supposed to pay for abortions for women whose lives are endangered by the pregnancy. Thank you, Mr. Bush, for not listening.

Do you think your veto is going to prevent abortions? Well, it will prevent abortions in the District. It will prevent safe and clean abortions, abortions in sterile conditions. Abortions that allow girls and women to have children later on, when they can afford it, when they want children.

Were you watching what happened in Florida, Mr. Bush? Not one of the anti-abortion bills proposed were passed by the State legislature. Not one. Where were you when that was happening, Mr. Bush? Was your TV on the blink?

What you are doing is not going to stop abortions. You can veto all the bills you want. It will just make abortion a more selective service, for the rich. The people who could probably afford to take care of a child.

How do you expect a black teenage girl, who gets pregnant at 14 to finish high school, get a job, and take care of a baby all at the same time? If she has an abortion, perhaps she can stay in school for another year, or two years, or finish high school and get a job. If she has to have the baby, she might end up on welfare and stay there. If she has an abortion in a back alley, she may end up in the hospital, unable to have children, or dead. And even if she does have the child, she probably won't get adequate prenatal care, so her baby will end up in the hospital, or dead. If you are so pro-life, then let's see the Federal government pay for better pre-natal care for poor women.

Your administration is so anti-abortion and anti-sex education that it borders on the ludicrous. Remember the uproar when a public high school in Illinois started to distribute condoms and other forms of contraceptives? "Just say no" is not a form of contraception, it doesn't deter inner city nor upper-middle class youths from engaging in a little premarital intercourse.

Wake up and smell the coffee, Mr. Bush. If you're not going to let the government pay for welfare abortions, at least let the government pay for sex education and contraceptives for inner-city and disadvantaged youth. The problem won't go away, and won't get better by itself. If you don't act, you are condemning another generation to poverty and misery.

If you don't care about the lives of these women, at least show some compassion for your political career. If you're not careful, the pro-choice movement will target you for removal from office, like the pro-choice movement is now targeting Florida Governor Martinez, and other staunch anti-abortion politicians. After all, 1992 is only three years away, and I, for one, have a long memory.

Kohl working to prevent second flood of refugees

by Laura Hopper
staff writer

In West Germany, there are fears that a second flood of refugees might seriously damage the economy. Although the first wave of East German refugees (about 50,000 people), were absorbed into the West German economy without much difficulty, there are fears a second mass immigration might overburden the economy. In West Germany, many of the jobs in manufacturing are held by Turkish workers. These jobs are easily taken over by the new arrivals who are young, highly skilled, and very motivated, hoping to achieve a better life in the west.

But where the West German economy was able to absorb 50,000 new workers, a second, larger flood of refugees from other countries in Eastern Europe may seriously overburden it, causing high unemployment and overcrowding, among other problems.

Worried that the failure of government reforms in East Germany and other countries in Eastern Europe, might lead to a second mass immigration, West German government officials are asking their American and Western European allies to help them come up with plans and financial assistance that will help support the political and economic reforms beginning in Poland and Hungary. West Germany is hoping that if reform succeeds in these countries, it might also occur in East Germany.

West German Chancellor Helmet Kohl will travel to Poland to present an aid package to help the Polish economy. The aid package, which is similar to one proposed by President Bush, includes $200 million for currency stabilization to help combat Poland's high inflation and support for a moratorium on payments on Poland's $39 billion debt. Kohl's foreign policy advisor, Horst Teltschik, has also proposed an international instituted to be set up in Warsaw that would help guide the Poles through economic reform. He stressed the need for a cohesive plan among the western governments for aiding these changing governments during what may well be a very difficult time.

Among West German's European allies, Great Britain has pledged 40 million dollars over the next five years to both Poland and Hungary. The money will be used to train managers, investment bankers, economists, and joint-venture specialists. These are people who will be essential to the new capitalist economy.

While in Poland, Kohl will sign an agreement establishing the rights of the German minority in Poland; this agreement is intended to improve living conditions in Poland so the Germans living there will not want to emigrate. He has also pledged comprehensive and far reaching support for political and economic reforms in most of the Eastern Bloc countries. Many of these countries have substantial German minorities, and Kohl is hoping that improved conditions will keep people for emigrating to West Germany. He is also concern that the amount of aid that has been pledged by western governments so far will be inadequate.

There are signs in East Germany that political reform might be on its way. On last Friday, the East German government announced amnesty for people who have fled the country, or who are attempting to flee. The amnesty also covers people currently imprisoned after they attempted to flee, and those arrested for participating in anti-government demonstrations. There are 2,000 people currently imprisoned in East German for attempting to flee the country. They will be set free by November 30; fines and court cases involving people who either attempted to flee the country or participated in anti-government demonstrations will be dropped.

But it was also announced that the amnesty would not be extended to people who used or called for violence against the East German government. The fate of those people is still unknown.

The government has also announced it will lift a ban it placed on visa-free travel between East Germany and Czechoslovakia on November 1. Prior to the ban, the Czech border was the only border East Germans were allowed to cross with visas. It was closed after nearly 20,000 East Germans fled to the West via the West German embassy in Prague.

A spokesman for the foreign ministry announced that any East Germans wishing to return to East Germany can apply for assistance at any consulate. So far, very few people have responded to the government's offer. Dorothee Wilms, the East German minister for inter-German relations, suggested that former citizens consider postponing any trips to East Germany they may have planned until the full extent of amnesty is known. But it appears that this will make it possible for the new West Germans to travel back to East Germany on their new passports without fear of arrest.

In the world: US seeks Agricultural tariff reductions

UNITED STATES:

The Bush Administration presented proposals for freer agricultural trade at the Geneva Summit last week. The Bush plan met with opposition from both the Japanese and the EEC (European Economic Community), a group of 12 European nations with integrated economies. Freer trade would mean less protection of these countries' own agricultural products. This could be achieved by the lifting or reducing of tariffs on agricultural commodities, thus exposing them to greater competition with foreign goods. The United States would most likely benefit the most from the plan since it is able to produce beef, corn, milk, peanuts, and citrus fruits far cheaper than either Japan or the EEC, and the American agricultural products would therefore fare better than foreign agricultural commodities in this more competitive situation. But foreign consumers would also benefit from lower prices on food. The United States is also seeking to reduce restrictions on tourism but to increase protection of patents, copyrights and other "intellectual" property.

Former first lady Nancy Reagan's autobiography, My Turn, was released last week. The autobiography which covers Mrs Reagan's early life, her career in films and also includes her period in the White House, prompted comedians on NBC's Saturday Night Live television show, to joke that the former president's biography would be entitled, Her Turn.

USSR:

Last Tuesday, Soviet foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze announced that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan had "violated Soviet law and international norms of behavior." In addition, he declared a Siberian radar station "an open violation" of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with the US. (The USSR agreed last month to dismantle the station). Then, on Thursday President Mikhail Gorbachev, during his visit to Finland, said the USSR had no right to interfere in the affairs of Eastern European nations, morally or politically. In so doing, Gorbachev verbally reversed the Brezhnev doctrine, which stated that the Soviet Union was justified in armed intervention to prevent changes in Eastern bloc countries, but moreover, Gorbachev also has verbally repudiated the foreign policy of all his predecessors since World War II, and apparently granted Eastern Europe complete independence from the Soviet Union. He also was reported to have lauded the changes towards democracy being made in Poland, and encouraged Hungary to go down the same path. The latter were said to represent the Soviet Union's "revisiting history with contrition and trenchant candor."

This Tuesday was the unofficial Day of the Political Prisoner in the Soviet Union. The anti-Stalinist group Memorial organized a peaceful demonstration in front of the Lubyanka, the infamous KGB headquarters in Moscow. Memorial is led by such famous Soviet figures as historian Yuri Afanasyou, human rights leader Andrei Sakharov and poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko, and has been trying to organize and fund a center to commemorate the millions of people who died under the regime of Joseph Stalin and at the hands of the KGB, which continues to be associated with the Stalin era, during which 30 million Soviet and non-Soviet citizens died during mass deportations, in labor camps, executions, were tortured and generally suffered immeasurably at the hands of the government. Thus the Lubyanka remains a symbol of terror, both during Stalin's time and after, and the KGB is still hated and feared, despite present efforts to give them greater legitimacy. But police did not allow the demonstration this Tuesday to proceed peacefully. As protestors ended the prearranged 30 minute demonstration and were returning to Pushkin Square, special troops, spetznaz, arrested two dozen demonstrators and beat others with riot clubs. In the republic of Byelorussia, a similar rally took place at a mass grave site but did not meet with any police interference.

HUNGARY:

Last week marked the 33rd anniversary of the 1956 revolution in Budapest, which was crushed by Soviet tanks. 100,000 Hungarians gathered outside Parliament with lighted candles, banners and flags. Their chants of "Gorby! Gorby!" were juxtaposed ironically with other cries of "Russians go home!" It has become commonplace for Eastern Europeans, among others, to draw inspiration for their quest for freedom from Soviet and communist domination from the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, himself. Meanwhile, Hungarian leaders responded to demonstrators cries by stating that their country is no longer a Communist People's Republic but simply the Republic of Hungary, planning to become a democracy.

POLAND:

In Warsaw last week, 2,000 people gathered for a symbolic funeral for victims of the Stalinist era which in Poland lasted from 1945-1953 (Poland was not under Soviet domination until 1945, though Stalin had come to power in the USSR much earlier). The Poles feel especially indignant, since much of the torture, beatings, killings, secret burials, etc. they underwent during that period was "on Poles, by Poles, to impose and strengthen a hostile power". A movie about the Stalinist era, The Interrogation, which was banned in Poland for many years, is soon to be released and further investigation into arrests and murders during the Stalinist period has been promised by the current leadership.

EAST GERMANY:

Several hundred thousand people demonstrated peacefully and unhindered by police in at least eight East German cities this Tuesday. The demonstrations are the most widespread thus far in East Germany, with protesters numbering 200,000 in Leipzig, 50,000 in Halle, 40,000 in Schwerin and 20,000 in both Cottbus and Karl-Marx Stadt. Protesters carried banners bearing the slogans of "Free elections" and "People's Government", but are also seeking greater freedom to travel, less censorship of the media, a more democratic political system and the end of special privileges for Communist Party members. The East German government, under the leadership of Egon Krenz, a Communist hard-liner, remains resistant to such changes currently sweeping across East Europe despite the demonstrations and the mass defection of 50,000 East Germans to West Germany in recent months.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA:

10,000 protesters were harshly suppressed this Sunday when they marched in the nation's capital, Prague. The protesters were calling for freedom and an end to Communism in Czechoslovakia. Riot police bore down on the demonstrators with clubs, beating some unconscious, and injuring more (though it is not clear how many). Though the present leadership under Milos Jakes stubbornly clings to a hard-line model of Communism which refuses to allow glasnost; political openness including relaxed censorship, freedom to demonstrate and to dissent peacefully and general civil rights, and has only made some gestures of possible perestroika; economic restructuring, this has not always been the case in Czechoslovakia. In 1968, the government of Alexsandr Dubcek wanted to bring about "Communism with a human face", Communism which would guarantee human rights. Mr.Dubcek's government, which did not seek to leave the Warsaw Pact or to do away with Communism in Czechoslovakia, was crushed brutally by the Soviet Union under Leonid Brezhnev during what is known as Prague Spring. Many Czechoslovakians will remember Prague Spring on Sunday, hoping that a government modeled on Dubcek's might be established, this time with the knowledge that it would meet with financial assistance from the West and encouragement, not repression, from today's Soviet leader.

Looking for adventure? Try Echo Hill School

by Katherine E. Absher
Staff writer

Brimming with adventure, Echo Hill Outdoor School is a literal Temple of Doom . But instead of Indiana Jones struggling through each calamity with only his deadly whip and felt hat, a group, cooperating together, solves each predicament.

Located outside of Chestertown, Echo Hill caters to businesses, schools, and other organizations looking to acquaint and unify their members with each other. The school is not only for Chestertown's League of Women Voters or Rotary Club, but organizations from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington DC attend Echo Hill. Following Japan's lead, outdoor schools are springing up across the country. These schools direct their energies toward enhancing group cooperation in business.

Organizations on this campus are utilizing Echo Hill's facilities. To help them conquer problems of freshmen, peer advisers and resident assistants tried to conquer challenges issued them by the outdoor school's instructors. To encourage group creativity, residents of the International House recently spent a day at the school.

PAs and RAs attempted Adventure One and Two. Adventure One promotes group cohesiveness and trust. To encourage this trust, instructors propose a hypothetical situation, with the aid of some props. One such situation entails the group individually swinging across a treacherous chasm, landing on a small platform, and safely carrying the much needed antidote to the villagers plagued with whooping cough.

One of the problems facing the group is how to reach the rope mysteriously suspended over the chasm. One group of peer advisers solved it by throwing their shoes at the rope until it swung over towards them; a groups of RAs tied their shoelaces into a loop and lassoed the rope over.

RA and senior Wendy Kloiber comments on this activity: "At first it seemed totally impossible, but everyone worked well together. It was the last one we did of the shorter exercises, and by that time we were really united as a group." This activity "didn't involve being brave or being strong—just being clever," states junior and RA Brooke Frank.

Another Adventure One activity is the trust fall. One member of the group stands on a raised platform and falls backward into the groups' outstretched arms.

Because a person could break a part of their body if the group dropped their hands, this activity really discerns whether the individual trusts the group. If a member completely believes in his peers and the strength of their appendages, this trusting person lies down under the awaiting arms and watches group members topple into the "net."

A third example of a baffling Adventure One situation is the crossing of the infamous Washington College crosswalk with only eight points of contact on the road and fifteen people needing to cross. Senior Peter Maller's group of peer advisors handled it by having four members walk on each other's feet and stretch themselves across the walk. The other members crossed by stepping on the planted feet and balanced themselves by grabbing the arms of this human bridge.

This was Maller's favorite exercise: "I've been in the army before where everything you did was group oriented. In the army, as in this place, not only were you part of the group, but everyone had a chance to lead the group at a particular time. [But] it was the groups' decisions that counted, not a particular individual's decision."

Many PAs and RAs did not know each other before the Echo Hill experience, but through group activities, but many now consider the others in their group as their friends. Frank explains, "This school is very cliquey. It broke the images we had of each other. We got to know each other, depend on each other. Many of them became my friends, and I feel that if I have a problem on my hall, I can rely on them to help me."

Adventure Two differs from Adventure One by combining group challenge with individual challenge. When the groups' adventurous spirits scramble up a tall and towering tree, attach themselves to a zip line, and plummet to the waiting hands of the group below, Adventure Two is at its climax. Teaching the climber to make a Swiss seat, and then hooking him to a beleyer, the instructors insure the safety of the climber. As the climber zips down, he is securely attached to the line.

Although the security of the student is inviolable, the student usually fears this activity. By overcoming his inhibitions, the climber boosts his self-confidence and discovers more about himself. Sophomore and PA Jennifer Griffin said this about her climb, "I was impressed. I could climb the tree and jump off the platform!" Senior RA Katina Smith overcame her inhibitions but "was a little shocked by the fact that I was scared to go up to the zip line. I thought it would be no problem for me. Sitting on the top, it was a little high, and I sat there for awhile."

Kloiber says that although she was a little shaky after her climb, she felt the instructors "tried to calm you, and if you didn't want to go any farther, they made you feel you weren't backing down on something." With no thought of the danger, the instructors, however, go upside down or backwards down the zip line.

Senior PA Mariella Ruiz participated with other peer advisors in Adventures One and Two. But with the residents of the International House, she experienced Project Quicksilver which "was an even bigger challenge" for her.

A new program at Echo Hill, Project Quicksilver centers around the foreboding Alpine Tower and combines the challenges of One and Two. The Alpine Tower is a fifty foot tripod constructed from tree trunks and crowned with a platform.

The central object of Project Quicksilver is to scale the tower; the tower consists of numerous devices to enable the climber to do so, such as a circus ladder, hanging cargo nets, a knotted rope, a free hanging log, and rock climbing holds screwed into the trunks.

Similar to the trepidation felt by the RAs and PAs during the tree climb and plunge down the zip line, some members of the International House also experience fear in tackling the Alpine Tower. Ruiz comments, "it was scary" and the scariness, different from the tree climb, was enhanced by "the boleyer being your own peer."

But the purpose of the exercise, like all at Echo Hill, is to learn to rely on group members and trust the boleyer. Ruiz feels everyone in International House bonded with each other, and she notices an improvement in daily relations at the House. Sophomore Brian Gimelson also comments on what he garnered about his neighbors in International House: "We found out who's most helpful in a given situation and who is most likely to back off from conflict." But he acknowledges that "everyone needs to contribute to an activity in order to be successful."

Members of International House are impressed by how the instructors molded the Echo Hill experience to their needs. International House wanted to learn to be more creative as a group, and when planning their activities, the instructors took this into account. The Echo Hill experience changes from group to group, accommodating a certain groups' needs.

By working as an instructor, Senior Dave Stewart helps to bring about a groups' successfulness at Echo Hill. Stewart is a fourth year soldier of the Army and Guard, and feels Echo Hill is a "nice change." A difference from the adult, male Reserve is that Stewart usually instructs children ranging in age from ten to thirteen: "As a rule I usually dislike children, but now I enjoy it. I like seeing them change through the week. We had a real problem child at the beginning [of one Adventure]. But I saw him at Chesapeake Appreciation Day, and he was the nicest kid."

As well as fostering a child's self-development, many Echo Hill programs teach children and adults about the environment. Stewart feels "the Bay is going down the tubes and so is the environment in general," and the outdoor's school "instills a respect for the environment."

One such program involves canoeing in Echo Hill's five-hundred acres of swamp. Here, participants learn the importance of swamps to the ecology, and how the bay turns to swamp and then into land. On this excursion the canoers study beavers, otters, ducks, geese, deer, and the endangered osprey.

Also along these lines are Pine Studies and Bay Studies. Taught in a bi-boat, Bay Studies activities include fishing and crabbing. And "until a few weeks ago, the eels were migrating, and we caught some eels," states Stewart.

Pine Studies also includes a fishing expedition. But instead of fishing poles and bait, the group uses sein nets. Sein nets are nets stretched between two poles, and the fishermen drag the net through the water in hope of entangling an unsuspecting fish.

With the coming of winter, the excitement at Echo Hill ends in two weeks, but an oystering program will be the grand finale at the outdoors school. The Alpine Tower, the zip line, and the five-hundred acres of swamp reopens in March.

Other campus organizations are showing interest in intending Echo Hill, and the administration is considering sending freshmen there during orientation. If your campus organization is looking for a rewarding group experience, call the Echo Hill Outdoor School at 348-5880.

Rewarding experiences at mental hospital

by Amy R. Caddle

Strange, demented humans locked away from society in padded cells; this is the vision many have of the residents of the Upper Shore Mental Health Center, a misconception fostered by the escape and apprehension of a patient on campus grounds. These images and realities question the actual safety of the Mental Health Center, and whether its patients pose a threat to sane students.

Elizabeth Rollins, a senior English major and Resident Assistant of second floor Worcester, served as a volunteer at the Upper Shore Mental Health Center last semester. This year she was offered a job tutoring a twenty-year-old mentally retarded woman. "Originally, my job was to keep her from becoming a vegetable. But I soon found out she was willing and able to learn. Now I am teaching her how to read," said Rollins. She devotes nine hours each week working with the mentally ill.

Many fear the mentally ill are irreparably sick and dangerous to mainstream society, but Rollins disagrees: "A large majority of the patients at the Mental Health Center have admitted themselves into the program. Admitting your illness to yourself is the first major step to recovery," she explained. Most of the patients at the Mental Health Center are not dangerous, and Rollins assures that "the staff is extremely competent and do their best to control the patients as well as encourage a loving environment." Much caring and patience is required to work with the mentally ill, but Rollins thinks the rewards far outweigh the demands. "It is a stressing job, but it's a great feeling to know that you are helping someone better their life. It adds another dimension to college life and gives me a much wider perspective on life," she added.

Lauren Montenegro, a junior psychology major, spends eight to ten hours per week at the Upper Shore Mental Health Center as part of an Internship. She serves as an apprentice to a staff psychologist, and assists the psychologist in his daily rounds. "It is rewarding to see a patient get a grip on their life and move on towards normality," said Montenegro. She attributes much of the patients' successes not only to the remarkable staff, but to the patients themselves. "The people at the Mental Health Center realize they are ill and need help. Most are eager to get well, and are very responsive to therapy."

Her work at the Mental Health Center has helped Montenegro realize the mentally ill are just normal people having difficulty dealing with life's problems. "There is no reason to fear the mentally ill. It is important to remeber that mental illness can happen to ANYONE." The staff at the Mental Health Center integrate progressing patients into normal society through a point-earning system. A patient may earn points for good behavior; these points are redeemable for anything from a candy bar to a weekend pass home.

Paije Osworth, a senior sociology major, agrees that integration into normal society serves as positive therapy and helps the mentally ill feel better about themselves. "The patients do not want to be known as 'crazies', and try very hard to project an image of saneness," theorizes Osworth. Osworth spends eight to ten hours each week at the Upper Shore Mental Health Clinic, which provides follow-up care for mental health patients. As an intern, she is under the supervision of the Clinic staff, as well as Barry Barrell, instructor of the Field Experiences and Social Welfare class offered at Washington College. Osworth observes chronic clients, attends counselling meetings, and eventually would like to take on a client of her own. "Working with the mentally ill is a big responsibility, but its rewards are tremendous," said Osworth. She also stresses that the mentally ill have the same needs as we do, only in different intensities. "They need love, caring, and understanding. How are they much different than we are?"

The image of the insane mental patient is hard to dispel. However, keeping an open mind about mental illness, remembering everyone is vulnerable, and realizing mental illness is a curable disease helps us to deal with it on a more humane level. Rollins concludes, "The Upper Shore Mental Health Center always needs volunteers. It is an excellent way to get involved in the community, give something of yourself, and make a significant impact on someone's life." These three women have benefitted from the experience.

The trials and tribulations of a TV viewer

Most people like to watch TV. It has to be right up there with baseball as America's favorite pastime. Who knows how people ever survived without television? Some of you out there reading this are thinking, "They played cards and sang songs around the piano." That is a nice thought and TV has perhaps taken away some of those family moments, but believe it or not, they still exist despite television.

A lot of people claim they hate TV. Now, hate is a strong word, and those people have either never seen Peter Jennings on a good day or were forced to watch every episode of Gilligan's Island back to back. Admittedly, TV can be extremely stupid. Do we really need to see the star of Knight Rider taming lions on Circus of the Stars? I think not. There is no law stating we have to expose ourselves to these inane network productions. We can simply turn off the "idiot box" or change the channel where we would no doubt find a more intellectually stimulating show like Dynasty.

On the other hand TV brings us the news instantly, visually and accurately (well, maybe not accurately). The effect of television on our lives is too great to be measured, so let's not dwell on this serious matter any longer.

I know college is supposed to be for learning about life and experiencing new things, but I would miss not having a TV in my room, and I know for a fact my roommate would also. There is something on TV every evening that is palatable, but there are only two shows I cannot miss (well, I could miss them, I mean my life doesn't depend on them. And that's why we have summer reruns, right?)

Carolin Leibig

So every Tuesday night we (you know who you are) watch The Wonder Years and thirtysomething. Although some people find the latter somewhat stressful, both of these shows are pretty good and entertaining. When I watch these or other shows, it's important either I, my roommate, or someone else is within arm's length of the remote control at all times. This way we don't have to expose ourselves to any unnecessary traumas.

For example, it can help you avoid seeing the beginning or end of an "undesirable" show which otherwise you would have had to see because you couldn't get to the TV in time to turn it off. The mute button works especially well during commercial breaks, and the convenient sleep feature lets you pass out during Tales From the Dark Side. I like to take advantage of all these modern conveniences in order to make my television viewing time as pleasurable as possible, especially that hour and a half on Tuesday night.

Most people do not realize the important decisions that have to be made when one plans an evening in front of the TV. Before the television can even be turned on, one must decide what is more important: planning for the future (i.e. getting good grades in order to get a good job in order to make lots of money) or avoiding the English paper that's due tomorrow. Usually it is the second alternative that is favored. When the choice is between Harrison Ford and Moby Dick, what would you pick? (I hope you men out there didn't pick Harrison.)

Don't think I personally do not study, because I do, really. I also do other things in my spare time, but this article is about TV. At this time I should mention another very important time to watch television. During the day friends there is a veritable cornucopia of entertainment on the ol' TV. Can you say "Soap Opera"? I knew you could. I only watch one soap opera, I swear! Days of Our Lives is my soap of choice. It's important to know how long it will take Kimberly to sleep with Cal and whether or not Adrienne will ever really get pregnant. These developments are a nice balance to the difficult world of astronomy.

And you can't tell me you don't know what's going on at least on one soap. Except for the occasional afternoon cartoon, Days of Our Lives is the only thing I watch during the day. I used to watch Oprah, but I got tired of her asking the battered housewife of the day: "How long did it take you to find out your husband was a member of a homosexual motorcycle gang." Luckily, the subject matter on Geraldo is much more pertinent to everyday life.

Four-year seniors carry load for women's volleyball team

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The women's volleyball team has been the surprise of the fall sports season at Washington College. Coach Penny Fall's squad has had to face a rash of injuries and their toughest schedule in years, but the team has responded wonderfully. The women have an impressive 23-13 record, including an important victory in the C-WAC tournament and strong showings in both the WC Invitational and the Gallaudet Invitational tournament. One of the team's major assets has been the experience of their seniors.

Four seniors have dedicated four years of their college career to Coach Fall and the women's volleyball team, and they have played a key role in the rise of the volleyball program to its present height. Debby Cohn, Ann Urban, Sharon Orser and Valerie Williams joined a program in the middle of a rebuilding process. In the past four years, the four women have played an important role in the team's success. This season, they were called upon to lead a team loaded with talented freshmen and sophomores. They have been able to lead the team by example, at the same time displaying their experience and knowledge of the game.

Coach Fall is quick to point out the contributions the four women have made to the program over the past four years. "The four seniors have really helped to turn this WC volleyball program around. They are the core players of the team, and they have been able to meet and sustain pressure successfully. It takes a long time for a team to mature. Over the past four years we have reached that point, and the seniors have played a key role in the change."

For Debby Cohn, this maturation process was a familiar one. She came from a similar situation in high school, and she is happy to have played a role in the rebuilding of WC volleyball. "It's fun to watch everybody grow together," Cohn said, "over the past four years we've learned to play together as a team. We know what to expect from each other."

Ann Urban agreed with Cohn's statement. "When you play next to someone in practice, you know what those around you are going to do. Since we've been playing with each other for four years, we know each other four times as well. I know where they are going to be in different situations."

Coach Fall has helped to inspire the four seniors, setting challenging goals for them to reach. "We really started setting goals last year," Sharon Orser said. "Last year we wanted to move our record over .500, win in the C-WAC tournament and keep our grade point average above 3.0. This year we wanted to win the C-WAC, have a winning percentage of .750 and have a 3.0 again."

The team won the C-WAC tournament last weekend with brilliant team play. The seniors believe that the major reason for their success this season has been their team play. "We're solid as a team this year," Orser added. "We have no real holes on the floor, and everyone gets along well."

"There is a stability on the team this year," Cohn said. "It's been fun to help in the rebuilding process and provide a leadership role this year."

The four women have developed a strong relationship over the years, both on and off the court. Orser feels that this has been one of the bonuses of playing for four years. "On the court, we respect each other as players. Our friendship off the court adds to our performance on the court."

The seniors all play different roles for the team. Debby Cohn leads the team with her setting and serving, and Ann Urban is one of the team's designated hitters. Sharon Orser has moved from the front line to defense as a result of her wrist injury, and she has solidified that position. Valerie Williams is also one of the most powerful hitters on the team. All four women have accepted their leadership roles this season, and their experience has been an asset to the underclassmen on the team. The seniors have played a key role in turning around a floundering program and giving WC volleyball a promising future.

Soccer ends disappointing year

The last week of the men's 1989 soccer season typified their performance from the year. The men finished off a somewhat disappointing season with losses to Haverford and Johns Hopkins and a win over Delaware Valley. The team finished the season with a record of 8-10. The Sho'men lacked consistency this year, and a squad that was considered to have an excellent shot at the MAC title floundered around the .500 mark most of the season.

The Sho'men's losses to Haverford and Johns Hopkins continued the team's streak of bad luck and inconsistent play. The Sho'men were the better team against Haverford, but they were unable to execute in the game. They lost the game 4-2, dropping their record two games below .500. The Sho'men dominated the entire game against Johns Hopkins, outshooting their opponents 11-2. WC had some solid scoring chances in the first half, but they were unable to convert the shots. Hopkins scored the lone goal of the game on a fluke goal in the second half. A Hopkins player scored unassisted on a corner kick, curving the shot into the goal. This "banana kick" gave the Blue Jays the only score they would need. The Sho'men were never able to rally and lost the game 1-0.

The Sho'men managed to rebound against Delaware Valley in the last game of the year. WC played a near-perfect game, taking out a year's worth of frustrations on a lesser team. The squad moved the ball very effectively, as none of their goals were unassisted. The defense played just as well, completely shutting down Delaware Valley's offense. The Sho'men mauled Delaware Valley 18-0, ending the year on a high note the best soprano in the world couldn't reach.

Goalie John Thomas summed up the Sho'men's season when he reviewed the recent game against Hopkins. "We had a lot more chances than they did," Thomas said, "we just couldn't find the net." This problem plagued the team early in the season as they failed to score in their first three games. The entire season was filled with bad breaks and a lack of consistency. Still, the team would have finished above .500 if not for three losses to Division I and II teams.

The team's entire season was a series of ups and downs. The Sho'men dropped their first four games and five of their first six, and the promising season seemed destined to be a complete disaster. The squad then responded by winning six of their next seven games, including a five-game winning streak. The team was on a roll, but they were soon derailed in a series of tough losses. WC lost four of the last five games, finishing the season 8-10.

The Sho'men are now beginning to look forward to next season. John Thomas mentioned the fact that the team is losing three key starters, but next year's freshman class is promising. The Sho'men also have some of the main players on this season's team, and the combination of experience and new talent could pay off. The team was supposed to meet high standards this season, but they were never able to meet the expectations. For this reason, Sho'men fans should be cautiously optimistic about the prospects for next season.

Blowouts in college football

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

One of the most distressing trends in college football is the apparent affection that some coaches have for running up the score on opponents. Recent scores in games across the country include 95-21, 91-10 and 101-0. These coaches have defended the scores, claiming they cannot ask their players to stop trying. This may be true, but it is still wrong for one team to beat their opponent into the ground just for a higher national ranking or to recruit better players.

College teams have been running up the score for many years. College football fans have learned to accept Oklahoma trouncing Kansas State by 50 or BYU throwing for 600 yards in a game. Miami has been the most frequent violator over the past few years. While playing under former coach Jimmy Johnson, it was not uncommon to see Miami passing the ball with a 60 point lead late in the fourth quarter. Johnson offered an even poorer excuse, explaining that he had to introduce his fourth string players to regular game situations. This is part of the reason it is such a pleasure to watch Johnson and his Dallas Cowboys limp along to an 0-8 record while getting mauled every Sunday.

This season teams have taken blowouts to a new height. Houston introduced Southern Methodist to a new and harsher version of the "death penalty". SMU had to have second thoughts about the renewal of their program after the Cougars gained over 1000 yards total offense in their 95-21 victory. In one game involving two small schools, an NAIA powerhouse was leading their opponent 101-0 when the game was halted in the fourth quarter. Other wins result in similar scores. There appears to be no end to these maulings.

Some coaches apparently do not understand how devasating a sixty point loss can be to a football team. How can a coach build a team's morale after they have just given up 1000 yards of offense? When a team destroys an opponent by an overwhelming score, they are showing a complete lack of respect for the other school's program. It has never been an acceptable practice to clobber a team by seventy points, and there is no reason why this should now become a trend.

Part of the problem stems from the fact that these games are even scheduled. The big schools play these games in an effort to pad their record, while the smaller colleges play to bring money to the school and the football program. Most of these games should not be played, but if they must go on, the stronger team must have enough respect for their opponent to ease up once they have a large lead. It is not that tough to run out the clock, and it is time some teams stop kicking teams when they're down.

Crew has strong showing at Head of the Schuylkill

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The WC crew team ran a full day of races this past weekend at the Head of the Schuylkill race in Philadelphia. Three men's boats and two women's boats hit the water as the entire crew team gained some valuable experience that should help them in upcoming races. The team runs their last scheduled race of the fall this weekend at the Head of the Occuquan in Virginia.

The women's varsity four boat started off the day in a race loaded with stiff competition. Still, the women did not row a very strong race, finishing far behind the winning boat. This was a disappointing performance for the women, and the men's novice eight were called on to boost the team's morale with a strong showing. This was the first race for the men's novice boat, and they performed extremely well. They managed to pass a couple of boats, and they rowed a solid race. Coach Chatellier was pleased with the novice eight's performance. "The men may have rowed too fast early on and expended all of their energy, but the first race is an exciting thing and their adrenalin was pumping. Themen still rowed a very good race at an important time for us."

The women's novice eight followed on the heels of the men's novice boat, and they also rowed very well. The women caught a crab in their race, but they were still able to regain their momentum and pass a couple of other squads. They finished fifth out of ten boats in the race despite facing some stiff competition.

The men's varsity four came next, and the boat was made up of four rowers racing for the first time this fall. This race was loaded with extremely talented boats, but the men still managed to turn in a solid performance. The men finished toward the bottom half of the standings, but Chatellier said the boat should be proud of their showing. "The four boat's showing may not get all the headlines, but the men rowed well."

The highlight of the day also came in the day's last race. The men's varsity eight boat rowed in a race with over fifty boats, and some of the other boats were loaded with experienced talent. The winning boat was made up of eight former Olympians, which indicated the strength of the competition. The men rowed an excellent race and impressed many rival boats with their performance. The boat managed to defeat many of their rivals and rowed a strong team race. The team left Philadelphia with a satisfied feeling, and the coaches were pleased with the team's steady improvement.

Coach Chatellier was very happy with the crew squad's performance this fall. "We've accomplished a lot this fall," he commented. "We've been able to get in a lot of time and a lot of miles on the water. The entire team is really looking forward to our races in the spring."

The team heads to the Occuquan Reservoir this weekend in hopes of receiving some medals in this weekend's race. The Head of the Occuquan is a smaller race made up of regional competition. This race is the last regularly scheduled race of the fall for the crew team, with a possible visit to a race in Philadelphia two weeks from now. Coach Chatellier and the crew team hopes that this weekend's race on the Occuquan will be a good ending to a promising fall season.

Volleyball realizes goal, wins C-WAC tournament

by Amy R. Caddle

The Sho'Women proved their mettle last weekend at the C-WAC Tournament held at Notre Dame College, crushing Gallaudet in three games for the C-WAC Championship.

Beginning Friday night, the Sho'women were pitted against Goucher College and Notre Dame College, winning each set in two games with scores of 15-10, 15-9 and 15-6, 15-6 respectively. On Saturday, the WC women beat Marymount College in two games by scores of 15-8 and 15-6. They went on to challenge St. Mary's College in their next match, landing a victory with scores of 15-10 and 15-6. The Sho'women were down 10-2 early in the first game, but they were able to close the deficit and eventually rally for the win. The finals of the C-WAC Tournament pitted the women against Gallaudet. WC lost the first game 11-15, but they came back strong to beat Gallaudet by scores of 15-8 and 15-2. The win earned the women first place in the tournament.

Coach Penny Fall admitted that one of the team's major goals of the season was to win the C-WAC Tournament. "We are very pleased with our victory. Our play over the two days was very consistent, and we played the best we have all year," said Fall. Consistency was a key to the team's success in the tournament as they lost only one of eleven games. "The entire team was in the proper mental zone. We were focused as a team, as well as individually," Fall commented.

In addition to winning the C-WAC tournament, three players were awarded All-Conference honors. Debbie Cohn, Ann Urban, and Laura McClellan were all recipients of the honor. This was Cohn's third time on the All-Conference team.

The Sho'Women did not receive an invitation to the MAC Tournament, as Elizabethtown and Gettysburg received the wild-card bids. The women still managed to place fourth in the league, behind Western Maryland, Dickinson, and Gettysburg. The team also has a remarkable win-loss record of 23-13, and Coach Fall said the Sho'Women have reason to be proud of their performance. "This year was a team victory. All of our players were excellent, and every victory was well earned," Coach Fall said.

Concert celebrates French Revolution of 1789

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

On Sunday, November 5, Washington College will celebrate the bicentennial of the French Revolution (1789-1989) with "Vive La France" performances by the Music Department.

Performers include members of the Music Department faculty (Kathleen Mills, Elizabeth Parcell, Amzie Parcell, Garry Clarke) and students: Renee King, flute; Greg Hickman, oboe; Doreen Rzecinski, clarinet; and Andrew Chandler, alto saxophone. Two musical ensembles, the Early Music Vocal Consort and the Early Music Instrumental Consort will also perform.

Members of the Vocal Consort include Kathleen Bennett, Christopher Brower, James Doran, Drew Elburn, Pamela Flemke, Brent Hopkins, Laura Hopper, Karyn Iacangelo, Denise LaRue, Christopher Martin, Jen Mauser, Kyndra Ponder, Justin Scout, John White and Lisa Woodcock.

Members of the Instrumental Consort are Elizabeth Cooper, Jennifer Eisberg, Pat Koch, Marilee Schumann and George Wadelton.

A wide selection of various French compositions will be performed, spanning periods from the middle ages to the twentieth century.

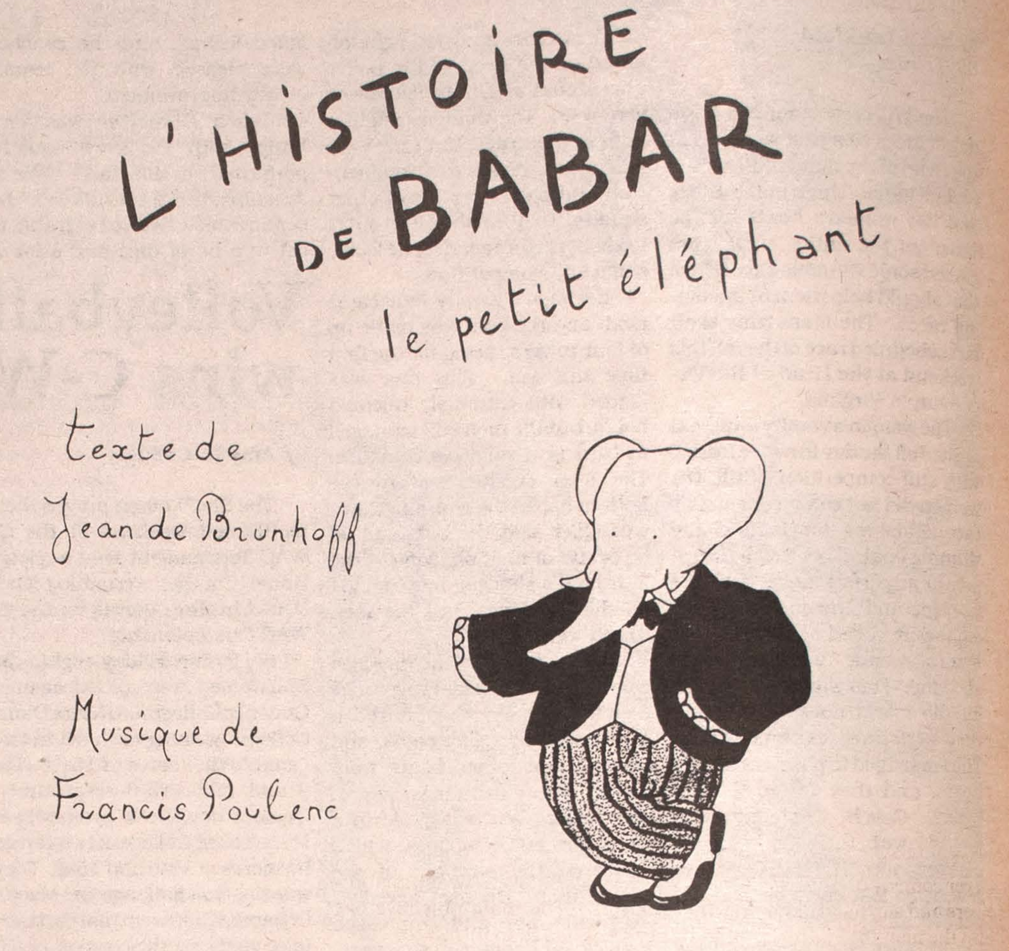
Of particular interest is Kathleen Mills' piano performance of "L'Histoire de Babar le Petit Elephant," written by Jean de Brunhoff and with music by Francis Poulenc. Brunhoff's story will be narrated in French by Professor Christine Pabon of the Modern Languages Department.

Mills chose the Babar piece completely by "chance," she says. She wanted to do something from the early twentieth century, but she couldn't find anything with which she was happy. Finally, she received a letter from her mother who had heard the piece played and enjoyed it. The piece had been hanging on Mills' bulletin board for a long time, and her mother's mention of it brought it back to her mind, she realized it would be a good piece for the concert.

Clarke said the programs in the past have centered on such themes as music from 1740, and music by women composers.

He added that he scheduled the program for Sunday because many people,students and community members, "enjoy coming out on Sunday afternoon."

The concert, which is free and open to the public, will be held in the Norman James Theater on Sunday, November 5, at 4 PM.



A piano piece about Babar will be performed by Kathleen Mills in a concert entitled, "Vive la France."

Songwriter/vocalist inspired by Chestertown

Contemporary acoustic guitarist and singer/songwriter Karen Goldberg returns to the Coffee House next Thursday, November 16, three years after her debut at Washington College.

Describing her music as a "jazz influence on folk music—jazzy folk or new folk music," Goldberg compares her work to such acoustic singer/songwriters as Tracy Chapman, Suzanne Vega and the Indigo Girls. "The music is inspiring, emotionally moving," she explains. "You focus on the lyrics."

Praised by DC magazine Out in a review that read, "Goldberg's voice is, simply put, a treasure, an instrument that does anything asked of it with seeming ease," she was also hailed by The Elm after her debut performance at Washington College. Goldberg, wrote The Elm, has a "spectacular voice...her act is unique and filled with spunk."

Having opened for such national acts as 10,000 Maniacs at Johns Hopkins University in '88 and for Howard Jones last summer, Baltimore-born Goldberg has also performed with such notables as Michael Hedges, an accomplished new-age acoustic guitar player, Livingston Taylor, brother of James Taylor and the duo of Don Dixon and Marti Jones. Jones is an acoustic singer/songwriter, and Dixon formerly worked as a producer for R.E.M.

The Miami Hurricane made it a point to mention Goldberg in its concert review of Firefall: "At last, a warm-up performer who seems glad to be in front of the crowd and truly loves her work." Agrees Goldberg, "I feel like what I do is a vacation," explaining, "when you put energy into doing something you love, it's like a vacation."

Goldberg's concert schedule even takes her to some of the world's most beautiful vacation spots including Key West, FL and St. Cruz, where she usually performs during the winter semester break for colleges.

Active in the animal rights community as well, Goldberg is involved with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA). The concert where she opened for Howard Jones was sponsored by PETA. For that concert, Goldberg performed at the Washington Monument Ground in DC before 35,000 people.

One of Goldberg's songs off her second album High Contrast reflects her advocation of the ethical treatment of animals. "Strings for Wings" was written during Goldberg's stay at the Chester Motel when she performed here in '86. She remembers, "I was the only person staying there who wasn't a duck hunter, and so I wrote an anti-hunting song."

Says Goldberg, "I've been trying to get back to Washington College ever since I wrote "Strings of Wings."

Not only does Goldberg write and perform original music, but she acts as her own booking agent, promotion director and record producer. As she puts it, "I'm self-contained....It's a full-time job." Goldberg describes a person who manages her own career as one who "needs to have aptitudes in a couple of directions including business and art."

A Towson State graduate with a degree in education, Goldberg made her transition to music after she discovered that the job market for teachers was not as needy as it had been. In her junior year of college, Goldberg began performing in Baltimore bars such as The Horse You Came In On and continued to perform in night clubs throughout the Baltimore-DC area.

After purchasing her own studio, Corbett Records, Goldberg released her first album, The Lion in Me, in '81. High Contrast originally went on the market in '88, and just last month, Goldberg released her third album Solo.

Solo is a live show comprised of recordings from three performances: 8X10 in Baltimore, King of France Tavern in Annapolis and Co-Coa Lane in Ellicott City, MD. The nineteen songs on Goldberg's most recent release are all originals.

Performing at St. Mary's College November 15 and at Chesapeake College in the early afternoon of November 16, Goldberg will arrive in Chestertown late Thursday afternoon. At 4:30 PM she will speak in the Coffee House on what it's like to write and produce original compositions.

Goldberg begins her one-woman show in the Coffee House on November 16 at 9:30 PM.

Opera tickets made available to WC students

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

For the past several years, Mrs. Eugene B. Casey, a 1947 graduate of WC, has purchased opera tickets for members of the College community to attend performances at the Washington Opera at the Kennedy Center in DC. This year, her donation included eighty tickets in prime seats for four operas, twenty tickets for each opera.

The operas, performances and seats were all chosen by Dr. Garry Clarke of the Music Department.

The operas he chose include: Lucia di Lammermoor by Donizetti, Cosi fan tutte, by Mozart, Aida by Verdi, and Die Fledermaus by Strauss. Clarke said, "each of the operas are very different."

He describes Lucia as bel canto (literally translated into English as beautiful singing) with "spectacular music." Based on a source by Sir Walter Scott, it is a tragedy about a woman who does not want to marry her husband, and ends up going mad and killing him.

The second opera, Cosi, is a clever comedy about two pairs of lovers and a cynical old man who bets the men that if they pretend to go off to war and then return in disguise and woo their sweethearts, their sweethearts will be unfaithful to them. Of course, the old man is right, and the resulting action is fraught with confusion and mistaken identities.

Aida was written in the 1870's to celebrate the opening of the Suez Canal. First performed in Cairo, it is a love story about a slave girl who falls in love with the General who has defeated her father's army. The performance features exotic dancing and ballet.

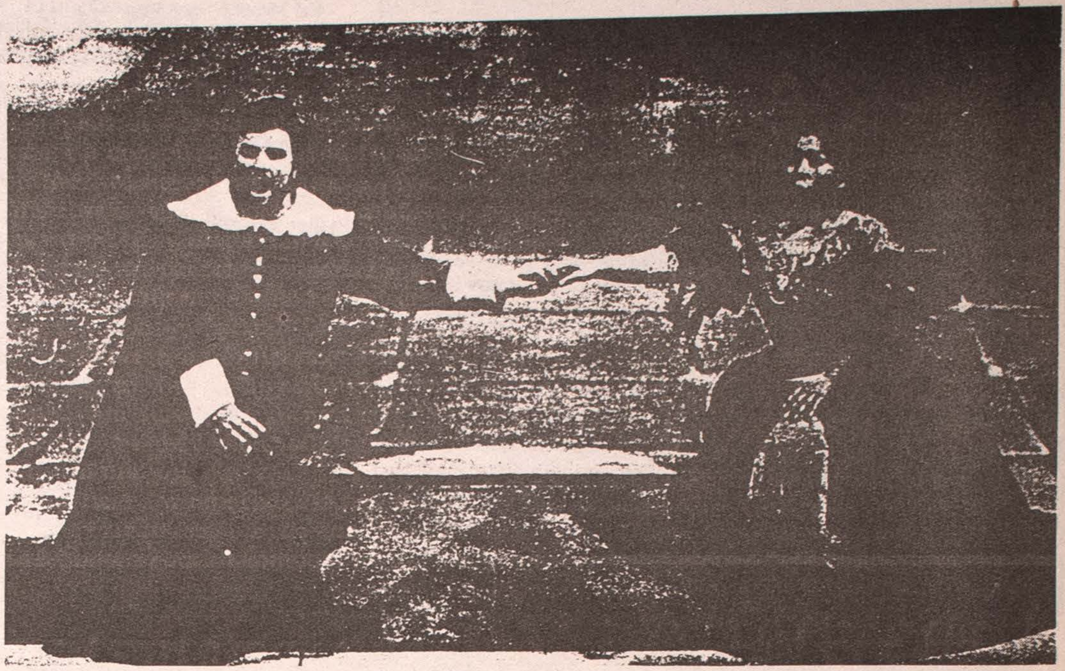
Strauss' Die Fledermaus, a comic operetta often performed on New Year's Eve, has special significance to the Washington College community because its production costs are paid by Mrs. Casey in memory of her husband. Clarke describes Fledermaus as a "bubbly, champagne-like Viennese musical."

Clarke is enthusiastic when he speaks about Mrs. Casey's donation. "I don't know of a college in the country that has a contribution like this made to student life." He adds that for many students, the opera trip is their first acquaintance with music, or their first chance to go to the Kennedy Center. For some students, the opera experience has sparked an interest in music where there was once no interest in that area of study.

Clarke says Mrs. Casey, a member of the Board of the Washington Opera, "loves the opera and loves Washington College." The main objective of her donation is to introduce students to opera. So far, it seems to be working; this year, approximately 185 students applied for 80 opera seats. Originally, the tickets were intended for students taking the opera class, but eventually, Mrs. Casey decided to extend the opportunity for tickets to all music students. A few years ago, during a particularly long opera season, she opened the offer to the entire college community.

Last year, there were more requests than there were available tickets, and this year, the requests for tickets were overwhelming. Clarke attributes this increased response to word of mouth. He explains people who have gone in previous years are excited about the opportunity, and they tell their friends, who then also want to go.

While Mrs. Casey's generous gift of eighty opera tickets is one of her smaller contributions to the College, (other contributions include funds for the construction of the Casey Swim Center, the new Academic Resources Center, and for several scholarships) it is certainly her most unique donation.



Thanks to Mrs. Eugene B. Casey, twenty Washington College students will see a performance of an opera, Lucia di Lammermoor , tonight at the Kennedy Center in DC.

Campus Events

Trial dates set

Mark Cavallaro, Nicholas Darcangelo, and Michael Johnson, who were cited for theft on August 25th, will come before the Kent County District Court on November 21st at 8:45 AM. The three were arrested after being observed loading furniture belonging to Washington College into a truck at night. Darcangelo and Johnson have since been dismissed from the College.

Peter Goode, who was charged with possession of an illegal substance, will face trial on December 5th. Goode was charged when police answered a complaint about a party conducted at the residence. He is an alumnus of Washington College.

Two students released on their own recognizance after being charged with possession of a controlled dangerous substance and intent to distribute/manufacture, still await a trial date. Hamilton Brooks Durkee and Jill Mackay Butler were charged on September 7.

Phil-Tom Jackson, former SGA Treasurer who allegedly extorted funds from the Student Government Association last year, is also awaiting his trial. The date was set for Nov. 2 but has been postponed for unknown reasons.

locked after certain hours, yet students can use their room key to have access to the lounge after hours. "In the past, the College had to bolt furniture to the floor but that became a problem when lounges were to be used for large assemblies and the College had to accommodate for that," commented Jerry Roderick, Director of Security.

Security has investigated the disappearance of lounge furniture, finding that most people who have used the furniture in their rooms usually return it by the end of the year. For students who may have sequestered the furniture, there seems to be a positive response from the suggestion of having a grace period, in which it could be returned without any questions asked.

"We will be willing to work with the SGA to facilitate a grace period for the missing furniture to be returned," Baer said.

Ed Maxcy, Associate Dean of the College, explained that when damaged furniture is found, the current policy is to either charge the area of the building or the specific floor, depending on the nature of the situation. "I think the problem is a combination of students taking furniture into rooms elsewhere and the furniture being [allocated] by maintenance for other places and not returning to their original places," commented Maxcy.

Although it is possible that some of the missing furniture could have been relocated during the summer programming at the College, Cathers says that most of the people moving the furniture have been efficient in making maintenance aware of what they are doing, and in returning the furniture to their original places.

Maintenance is in the process of relocating furniture from several other lounges completely furnished to accommodate for the lack of furniture in the Cullen dormitories. Due to the continuing disappearance of furniture, all of the lounges on campus cannot be adequately furnished.

"This seems to be a losing cycle: as fast as we put the furniture in, it either gets damaged or lost," Baer commented.

a silicon based mineral oil. Some fluid is essential as the basic function of a transformer is to convert high voltage electricity to lower voltages so that it can be utilized. This generates heat and fluid inside is required to absorb that heat.

Baer stated that no PCB fluid has leaked from the old transformer in Miller Library, but in keeping with EPA regulations and in response to their $150,000 fine levied against the school last year, it must be removed.

Baer said that the College will have all transformers removed well before the EPA deadline.

"We are supposed to have them out by January, 1990, but it will be finished by October of this year."

and presidents from other colleges and universities. Their purpose is to make sure that the points presented in the college's self-analysis report, which has been submitted earlier, are accurate.

After immersing themselves into the life of the campus they write an evaluation. A school can then be credited, credited with certain problems to be solved, or not credited at all by the Middle States Commission.

Washington College was asked to submit a follow-up report in 1986 after the ten year evaluation. Another review team also visited.

Along with this extra report, a periodical review is required every five years. The commission is interested in which recommendations the college has accepted and those which were not.

Covered in this report are topics such as curriculum, long range planning, the action plan for recruitment of minority students and faculty, information or attrition and report on progress toward a college-wide assessment program.

The curriculum section contains recommendations concerning the creation of a statement clearly defining the 32-course plan, and creating a publication for new faculty members to give them a clear understanding of it.

Another aspect of the report concerns the lack of minority students. As a possible remedy the College is willing to place more emphasis on their GPAs and high school activities, and less emphasis on SAT scores.

The college is hoping that the commission will okay the report and not request another follow-up. That would mean that there would be nothing more required until 1993.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Next Wednesday, November 8th, the Dining Service is planning another mini food show. This time it will be sponsored by Habeck/Zaitz Food Brokers. One of the featured items that evening will be the very popular Yoplait Yogurts.

The Produce Show put on by Lankford/Sysco last Wednesday evening, at dinner, seemed to have been well received. I was surprised at how well you liked the Jicima. Watch the salad bar, it may just turn up there some time soo

The student's Traditional Thanksgiving Dinner has been scheduled for Wednesday, November 15th. Reservation forms will be available beginning Monday, November 6th, from the numbers lady. Fill out the form and return it to the numbers lady by the end of the lunch meal Tuesday, November 14th. Your reservation form must include reservations for parties of four or eight people.

There will be a pre-dinner reception in the Student Center beginning at 4:00 P.M. Reserved seating for dinner will begin at 4:30 P.M. Those who do not make reservations will be seated last (at approximately 6:00 P.M.). One other thing .... YOU MUST BRING YOUR ID CARD to be admitted in for dinner.

As in previous years, the S.G.A. is sponsoring the "Give-a-Bird" program, affording students an opportunity to donate their Thanksgiving turkeys to the Kent County Department of Social Services, which will be distributed to people less fortunate than ourselves. For every eight students who donate their turkey, a turkey will be given to a needy family. Just remember, to receive credit for the "Give-a-Bird" program, you must attend the dinner.

A special THANK YOU to the members of the S.G.A. Food Service Committee for all their efforts in planning for the Thanksgiving Dinner.

Hopefully the student body will cooperate and make this Thanksgiving Dinner a great success.

To all of you celebrating Birthdays this month, "HAPPY BIRTHDAY" from the W.C.D.S. staff.

Thanks for bearing with us this past week when we were having problems with the dishmachine and had to serve from paper. Your patience and understanding have been greatly appreciated. Hopefully, by the time you read this, the problem will be resolved and the main dining room china will be back in circulation.

That's all for this week. Remember, if anyone has any comments or suggestions, put them on the suggestion board in the main dining room or contact the Supervisor on Duty. Until next week.....................MOM

Recycling project challenges student apathy

by Sharon Bonner

Students have approached the administration in an effort to begin a campus wide recycling program involving administration, faculty, staff and student groups. This program would benefit the College, by reducing costs of disposing trash and at the same time allowing for materials to be reused. The administration has been pursuing the idea of recycling for some time.

Currently the Maintenance Department, Miller Library, the Computing Center, and various administrative and faculty offices are participating in the recycling program. Each office has a bin for white paper to be recycled and some have containers to keep aluminum products. In addition, the library saves newspapers and the Maintenance Department saves metals to be recycled.

"For the most part, the recycling program has been fairly successful, except for people placing the recycling goods in the wrong containers or throwing them in the trash," commented Tim Kirk, Assistant Director of Computing.

Junior Jennifer Eisberg has started to coordinate a recycling program in Queen Anne's dormitory and has already received positive responses from students in that dorm. Planning and Special Projects will supply Eisberg and the dorm with individual trays for holding white paper along with hallway bins to hold cans and bottles.

Eisberg explained that many students had not recycled prior to this time because they were unaware of it and were not sure how to go about recycling. "I think that there is a need for everyone's awareness and education about recycling. Nobody wants to live on an earth filled with garbage," she commented.

"I think that it's important that if this recycling project is successful, then other schools will have an awareness and institute recycling," she said.

The recycling program will also exempt the College from paying additional tipping fees if the policy of the local landfill changes in the future. Currently, the facility requires a tipping fee for only white goods (refrigerators, etc.), tires, and metal materials.

Mr. Stanton, Director of Public Works, said that the present landfill will be closed and a new one will be opened next to it. He explained that there will eventually be a fee for commercial hauling, but whether the College will be charged for additional fees because of this new policy remains to be seen.

To avoid these potential costs linked to unrecycled waste, Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, has taken steps toward initiating a comprehensive plan. "What I've done so far is to get the recycling policy proposal through the administration channels," he said.

"Our first priority in this recycling program is to have a cooperative venture, and not to concentrate on making a profit," Baer commented.

However, the SGA is planning to organize a recycling program in the dormitories so that aluminum cans may be converted into cash for the SGA budget. The administration, in cooperation with the SGA, will provide each student organization office with bins and containers for recycling materials, and offices will be given guidelines for the recycling program.

According to Steve Attias, SGA President, the project should be underway by the beginning of next semester.

Security enforces parking regulations with a vengeance

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College Security has had seven vehicles towed since September for excessive parking violations. Though many students feel victimized by a crack down, security personnel have cited an increase in their staff as the explanation, not renewed attention to old rules.

Current parking policy states that each student and guest at the college is awarded a five ticket limit. Once the limit is exceeded, Security issues an orange violation sticker. Afterward, if the vehicle is found parked in violation of rules, security will have the vehicle towed.

Cars will also be towed if they are a possible impediment to emergency equipment or if they impede the flow of traffic.

Chief of Security, Jerry Roderick, stated that his staff has made an effort to "try to work with people. We send out notices to the vehicle owners to let them know that they have surpassed the reasonable number of tickets. They are invited to come in and speak with me and let me know if they have a legitimate reason why they have five or more tickets."

He also added that "we know there is not enough parking." However, this does not excuse violation of the rules.

Some students argue that parking at night is a problem if the lot near their dorm is full. Many do not want to walk a long distance from another lot at night simply so they can park their car legally.

Said Roderick, "If you have a vehicle and you choose to use it at night, take someone with you. Pull up to the dorm and run in, get someone to ride to the lot and to walk back with you. Using common sense can keep you safe."

Roderick stresses that security is serious about enforcing the rules. "We've revoked several privileges already."

Lenny Thompson, of Security, stated that their staff has increased, thus enabling them to pay more attention to all aspects of their job on campus.

"There are more security officers on duty so we can take more time out to do this. What this means is that we have a safer campus. We are patrolling and when people get tickets at least they can say 'He was here. He was checking. He was watching out.'"

SGA officers to attend leadership conference

by Kyndra Ponder

Two Washington College students, Student Government Association President Steve Attias and SGA Secretary Kevin Kelly, will attend the National Conference on Student Services in Orlando, Florida from November 18-21.

The two were selected by the administration because of the leadership roles each plays on campus. Attias said of the prepaid trip that he plans to enjoy "sun, fun and a few workshops."

At the conference, Attias and Kelly will attend a number of workshops aimed toward "creating an overall effective student government," according to Kelly. The workshops range from is-

Can tickets and towing save us from ourselves?

Call me crazy, but knowing that additional security personnel are out at the crack of dawn putting pink slips under my windshield wipers does not make me feel more, well, secure. Knowing that Security's budget increase is funding more parking patrollers, who in turn may fine me—and possibly have my vehicle towed—for parking in a spot they deem illegal, somehow doesn't make me feel safe.

On the other hand, I might feel better if I knew that the hospital employees and visitors who park in the Minta Martin lot are seeing their vehicles towed for violating parking regulations. After all, issuing tickets to unregistered vehicles does not do one whit of good in deterring them from parking there in the future; those tickets are just crumpled up and thrown away.

Parking tickets are not totally unwarranted, but they are often issued superfluously. A car parked in a space—even if it is not marked as such—without obstructing traffic, fire hydrants, or the like, should not be prey to the eager ticket writer. Not all students use their cars each day; consequently, a student may unwittingly garner an obnoxious number of tickets within a week. Certainly one penalty per week issued to a car which remains in the same place for more than a day is sufficient to make the point, especially since Security is apparently serious about "renew[ing] attention to old rules." A pile of tickets on a windshield doesn't convey this more effectively, apart from landing someone in the poorhouse.

Of course, administrators know about—and students lament—the lack of parking spaces in the lot behind Reid Hall, which is sadly inadequate to meet the needs of the residents of three dormitories. Part of the solution is so obvious that there must be a hitch involved: why not put ten or so parking spots on the lawn separating Reid Hall and Minta Martin? Much of that area is unused and unattractive. Several spots can easily be placed along the line of trees bordering the property. Moreover, this can be accomplished without cutting trees down or razing buildings.

In the meantime, as administrators and student leaders scramble to find a solution to the parking issue, perhaps security officials will curb their eagerness for issuing pink slips to protect us from ourselves.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

College's financial aid policies clarified

To the Editor:

In a letter to the Editor in the November 3 issue of The Elm, several statements were made regarding the College's financial aid policies and programs that are unsupported by fact and are unfair to the many friends of Washington College whose generous donations help to support our student aid program as well as other vital works of the College.

The financial aid policies of Washington College have one purpose: to ensure that all available student aid funds are distributed equitably to those individuals who demonstrate financial need. The actual determination of need is a complex process developed by the national College Scholarship Service of Princeton and based on the availability and accuracy of financial information provided by students and their parents. Since there is always a small margin for error in the interpretation of financial data and family circumstances, the financial policies of Washington College include an appeals process whereby a student or parent can ask for and receive special consideration for his or her financial aid application. The appeals process, too, is based on open, two-way communication documented data.

Washington College remains committed to providing eligible students with the financial support they need to meet educational expense. In the last six years, financial aid expenditures at the College have increased from $1.2 million to $2.5 million and new programs, such as the Middendorf Scholarships and Jessie Ball duPont Scholarships, have been created to extend our range of financial aid and scholarship opportunities.

As always, students who have questions about their financial aid status or who wish to initiate the financial aids appeals process are encouraged to contact Mrs. Bonnie Vansant in the Financial Aid Office.

Trick or treat participants commended

To the Editor:

I wish to commend the Washington College student body for its positive approach to celebration of Halloween this year. Security reports glow with praise.

I wish also to call attention to students of Minta Martin, Reid, Queen Anne, Caroline, Kent, East, West, Wicomico, and Somerset who hosted young trick or treaters from town. You make all of Washington College proud.

Sincerely,
Douglass Cater

A Science Editor for The Elm next semester?

Since Washington College is an institution of the arts and sciences, it seems appropriate that The Elm should reflect the scientific aspect of this school. With this in mind, we're considering the idea of a Science Editor next semester. The kinks haven't been worked out yet, but we need to find interest before we forge ahead.

So, if you're scientifically inclined, if you can write, if you can keep up with current science events, and if you're responsible, you're a prime candidate for the job.

For details, contact Susan Di Leo at extension 321, Student Mail, or Intermail via The Elm.

ISSUE: The Coffee House seems to have fallen out of favor with students this year. Why do you think this is and how can the situation be remedied?

C-House can be salvaged

Raphael Koster

Buried in the dark, deep under Hodson Hall, wedged in next to Miss D's: the Coffee House, recently in the news here at Washington College, just because nobody seems to be going there. The question is why?

I have to admit, I like the atmosphere in the C-House. I love the dark, the wooden bar, the candles on the tables, the crummy pool hall and the colored lights. It reminds me of fictional bars from countless movies, of Sam Spade. But I also have to admit that something's wrong when a student center is considered to be a great place to study because it's quiet.

So what are the good things about the Coffee House? It has facilities for entertainment sorely needed in a college that lacks a student rec room. It has ping-pong, it has pool, it has free movies, cheap pizza, and dart boards. It has a great line-up of singers and bands coming through. Why aren't people flocking to enjoy these opportunities?

It can be narrowed down to two things: the condition and the alcohol. As the second is a much more important issue, let's look at it first.

I have heard many students complain about the bartenders at the C-House. Apparently these students came in with alcoholic beverages and the staff asked them to either leave or dispose of the drink. I have heard students say they were not going to the C-House's live performance because they knew they couldn't get beer from the bartenders. Is the C-House being done in by the laws of Maryland?

Probably. One of the problems with liability and the current alcohol laws is that the C-House would land in deep trouble if someone stumbled across 213 at midnight after becoming inebriated at a dance and got hit by a Mack truck heading for Annapolis. And if the C-House staff sees someone whom they believe to be underage drinking on the premises, they have no choice but to assume that the courts would declare them liable in case of an accident: it doesn't matter where the person in question got the beer—who will be the assumed origin if the person leaves the premises and then goes to play in the road?

Nonetheless, alcohol laws are not something the C-House has control over. Rather, they can just try to avoid the problem. Recently, the Lit House came to a similar conclusion upon discovering that the directors would be liable in the event of drinking on the premises. A small college like this one has been bankrupted by a suit similar to these hypothetical ones: we cannot really blame the Coffee House for prudence.

The things that the Coffee House can do are push its strengths. It could supply new pool sticks, to replace all the warped ones that we struggle to play with now. It can publicize interesting events like the Karen Goldberg talk and concert through more audience-targeted methods: like informing all those enrolled in music courses that a singer-songwriter is going to talk about what's like to make a living that way. It can replace old cracked ping-pong paddles faster. It can try to schedule events on better days (blues 'til midnight on a Monday?) It can actually organize the tournaments that never materialized: chess and pool, for instance. It can work harder to make sure that the right movies are shown at the right time.

The Coffee House should be a true gathering spot. It isn't. Perhaps we can blame the alcohol policy and the illegal but understandable urges of WC students. Perhaps not. But no matter what, we can't deny the potential inherent in the concept.

After all, it's got such a great atmosphere...

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

One of the major problems is a lack of communication among the students about upcoming activities. That along with the administration jumbling the social schedule as much as they do.

I feel the alcohol policy is too strict. Maybe the C-house should offer specials on drinks as do local bars.

Elizabeth Stoudt

There are too many other activities going on at the same time. I have no idea how to fix it. Maybe the Coffee House should try to schedule bands on Fridays so they don't have to compete with Saturday frat parties.

Beth Skinner
Sophomore

The alcohol policy is not the cause of the lack of participation at the Coffeehouse. I think we need to take a poll and find out what the students want. In turn, the college needs to give money to the coffeehouse to make it what the students want. More live entertainment should be scheduled.

Rose Jarboe
Pasadena, MD

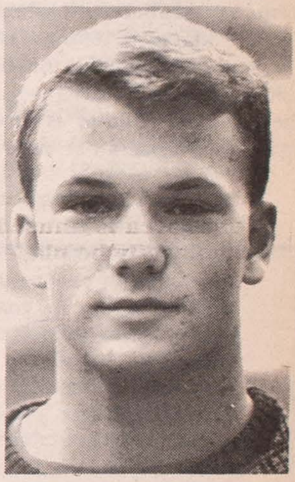
A sense of apathy exists among the student body regarding the Coffeehouse and the SGA sponsored activities there. Instead of supporting both the SGA and the Coffeehouse, students choose not to attend any functions. Cohesion among the student body is needed as well as a realization that everything cannot be blamed on the alcohol policy.



Sean White
Annapolis, MD

I've heard that several years ago the Coffeehouse was used frequently, and that all could get served there. I think the alcohol policy has been the scapegoat for too many situations, but it may be the cause of this problem. If the policy is the problem, then there does not appear to be a solution.

Problem is "deeply rooted at the bottom of a vodka bottle."

Amanda Burt

Alcohol AGAIN? It seems like every problem on the Washington College campus is deeply rooted at the bottom of a vodka bottle.

So, why don't students take advantage of the Coffee House? Alcohol, of course. The Coffee House doesn't serve minors. But wait a minute. It is my impression that it is illegal, according to Maryland laws, to serve alcohol to minors. Could this be a major misconception? Is Washington College the exception to the rule? NO.

I have a problem with people complaining that WC is a "dry campus." Really? When a 19-year-old can walk across campus in broad daylight with several cases of beer and a bottle of hard liquor without being stopped by Security, I would not say that this is a dry campus. And when an 18-year-old is asked by Security to take her glass of alcohol back inside—not to the trash can—I would not classify our campus as "dry."

And people say that there's nothing to do on campus? I disagree. There IS the Coffee House, complete with video games, a pool room, good food, good musical shows, good movies, and good prices. It seems ridiculous that people would turn their noses up at the Coffee House all the time. And if students are so bent on drinking, they could always drink and THEN go to the Coffee House.

Maybe the question to ask is not why students do not take advantage of the Coffee House, but rather why students feel that they have to drink to have a good time. I'll be the first to admit that I have done my share of drinking and will do my share of drinking in the future. But I do not feel like I have to get ripped in order to have a good time with friends.

When the alcohol policy is a prime topic of conversation, that makes a sad statement about the general attitude on campus. If it's that big a deal, then leave.

And it's not as if the administration is out to can everyone for drinking. President Cater himself admitted that if you can't learn to drink on a college campus, where can you learn? I'm sure that in a short while the big question will be "Gee, will the new president of Washington College make the alcohol policy even stricter?"

It's too bad the Coffee House staff is forced to deal with a situation that is: 1) not their fault, and 2) beyond their control. I really cannot think of one valid reason NOT to go to the Coffee House. Co-manager Ryder Daniels thought about making a suggestion box for ways to improve the Coffee House, but dismissed the idea because most of the answers would say, "Serve alcohol."

I'm really sick hearing about the problems with the alcohol policy—this is NOT a dry campus. If I really wanted to get sick I could easily find some Beast.

PERSPECTIVES

Soviet poll and other ponderings on Perestroika

Laura Hopper

1468 Soviet residents of 16 large and small cities took part in an interesting event at the end of September and beginning of October. It wasn't a demonstration or rally, and it was government supported.

The event was a public opinion poll conducted by the National Public Opinion Research Center, which is run by a sociologist, Tatyana I. Zaslavskaya. The subject of the poll was the Soviet economy, and the results were perhaps slightly disturbing.

Mikhail Gorbachev has brought the Soviet Union many changes: he has improved relations with the West, and introduced a measure of freedom of the press. However, he has failed to bring economic prosperity—or even recovery—to the Soviet Union.

The poll on the economy was done at the request of the Leonid Abalkin, Chairman of the State Committee on Economic Reform. The people who participated were asked several questions about the Soviet economy, ranging from the condition of the economy to whether or not they felt the reforms would succeed to where to lay the blame if reform failed. The general tone of the questions asked seems quite negative, as if the Research Center is biased against Gorbachev's reforms. The answers are also quite negative.

On the subject of the Soviet economy:

56% of the people interviewed thought the Soviet economy was in critical condition

38% thought the situation was bad.

2% responded they thought the economy was in good shape.

Asked if they thought that Gorbachev's restructuring of the economy might fail:

57% of those interviewed said it might fail

19% thought it might succeed.

Asked about changes in both the economy and personal well being:

52% responded that they felt the economy was in significantly worse shape than it had been 3 to 5 years ago

47% saw no change in their personal well-being in the same period.

The poll indicated growing support for some of the changes suggested by Gorbachev, such as worker-owned factories and the decontrolling of prices and private property. It also showed growing resentment for those people who have benefited from Gorbachev's new economic program. Abalkin is perhaps using this poll to test the waters on public response to more drastic measures that might be ahead.

The poll also brought a few criticisms of Gorbachev's economic leadership. When asked if they had confidence in tomorrow:

57% responded no.

39% of those interviewed felt the government had no definite plan for coping with the economy but had instead general ideas of what to do in the current conditions.

Asked what the Government should do in the event the economy does not improve within the next 3 to 5 years:

26% thought the government should resign

27% thought the government should then offer a new economic program

34% suggested they fire the people who didn't do what they were supposed to do.

Of the people interviewed, 24% felt that Gorbachev's economic program would fail.

When asked why the economic program might fail, the interviewees gave a variety of responses:

44% thought it would be the government bureaucracy.

25% felt it might be organized crime and the black market.

21% suggested a general indifference to work might be to blame.

15% felt incompetence on the part of the leadership might cause economic reform to fail.

6% felt that economic reform might be ended by a coup.

The poll seems to indicate that more Soviets are becoming open and supportive of the general idea of change, and that they might even support economic change that would produce some very painful side effects, such as high inflation, shortages, reductions in the standard of living.

The poll also showed that the Soviets are perhaps not ready to let go of some of the foundations of communism. Only half of those surveyed thought that the government should grant economic freedom to the republics or to factories and farms. Among these people polled at least, there is a sense of wanting the government to protect them from the "mercy of the marketplace" higher prices and capitalist competition. The poll indicated that the Soviet citizen still wants the government to set prices, and in the event of a shortage, favors government imposed rationing over raising prices, which leads a westerner to wonder if these people are really ready for a western style economy with its emphasis on survival of the fittest. Yet when asked to place blame for the current state of the economy, 1 out of every 5 people polled blamed the very nature of socialism.

This poll reinforces a growing idea in both the Soviet Union and the West that Gorbachev's program of perestroika is in trouble. Legislators in the Supreme Soviet expounded at great length why the government should cut off funding for the "Exhibition of Economic Achievements." The Exhibition is a large park in Moscow with several museums lauding the achievements of socialism adjoining it. The feeling in the Supreme Soviet seems to be that they have no need to glorify Socialist labor when the Soviet Union is unable to produce anything.

This poll did not go into any detail about how people in the Soviet Union feel about Gorbachev as a leader, but it does show discontent with his economic leadership. In the Soviet Union, there are more people calling for the government to take stronger measures both politically and economically. Gorbachev recently held a closed

News from around the world: Webster defines new CIA role in coups

UNITED STATES:

CIA director William H. Webster said last Saturday that the Bush Administration has given Congress a new legal interpretation of the ban on US involvement in covert assassinations. Webster began drafting the new interpretation immediately after the failed Panamanian coup on October 3. The new interpretation of the ban would allow the CIA to help coup plotters in other countries as long as the death of a political leader was not their explicit goal. The CIA can offer assistance in the removal of foreign leaders who are then "killed accidentally."

President Bush has decided to postpone his struggle for the passage of the proposed capital gains tax cut. The proposed cut was killed on the Senate floor last month. "...the stalemate must be broken.", said the President last Thursday. The tax cut has been one of the most partisan issues recently. In 1990, the Republicans vowed to "take up the struggle again.". Next week legislation for increasing the federal government's ability to borrow money to finance its deficit will be up for passage. An overhaul of the Medicare health insurance program will also come up for passage. Included will be legislation concerning allowances for victims of catastrophe, which has come under some criticism.

Four demonstrators burned an American flag on the steps of the US Capitol last week. Among the demonstrators was Gregory Lee Johnson, who was convicted in 1984 for burning a flag at the Republican Convention. Mr Johnson's conviction led to the Sumpreme Court decision that flag burning was legal. Mr Johnson's action was protesting the Flag Protection Act of 1989, passed last month by Congress. The Supreme Court may still declare the Act unconstitutional, in which case Congress might try to press for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting flag burning.

Last week, the Administration and Congress agreed to an increase in the minimum wage. It will be raised to $3.80 an hour in April, to be followed by another hike to $4.25 an hour the following year. Advocates of raising the minimum wage were forced to concede to the new "training wage" for teenagers, whereby a worker would receive $3.23 an hour for the first 6 months.

EAST GERMANY:

500,000 East Germans demonstrated, without police interference, in East Berlin last weekend for greater freedom and political change. By the end of the weekend, 17,000 East Germans had emigrated to West Germnay by way of Czechoslovakia through the reopened Czech/East German border. Meanwhile, 760,000 applications have been filed by people hoping to leave East Germany legally. It is estimated that 1% of the population has emigrated to the West over the last ten months.

Egon Krenz, the new East German leader, had tried to stem the mass exodus. In a nationally televised address a day earlier, he entreated citizens to remain in the country. "Your place is here. We need you...", he told East Germans. Mr.Krenz has promised "far-reaching" reforms of the Constitution, economy, education system and administration. Other proposed changes include: alternatives for young men who refuse military service on grounds of conscience, less censorship of the media and free travel. "We want full sovereignty for the people of East Germany. Our aim is to reform the political system. At its center is the citizen and his free expression" After returning from a visit to the Soviet Union and Poland, where he had met with Mikhail Gorbachev and Tadeusz Mazaweicki, respectively, Mr. Krenz commented, "I can take a lot of good from this experience to my country."

As far as having enacted changes, Mr Krenz has made it easier for refugees to go on to West Germany and dismissed six Politburo members. The six members were all between the ages of 73-81 years old, and generally considered to represent the older generation adhering to a hard-line Communist model.

SOVIET UNION:

KGB Chief Vladmir Kryuchkov criticized the KGB's role in the crimes of Josef Stalin, leader of the Soviet Union from 1928-1953. Mr Kryuchkov talked of the "bitter history" of the Stalinist period, saying it had "deformed the Leninist conception." In doing so, Mr Kryuchkov clung to the official version of Soviet history which denies allegations that the forced labor camps had actually begun under Lenin. By "remembering those who suffered," Mr.Kryuchkov said, they would insure that repressions of the past will never be repeated.

Alexander Dubcek appeared in a Soviet TV interview last week. Mr. Dubcek was Czechoslovakia's reformist leader in August 1968, when the Soviet Union invaded the country and deposed him. The sympathetic portrayal by the Soviets of Mr. Dubcek conveyed the shock of Czechoslovakians when Soviet tanks rolled into Prague. Though the invasion has been "obliquely criticized" by the Soviet Union, it has not been officially condemned, as it has been by Poland and Hungary. The hard line Czechoslovakian leadership, however, complained to the Soviet Union about the interview with Dubcek, and a documentary similar to it by Soviet film maker Arkadi Ruderman.

NICARAGUA:

The Nicaraguan president, Daniel Ortega called off the cease fire between the contras, and the Sandinists last Wednesday. The following day, President Bush called the decision a "shameful blow to democracy" and a measure which could provoke the US to renew military aid to the contras. Ortega's actions have raised doubts about whether or not the Ortega government is sincere in its professed commitment to democracy. While the cease fire must be renewed every 60 days, Mr.Ortega did not call it off. Rather, Mr.Ortega said it was provoked by contra attacks, particularly the killing last month of 19 reservists on their way to vote. According to the Tela agreement, signed by four other Central American countries in February, the contras were to demobilize by December 5, in order for the elections scheduled in next February to proceed freely. Mr. Ortega's decision has been termed"an attempt to force the demobilization of the insurgent army." Mr Ortega left open the possibility of restoring truce through negotiations with the contras.

EL SALVADOR:

The Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMNL) has decided to withdraw from cease fire talks scheduled for November 20 and 21 in Caracas, Venezuela. Their decision was prompted by the bombing of a leftist trade union by a rightist group, which killed 10 people and wounded 29. The FMNL refuses to take part in future negotiations unless the president can offer better guarantees of protection. The growing political polarization and rising violence in his country has caused President Alfredo Cristiani to move from his presidential residence for "safety reasons".

Soviet economy poll meeting with the editors of the Soviet Union's major newspapers, asking them to tone down criticism of his programs and policies and to accentuate the positive aspects.

Recent Soviet actions may be tied very closely to the economic situation. Gorbachev's announcement in Finland that the Soviet Union has no right to interfere in the affairs of eastern Europe could also be an outgrowth of the current economic situation in the Soviet Union; it costs the Soviet Union a great deal to keep armies in East Germany, and the rest of the Warsaw Pact countries. With Gorbachev hoping to redirect resources from military to civilian use, a nonintervention policy would be both pleasing to the West and a sound financial move. Who knows? Could perestroika be the Soviet master plan to getting economic aid from the western industrialized democracies?

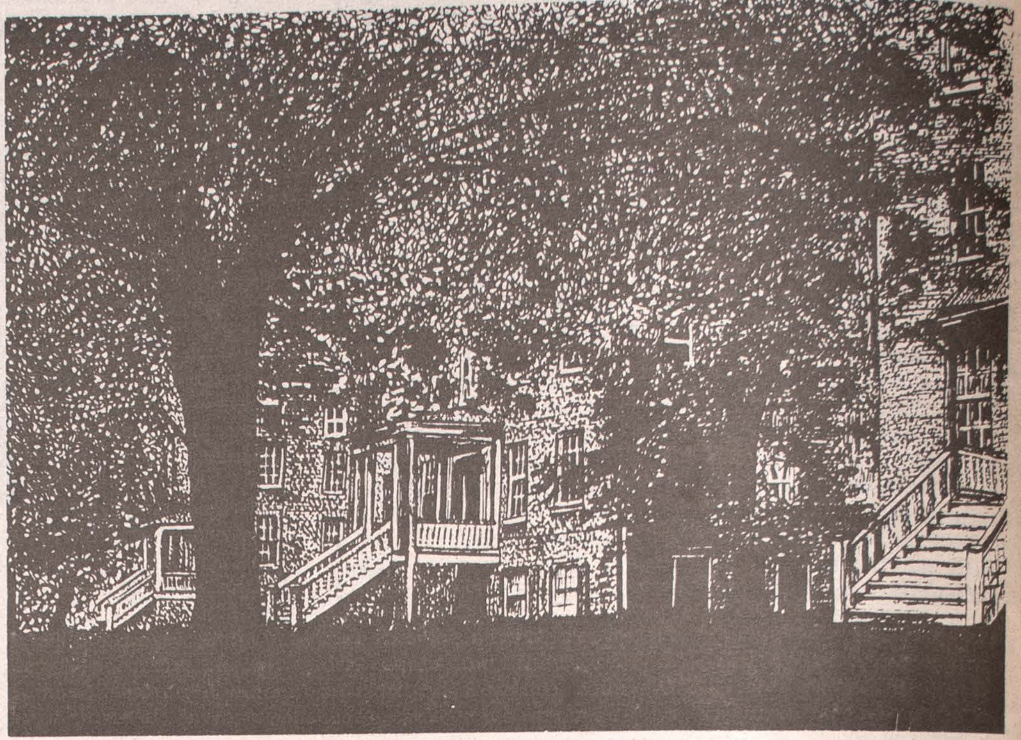
Studying at Washington College in 1826



"I am satisfactorily settled into the college building, the two fellows I board with being likeable enough." (illustration by Debbie Kulich)

by Jennifer Grindle

30 September 1826

Finishing now my first week at the College in Chester Town. The place is quaint and small, and quite the center for shipbuilding and trade. We are situated near the waterfront which provides a pleasant breeze, although the humidity may be the death of us all. I am satisfactorily settled into the college building, the two fellows I board with being likeable enough. One is a pale, quiet fellow, very concerned with his studies, but the other, Billy, is a regular chap, he should be good to have a bit of fun with. I find the curriculum here to be rather taxing. I am yet a first year student and I am expected to learn both Latin and Greek grammar, the more complex forms of arithmetic, and to read Caesar's Commentaries and the first six books of Virgil's Aenid.. Master Baker, the steward of the men's rooms, is rather a sour and strict man with an immense hooking nose. I had not even been here four hours before he came and told Billy and I our riotous behavior would not be tolerated, but that he was indulging us because it was our first day. I don't know what to think of these regulations, but I'm sure I'll be able to make a good enough time of my term here.

Rule 3rd. During the hours of recitation and study, it shall be the duty of every student to attend to his business, nor shall he trifle away his time in any way whatsoever under a penalty of twelve and a half cents.

No student shall make any noise either in the hours of study or amusement within or without the College to the interruption of those within disposed to study.

-13 October 1826

Was fined twelve and a half cents today. Master Edwards was having us recite an unusually odious string of verb conjugations in Latin and my mind wandered out the window to a playful squirrel who was scurrying busily about on the ledge next to me. I don't know why I insist on sitting in the recesses of the lecture hall, it makes it very difficult to concentrate on the lesson. In any case, Master Edwards stopped the recitation, had me stand, and proceeded to admonish me in front of my peers and impose the fine. He also ordered me to the seat closest to him. Billy had a good laugh over my fine and said he amassed some five dollars in fines last year. He went on to tell me of the time Master Edwards went to strike a student with his pointer and tripped, his weapon flying out the open window. I fell over with guffaws and within seconds Master Baker and his nose stormed in and loudly reprimanded us. I fear we've gotten on his bad side already, and I on Master Edwards' as well. And here it is only a month into the term!

Hereby Give Notice

That they have engaged Miss Henderson to open a school for young ladies in that large and commodious house in Chester Town. In this school young ladies will be taught spelling, reading, plain sewing, marking on samplers, tambouring, chinelle, filagree and fancy work.

Rule 8th. Any student who shall be guilty of immoral conduct, such as quarreling, cursing, swearing, or immodest conversation, shall for the first offense be fined a sum not exceeding two dollars, for the second shall be privately admonished, for the third publicly.

-8 November 1826

What a fortunate turn of events! It was announced last week that the young ladies of Miss Henderson's school are to sit in on our English grammar classes once a week in addition to their other training. Wednesday last was the ladies' first day, and the day I met Miss Sarah Chase, a tiny, buxom thing with sweetest looking mouth I've ever seen. The seat she chose is just in front of me at the head of the class and I spent so much time gazing at her that I was almost fined again. I even approached her as we left, but I was intercepted by Miss Henderson, whose resemblance to an angry hen quickly frightened me away. Yesterday was the second time I saw her. I hurried past old Miss Henderson and reached Sarah just as she was about to leave the building. I only had time to introduce myself when I saw Miss Henderson and Master Edwards hastening toward us. Hurriedly, I blurted to her that she had beautiful eyes and was about to hurry away when Master Edwards seized me by the arm. He told me in no uncertain terms that the men of the college were not to interact with the ladies except under supervised conditions and furthermore, that my ungentlemanly comment violated a college rule. But a two dollar fine is a small price to pay for the radiant smile bestowed on me by Miss Sarah Chase.

There shall be no running about in the dining room, nor any pulling or throwing victuals during meals.

In response to complaints by students the board announced: On three days of the week you will have at your dinner both fresh and salted meat. On those days in which salted meat only is provided a plain dessert will be added to your dinner and on every day you will have two dishes of different kinds of vegetables. You are not restricted in the quantity of coffee at your breakfast and supper. In directing this bill of fare, the Board are of the opinion that they have given you quite as good a one as the steward can furnish for the price of board which he receives from you.

-27 November 1826

Yet another hefty fine added to my growing debt. It began in the dining room this evening during prayers. The portion of meat which had been placed before us was so rank that it surely must have been rotten and it had us all gagging. The steward was thanking God for blessing us with His wholesome food and I whispered to Billy that it was a shame that the steward hadn't seen his way to bless us with some himself. But the penalty for my humorous remark and the soft chuckles it caused was five dollars. Master Edwards informed me that the sum of my fines was almost the highest since the rules had been implemented. He warned me that any further violations may make me subject to dismissal. My opinion at this point, however, is that dismissal may be the best course I could follow. Then, at least I would be free of this monastary which calls itself a college.

Rule 9th. No student shall in any way or manner injure the buildings of the College, or its appurtenances, under a penalty of double damages.

-10 January 1827

Billy whispered to me during recitation today that he received a parcel containing some expensive cigars. We plan to avoid the steward and go down to the cellar after supper to smoke a few. I wrote to father today asking him if I might not quit this place and come back to the plantation. I've had enough learning for one lifetime and this place is beginning to weary me. Fined another twelve and a half cents for being late to lecture.

Creative tips for weekend

People have spent most of this school year complaining about the lack of activities on campus. The problem seems to lie in the fact that most students are not looking to sit around in the Coffee House, Dr. Pepper in hand, and watch an acoustic guitarist jam on weekends. This is no fault of the Coffee House–it's just that Washington College students are looking for more exciting things to entertain them. Dumping beer on people used to do the trick, but the administration is trying to end this sport by disbanding campus fraternities. Except for the KA's, of course, but they're having too much fun wasting tons of dry ice to worry about unloading a keg on innocent bystanders.

Brett Lankford

Anyway, my point is that people need to find some other form of entertainment on this campus. Don't just sit around and complain about being bored. Do something about it. Be creative. That's why you came to a liberal arts college, isn't it? There are numerous possibilities for fun on this campus that haven't even been considered yet. Here are a few examples, just to get those creative juices flowing.

-Tear up power lines, phone lines, cut cable lines, etc. You don't think this can be fun? The construction workers have been doing this for the past year and a half, and look how much fun they're having! Be sure to whistle and make sexist remarks to the women as they walk by, just to get the full effect. Who knows what interesting damage you can do to the campus?

-Try to solve a mystery baffling the great minds of campus. No one, not even Clint Baer, can find the missing lounge furniture. Just think how popular you would be! Your days of sitting on a cold lounge floor will end. In addition, other bored people could start stealing the furniture back again. While you're at it, you may want to help security solve the Case of the Destroyed Film Roll.

-You can write out parking tickets. Join in a fad that's sweeping the nation, or at least the WC Security Department. Fill out as many pink slips as possible, then place them on those cars not parked in one of the five legal parking spaces at this college. If you're good enough, they may let you join maintenance and drive around campus in their ultra-modern, high-tech, all-terrain golf carts.

-Start your own mudslide. There's no reason to wait until MayDay to partake in this fun festivity. Why not do it now, when you can actually wear clothes while sliding? This drastically diminishes the chances of doing some serious injury to important parts of your anatomy. It will also put this college's abundance of mud to good use.

-Try to dodge those cars that refuse to stop at the crosswalk. I realize this is an everyday event, but add some rules that will give a little excitement to the game. Require more talented performers to wear a blindfold and use crutches. Double a person's points if they successfully avoid a truck with a gun rack. Make it so a person automatically wins if they are able to shove a KA in front of a moving vehicle. This should add some excitement to your life.

-Help decide the future leader of this fine institution. Play a game of Pin the Tail on the President! Line up any men or women who are applying for this important job, then spin around three times and take your pick. Make sure these people like rain, student apathy and "The Dukes of Hazzard." Once these requirements are met, it's up to you to decide our future.

These are just a few untapped options for fun on this campus. Surely there are many other chances for fun available to the WC student. Of course, the option of getting drunk and throwing up out a second-story window is still there for the less inventive student. Still, wouldn't it be a thrill to tell your parents about your many new ideas for having fun at Washington College? Try to keep these suggestions in mind when you're bored silly this weekend.

Between the hours of seven and eight o'clock last night the alarm of fire was given in our village. It was soon discovered to proceed from Washington College. This fire originated in the cellar under the common hall or center building in a quantity of hay or fodder. It is not known whether by accident or design. - Chestertown Telegraph

On the Burning of Washington College

January 11, 1827

This fabric das'ling with effulgent glare
Thy name, immortal Washington did bare;
We saw it long Destruction's dart withstand,
We saw it once the pride of our land,
We see it now wrapt in devouring fire,
The ruins hasting: - -Oh! misfortune dire.

Tis gone, adieu, within thy walls no more
Will we Appolo's garden shine implore,
Why should the fates this awful hour decree?
Why should they force fair science to flee?
Why should the golden Vesta wield her sway
O'er thee, O, Virgil, brightest of the day?

-20 January 1827

Tragedy struck the college this past week. A raging fire broke out in the cellar and burned the entire building to the ground. Indefinitely, classes are to be held in the customs house, a large, brick building on the waterfront. Strangely enough, this unfortunate circumstance has somehow endeared me to the old school and its strict taskmasters. I've written to Father, and he's agreed to finance another term. As far as my disciplinary problem, the Board has decided to wipe the slate clean because of the loss of so many students after the fire. Billy is staying on, and hopefully the two of us will manage to stay out of trouble and complete our education to the satisfaction of our parents.

The Board anticipates that your good and correct principles will induce you to think seriously of the folly and fatal consequences of the course of transgression and you will be incited to adopt a plan of life and of attention to your studies which will greatly gratify your parents, family and friends, add to your usefulness and respectability in society and insure yourselves the most permanent source of happiness throughout life.

Field hockey ends solid season

by Jennifer Stickney

The Washington College women's field hockey team recently closed their season with a 7-6 record. The team was ranked sixth regionally, the highest ranking a WC field hockey has ever received. They ended the regular season with a win over Swarthmore and a loss to Widener.

On October 24 the Sho'women lost to Widener in a rescheduled game. Widener scored with only 9:36 remaining in the first half, but Carolyn Athey came back with a goal assisted by Heather Mayr at 14:45 in the second half. Widener managed to outshoot WC in the second half, and they were able to score once more to win the game 2-1.

The women ended their season with a 2-1 win over Swarthmore on October 31. In the first half, Carolyn Athey scored an unassisted goal at 9:08. The team maintained their 1-0 lead into the second half, when Swarthmore scored at the 24:48 mark. Washington College rebounded with a goal on a stroke by Carole Reece at the four minute mark to give the Sho'women the win.

The team also managed to place third in the MWCFHA tournament at Catholic University on October 28 and 29. The women left the tournament with a 1-2 record. In their first game of the tournament, Washington College won over Mount St. Mary's 2-1. The Sho'women goals were scored by Carole Reece and Carolyn Athey. The team's second opponent of the weekend was Georgetown University. The Sho'women suffered an embarrassing 4-0 loss at the hands of Georgetown. In their third and final game, WC lost to Catholic University 2-1. Still, the women played a good game and were very persistent.

While at the MWCFHA tournament, Washington College field hockey players competed for positions on one of the four teams sent to the USFHA Southeast Tournament. The tournament will be played this weekend in Virginia Beach. Carole Reece and Donna White were selected to the first team, while Carolyn Athey and Amy Tiehel are members of the second team. Brigid DeVries, Erin O'Neal and Kristen Phalen were chosen for the third team. The fourth team includes Heather Mayr, Jennifer Sloan and Debbie Walsh. These women should be congratulated on the honors. The women have also completed a very successful season. With only one senior graduating and several strong freshmen returning, the WC field hockey should be just as good next season.

The NBA's battle with drugs

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The National Basketball Association has quietly made a great stride in their effort to ban drug use in the league. Commissioner David Stern, the key figure in the NBA's recent prosperity has taken another step to improve the sport. All rookies will be tested for drugs three times during their initial season. The drug tests will be random in order to prevent players from concealing their drug use. This action keeps the NBA far ahead of other professional sports when it comes to drug prevention in the league.

The other professional leagues should take steps to follow in the footsteps of the NBA. The National Football League has consistently been soft on drug users. Kevin Mack should be back in a Cleveland Brown uniform within the next few weeks, and he was recently released from jail on counts of drug possession and distribution. Of course, this is the same league that attempted to welcome convicted rapist Mossy Cade back to football. Obviously the NFL is not too concerned with the drug problem in their league.

There are also differences in the severity of the punishment that violators receive. In the NFL, players such as Lawrence Taylor is suspended for four games. Any violators of the new NBA rule will be banned from basketball for the entire season. Which rule is more likely to make players think twice before using drugs? This is just one more example of the present superiority of commissioner David Stern and the NBA.

Cross country finishes season

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Coach Mike Hart and the men's cross country team survived many harships during their recent fall season. Despite a lack of turnout and a lack of recognition for the team, the men still managed to field a team that improved on last year's performance. Even though the team did not win a meet this fall, the squad was more competitive than they have been in past years.

At the beginning of the school year it looked as if there would be no cross country team this fall. There were only three members of the team in early September, and two of the runners were injured before the season started. Noel Breger was the only member of the team at this point, and there appeared to be little chance of WC fielding a cross country team. The team was saved, however, as a number of lacrosse players built up some interest and joined the squad.

"The lacrosse players injected a life and enthusiasm into this program when we really needed it," Hart said. "The players deserved a lot of credit for the effort they put forth. Their presence enabled us to field a team and be more competitive than the team has been in previous years."

This was a new sport for most of the people involved with the team. This was Hart's first year in the cross-country program, and he found it very challenging. "I learned a lot myself," Hart commented. "Coaching cross-country is a lot different from coaching basketball."

Hart also realized the difficulty in fielding a cross-country squad. "It's hard to have a cross-country team without a spring track team. Most of the people who run want to run year round, and they can only compete in the fall here. It makes it hard to get enough people to field a team."

The runners also managed to make great strides over the course of the fall. Most of the men managed to cut their times by three or four minutes, and many of the lacrosse players on the team showed marked improvement. John Kelly and Dave Taibl were two lacrosse players who adapted well to cross country. Hart also mentioned Dave Slomkowski, Kevin Colbeck and Curtis Campbell as members of the team who showed great improvement.

Although the team did not win a meet this season, the year was full of individual accomplishments. Coach Hart was very pleased with the efforts of the squad's runners, noting one particularly impressive effort. "Greg Oliver was able to step in for us and do a great job running against Johns Hopkins. He finished very strong in the race and his effort inspired the team."

Coach Hart hopes the team will continue to grow and improve next fall. Hart believes that this year's squad enjoyed running with each other, and the team was able to develop a certain comraderie among themselves. After facing extinction at the beginning of the season and having to face a difficult schedule, the men on the 1989 cross country team should be prepared for competition next season.

Vomen's swim team dives into new year he women's swim teamprepares for their first meet of the year ext Wednesday against Salisbury (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Coach Dennis Berry leads the Washington College women's swim team into their fifth season starting Wednesday, November 15 against Salisbury State. Last year marked the most successful season in swim team history, with the Sho'women storming to a 9-3 record and pushing their career record over .500. The success of the swim team was a key part of the banner year women's athletics had last year. The women's teams are doing just as well this year, and Coach Berry hopes his swimmers can follow the precedent set by this year's field hockey and volleyball programs.

"It's important for other women's teams to set the trend and the mood for the women's swimming program," Berry said. "We're hoping to get a boost from the success of this year's volleyball and field hockey teams. It should help to allow us to continue our stability and growth."

The swim team is doing a solid job on their own. Last year's winning record indicates the stabilization of a very young program. In addition, the team has grown rapidly in five years. This year's team has six new swimmers, including three sophomores who have decided to try out in their second year at college. "Our team is committed to having a wide range of abilities on the squad. We can have someone in Lane 1 trying to qualify for the NCAA's while putting someone in Lane 8 who is swimming just for the competitive nature of the sport. That's one of the benefits of the swimming program."

There are swimmers on the team who have solid chances of reaching the NCAA Championships in February. Sophomore Kasey Carroll competed in the NCAA's last year, and she figures to lead a young team into the pool this season. Carroll will be looking to qualify for the NCAA's in the first meet of the year, and she should continue to shine on the Sho'women squad.

The team is without Jen Korten, a backstroke specialist who graduated last spring. Korten never lost a backstroke race at home in her four years at this school, and her presence will be missed. Still, Coach Berry thinks the team has enough talent to cover up for Korten's absence. "Jen Korten will be hard to replace, but we do have experienced swimmers on the team. Vicky Vahos may be stepping in Jen's place, and she should do a good job. It will be a challenge to see how we respond without Jen swimming backstroke, but we should be all right."

There are other veterans on the team this season. Vicky Carroll is a senior who is a very versatile swimmer, while Kerstin Kjellberg has proven her ability in stiff competition. Samantha Streamer placed in the 100 meter freestyle at last year's MAC championships, and she has set a number of goals for this season's MAC competition. Leslie Newcombe and Karen Brady are other swimmers who will lend experience to this year's squad.

Three freshmen have also joined the WC swimming program. Jennifer Pula has come from a strong swimming program in high school, and Bridget Ferris has proven to be an extremely versatile performer. Amy Capone is another freshman who has shone in the early season practices. Capone also comes from a very strong background and showing her ability in many different strokes.

This year's women's swim team faces their toughest schedule in the history of their program. The women start off the season against a couple of very talented schools, then will be tested by four MAC teams at the end of the schedule. The upgraded schedule should present a challenge for the women this year, but their mixture of youth and experience should lead the women's swim team to another solid season.

Crew conquers Occuquan

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The Washington College crew team added another notch to an extemely successful fall season, rowing a good series of races at the Head of the Occuquan last weekend. Three of the seven boats were awarded medals in on the Occuquan as the team ended the fall with their best showing of the season.

The men's varsity eight earned third place in their race, defeating a number of talented boats in the process. George Mason was the only college to place ahead of the varsity eight, with the Potomac Boat Club taking first in the race. Two of the WC men in the boat were injured, making their high finish even more impressive. Will Brandenburg rowed with an injured knee, while John McCarthy was troubled by shoulder problems. The women's varsity four was equally impressive in their race. The women battled a tough field and also earned third place in their race.

The men's varsity four boat rowed their best race of the fall season at the Occuquan. The boat came in fifth out of approximately sixteen competitors and showed improvement from the beginning of the year. The men did not earn a medal, but they still rowed a very solid race.

Coach Chatellier was also pleased with the performance of the novice boats. The novice women's eight earned their second medal of the fall season, placing third out of nine boats in the race. The novice women have won more medals than any other boat in the fall season, adding their third place finish to their first place showing at the Navy Day Regatta.

The men's novice eight finished eight out of twenty boats, despite competing in a difficult circumstance. The boat was late arriving at the starting area, and they were forced to wait with two other boats until the other boats were finished. The men's novice eight were forced to row with two other late boats, but they managed to row a very good race. Coach Chatellier noted that WC will see many of the boats from the Occuquan during the spring season, and he suggested that these races would be a good preparation for future races.

Two other novice boats competed on the Occuquan last Saturday. A men's novice four and a women's novice four joined in the competition, and it was the second race of the day for the members of both boats. Despite this tiring schedule, both boats rowed very solid races. The novice rowers impressed Chatellier with their resilience.

Coach Chatellier was very pleased with the overall performance of the team on the Occuquan. Every boat finished in the upper half of their race, and everyone came away from the race with a positive feeling. The last competition of the fall takes place in Philadephia on November 18. Two novice eight boats and the men's varsity four boats are participating in the Frostbite Regatta on the Schuylkill River. The course covers a much shorter distance, and the race should help prepare the boats for the sprints in the spring. The Frostbite Regatta will be have a talented field and should offer a challenge to the WC boats. This race will also be the last race in an extremely successful fall campaign for the WC crew team.

Under Milk Wood: impassioned and funny

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

Dylan Thomas' masterpiece, Under Milk Wood, opens in Tawes Theater on Thursday, November 16 and runs through Saturday, November 18. Thomas himself calls it a "play for voices," and the New York Times described it as "a dazzling combination of poetic fireworks and music hall humor."

Presented by the Washington College Drama Department, Under Milk Wood is the first WC production directed by new Assistant Professor of Drama, Dale Daigle.

Under Milk Wood was one of the first of over fifty productions directed by Daigle before he came to WC. He considers it one of the best productions he was involved with and admits, "ever since, I have wanted to take another shot at it."

Daigle says Thomas' play "is one of the few pieces of truly lyrical drama in contemporary dramatic literature." He notes, "our language has become more and more homogeneous...and less musical," adding, Milk Wood "creates a world where the language is not pedestrian or prosaic, but elevated and poetic."

As a director, Daigle was also drawn to the play for its "unusual dramatic structure." Rather than presenting "the evolution of a momentous or consequential event," Under Milk Wood focuses on every day incidents in the lives of people in a small Welsh fishing town. Daigle explains the characters are interesting because they are "so carefully and lovingly drawn, so full of life that you very quickly find yourself spellbound."

Though Under Milk Wood was originally intended for radio, Daigle asserts there are "valid and important reasons" for staging the piece. A staged presentation makes the play more accessible to an audience which may have trouble differentiating between the many different characters, some of whom only have one or two lines.

The play presents a moving and funny account of a spring day in a small Welsh coast town, beginning before dawn, moving through the brilliant, noisy day and closing as the "rain of dusk brings on the bawdy night."

More than sixty characters appear in the play in a series of vignettes, songs and longer scenes, presenting the many activities of an entire town.

The sixty characters are portrayed by an ensemble cast of twenty people: Pat Attenasio, Cynthia Croot, Ryder Daniels, David Dietz, Mark Dietz, Clay Eichelberger, Karyn Iacangelo, Jason Imber, Peter T. Johnson, Emily Lott, Jennifer Morgan, Kyndra Ponder, Carl Pupa, Felicia Shakman, Carey Smith, Jeanette C. Smith, Wendy Snow, Samantha Streamer, Jason West and Lisa Woodcock.The production crew consists of six members: M. Heath Cooley as Stage Manager, Thomas Andrews and Alistair Paget as Technical Directors, Jason Rubin as Set Designer, Debbie Johnson as Assistant Stage Manager and Light Board Operator and Chris Mihavitz as Assistant Stage Manager.

About Under Milk Wood, critic Randall Jarrell wrote, "it would be hard for any work of art to communicate more directly and funnily and lovingly what it is like to be alive."

Under Milk Wood will be presented at 8 PM on November 16, 17, and 18 in Tawes Theater. Admission is $4; $2 for stude and senior citizens, and seat is limited; reservations are quired. To make reservations, c (301) 778-2800, ext. 269 or 2

Review: When Harry Met Sally..

by Timothy J. Madison

Something curious is going on in movie-making today; Woody Allen has started making Ingmar Bergman films. As if that isn't spirit deadening enough, Rob Reiner must have noticed and decided that someone had to fill Allen's old shoes. When Harry Met Sally has all the elements of a Woody Allen film: New York locale, ailing romances, neurotic Jews, goofy wasps and lots of jazz music. As a matter of fact, there isn't a whole lot about When Harry Met Sally that we haven't seen before. According to Reiner, the film is heavily autobiographical but that doesn't really excuse the fact that the film seems like a tired retread.

Harry and Sally first meet in college and take an instant dislike to each other—Harry is a cynic who claims there is no way a man and a woman can honestly be friends without sex getting in the way; Sally, of course, is a prim idealist. But, in weird movie logic, instant dislike between a man and a woman almost always indicates the onset of true love before the final fade out. Unfortunately, the audience picks up on this a lot sooner than Harry and Sally and are left with a rather boring "Gee-will-things-ever-work-out-between-Harry-and-Sally?" situation. The most interesting point of writer Nora Ephron is that Harry can never really expect to love a woman if he cannot learn to like her first but, alas, this alone cannot sustain a movie of this length.

Reiner keeps falling back on material poorly borrowed from better Allen films: throughout When Harry Met Sally the audience is treated documentary-style to scenes of older happily married couples discussing the nature of their marriage. The material simply does not have the the emotional resonances of a film like Annie Hall.

As Harry, Billy Crystal is likable but the audience is left with the uneasy feeling that he is ready to break into an uncontrollable stand-up patter at any minute; like Robin Williams, his acting often seems plagued with unfocused energy. Meg Ryan turns in a competent if uninspired performance as Sally. Carrie Fis stands on the sidelines as one Sally's friends in another one those strange little roles t make you wonder if George Lu put her under some terrible cu

Reiner is a talented dire (Spinal Tap, Stand By Me, P cess Bride) but, like Ron Howa it is still not clear that he discovered his true niche filmmaker. When Harry Met S seems to consistently fall shor target. It is a movie that is o briefly funny but lacks the de and insight that make a genuinely memorable.

New Potato Caboose coming to rock WC

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

New Potato Caboose, a band that has built a solid reputation on years of touring the East Coast, is coming to play in the Cain Athletic Center tomorrow night. Incorporating psychedelia, rock, reggae, folk and jazz in their music, "The New Potato Caboose is a band for everyone," says Debi Moen of Performance Spotlight.

The band of eight musicians formed in 1984 in Washington DC, originally as a cover band, performing songs such as Jimi Hendrix's "Little Wing," Little Feat's "Dixie Chicken," George Gershwin's "Summertime," and several Grateful Dead tunes. Gradually, the band began mixing original songs into their sets and building fans for their own music, not just their Grateful Dead covers.

Still, because crowds enjoy hearing their favorites, the band has not given up playing covers, but The Caboose likes to give their covers a fresh sound. Lyricist for the band, Mark Mondok believes it is good the band did not try to start out as an original act. He says, "That's increased our diversity, not having to start out and write a whole bunch of tunes. It's given our originals a little meat, too. And people more and more are getting into our originals, and that gives us incentive to write more of our own material."

This year, the band and a production company, Rykodisc, put out the New Potato Caboose's first album, Promising Traveler. The album includes ten originals and a reggae-flavored cover of Van Morrison's "Brown-Eyed Girl," and a cameo appearance by DC guitar legend Danny Gatton.

Marketing director of Rykodisc, John Hammond, explains the company first checked out New Potato Caboose because they heard the band "was amazing live, and had this great following." Hammond adds much of the album is recorded live—an unusual event for a debut LP—because the band is so exceptional in live performances. His goal is "to get them out on the road as much as possible, because that's where they shine."

New Potato Caboose. a band known for its energy in live performances, will play here Saturday night.

In 1983, the band started at Catholic University as an acoustic folk trio called Wood-n-Steel, comprised of Don Laux(rhythm guitar, vocals), Doug Pritchett(acoustic guitar, vocals), and John Redling(keyboards, vocals). As New Potato Caboose, the band went electric and also includes Rich Della Fera(lead guitar, vocals), two drummers/percussionists John Trupp and John McConnell, and Mike Mahoney(bass).

Mark Mondok, lyricist and manager of the band, is in a self-proclaimed "unique situation," but admits "it keeps us a little more unified as far as management and band. Because I can relate to the band on an artistic level and on a business level, and I think we have much more open channels of communication because of that...and it keeps politics from running amuck!"

Obviously, the combination is working; as Moen reports, "their high-energy danceable music has been packing in clubs and garnering favorable press reviews wherever they go."

The New Potato Caboose's Saturday night performance should not be missed. The band will play from 9 to 1 in the Cain Athletic Center. Student rates are available with a WC ID card.

Registration

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Complaints from last year's arena registration have initiated some changes, which are mainly intended to alleviate crowding at registration this year, according to Ermon Foster, Registrar. Registration will take place on Tuesday November 14th and will begin at 6:30 PM in the Cain Gymnasium, gymnasium-B.

Rather than having all students at one entrance, seniors, sophomores, and continuing education students will line up at the side door between the gym and Casey Swim Center, with seniors first. Juniors and freshman will line up at the front door, with juniors first.

Foster urged students to arrive only "fifteen to twenty minutes early."

Security will also be present this year for "crowd control," said Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, mentioning deaths which occurred at a soccer game in England recently as a result of overcrowding.

At 6:45 PM seniors will be permitted to enter the arena.

Once seniors are close to completing their registration, juniors will be allowed to enter, followed by sophomores, freshmen and continuing education students. The process will be completed by class as space permits.

Every student's current class, determined by the number of credit hours earned to date, is printed on their program card. Students are warned that changing the class on the card will not get them in earlier.

Once inside the arena, students should find the appropriate professors to determine if there is space in the desired course. If the course is filled, students should seek out their advisor to get help in choosing an alternative course.

When all signatures have been attained, students should return the card to the Registrar's table.

If anyone misses arena registration they may late-register at any time by obtaining the appropriate signatures and returning the card directly to the Registrar's Office. However, classes may fill during arena registration.

Joseph Coyle to speak Nov. 15

Dr. Joseph Coyle, M.D. will appear at Washington College Wednesday, November 15, at 7:30 in Norman James Theater. Dr. Coyle will speak about the causes and recent findings of Alzheimer's Disease.

A distinguished Professor of Child Psychiatry at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, Coyle has taught courses in Pharmacology, Psychiatry and Neuroscience at Johns Hopkins.

Research during the last decade on the brains of the elderly who had died from senility revealed the same deterioration as those who had died of Alzheimer's disease, which effects 10- 15% of the population.

Significant progress is being made on finding the causes of and possible treatment of Alzheimer's disease. Researchers have found that a genetic abnormality is the main cause of the symptoms of Alzheimer's - much like the abnormality that causes Down's Syndrome.

With this information, doctors may be able to find treatments for the disease that robs people of their memories and independence.

"As soon as the executive counsel has a meeting, we will be able to make formative plans to organize a campus wide recycling program," Attias said.

The Infinity Recycling Company, a non-profit organization, will be picking up the recycling materials from the college.

Ford Schuman, a representative of Infinity, visited the College last year in an effort to incorporate a recycling program, but did not receive an enthusiastic student response. Nevertheless, he did start a pilot project in the Arts Department and distributed recycling trays in each faculty room.

"I think it will be interesting to see how it goes, the recycling project seems to depend on the leadership of peers as it entails basic changes in habits we all have. It seems to me that this type of project would be successful in an institution where people's minds are open enough to make proper changes in the environment," said Schuman.

sues such as campus rape, to working with campus publications, to special forums for individual officers in the SGA. In addition, the Attias and Kelly will learn how to structure a similar conference at Washington College.

Both Kelly and Attias are excited about the trip and hope that what they learn will help to strengthen the College.

Another role that the two hope to fulfill at the conference is to promote Washington College. Attias says he is more than willing to accept suggestions from students who have ideas about how to promote WC at the conference.

While there, the two will play an active role in the National Student Campaign Against Hunger. They are asking for donations of Washington College hats, shorts, sweatpants, t-shirts or sweatshirts to be auctioned off at the conference.

The proceeds from the the auction will go to the Campaign Against Hunger. So far Attias has received donations from the Kappa Alpha fraternity, the Theta Chi's, the Pan Hellenic Council, the Alumni House, Recreational Sports, the Coffee House and the Bookstore.

Anyone who would like to make a donation should contact Steve Attias at extension 427.

Congratulations to all the winners of the Perdue raffle at dinner last Wednesday. I received a lot of favorable comments about the Turkey Ham, Turkey Salami and the Turkey Bologna featured on the Snack Shop, that evening. As a frequent customer of Subway, I was surprised to learn that they serve the same products.

Next Wednesday, November 15th, is the Traditional Thanksgiving Dinner. The meal time will be 4:30-6:30 P.M.. Reservation forms can be gotten from the Numbers Lady. Please remember to fill out the form with parties of 4 or 8 (no more, no less). A reception, prior to dinner will be held in the Coffee House, beginning 4:00 P.M.. Seating for dinner will start at 4:30 P.M..

I would like to take this opportunity to welcome Lisa Travis to the W.C.D.S. management staff. Mrs. Travis is replacing the Supervisor II vacancy left by Theresa Harmon, who has left to be the Food Service Director at a nursing home in Delaware. We are all pleased to have Mrs. Travis as part of our "W.C.D.S. Family" and hope you will take time, when you come to meals, to introduce yourself to her.

It was brought to my attention that many students are unaware that the Dining Services provides alternative meal options. If for some reason you are unable to attend a meal, you can order a "box lunch" in lieu of the meal you will miss. Had you read your Student Handbook, you would know about this and other services we provide. I can't stress enough that you can always come and discuss your individual situation with any of the Supervisors on staff. We are here to assist you and are more than willing, when ever possible.

Well, I guess that's it for this week. Until next time,

Washington College for Choice?

Students, faculty, administrators attend D.C. Rally

by Tracey Conne
Staff writer

Over forty Washington College students stood among three hundred thousand Pro-Choice supporters in Washington D.C. this past Sunday, November 12th. Most of them traveled to D.C. together as part of an official delegation, registered and organized by the college's Margaret Horsely Society, a women's issues group.

College faculty and administration were also well represented.

Dr. Peter Tapke, Professor of Philosophy and Religion, attended the rally. He offered a summery of what political issues were raised.

"Pro-Choice was by no means the only issue. Right to Privacy was a central one which effects us all, men and women. Everyone has a private life and for the government to impose rules on people's private lives is inadmissible."

Tapke also cited an apparent erosion between "church and state. The Supreme Court is nibbling away at that." He stated that he was against "any group trying to impose their views on matters of private morality, matters of the bedroom, of the clinic."

His thoughts were certainly reflected in comments of the speakers. Said Tapke, "They had a lot of big guns there."

Molly Yard, President of the National Organization for Women, intoned, "And we say to you, Mr. President, we say no. We will not obey your dictates nor those of the Reagan Court."

Don Edwards, Democrat of California, stirred the crowd by citing current events, "Isn't ironic that freedom is on the rise all over the planet...isn't it sad that there are those in America...trying to enlarge the power of the State."

He yelled, "I want a society for those that are born!"

Though Tapke was impressed by the content of speeches and the enthusiasm of the crowd, "There were a few signs that I thought were in bad taste but what do you expect at a rally with thousands of people? I just don't think that helped. The other side is draping itself in religion and high morality. When you champion a moral cause you shouldn't

Students Erin Murphy and Stephen Lorenz both attended the Pro-Choice "Moblize for Women's Lives" Rally in Washington D.C. on Sunday. Murphy was part of the college delegation and Lorenz accompanied a number of students seperately. They met by chance in the crowd of 300,000.

Parking problem attacked

by Ed Schroeder

Recently the Freshman Class President, Gordy Scherer, called a meeting so that actions could be taken about the parking problem that exists here at Washington College. A group of nine, including Scherer, played around with ideas in an open forum that would be presented to the administrative bodies on campus.

"The two main problems exist on the east side of 213 and the area in front of Somerset," Scherer stated. "Problems that deserve actions taken against."

Scherer said that Jerry Roderick, Chief of Security, is very concerned with the safety of women who are forced to park their cars near the Casey Swim Center. The chance that an attack could occur has always existed and the hope is that the new policy can deal with this.

Safety is not the only issue that is being addressed however. The fact that there is no reliable form of transportation in Chestertown and that the only way to get conceivably around is by car is also a concern.

"We are concerned with the needs of the students," Scherer commented on his group. "The bottom line is that we are trying to get things done to better the school."

After talking with Gene Hessey, the Director of the Master Plan Project and Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, Scherer was told that because the Master Plan was an overbudgeted project, addressing the issue of parking was not something that could be done in the immediate future.

"A petition has been drawn up to be presented to President Cater in person," Scherer stated. "A proposal that wants to allow for safety and convenience, but is open to any suggestions that the administration might have."

The proposal is vague on the ideas it suggests for improvement, so that the administration can an active participator with it's conception.

The petition states that action has to be taken in two areas on campus. First, the dormitories of Queen Annes, Caroline, Reed and Minta Martin need more spaces available to them. This will not only reduce the number of possible attacks that can occur on campus, but will also be a convenience to most of the students.

Secondly, the parking facility over in the new dormitories and for the Somerset area needs to be expanded.

"The petition we have drawn up will be distributed among the student body," Scherer stated. "We are hoping at a minimum to get 90 to 95% of the student body to sign it."

With the expanding student body of the Washington College Campus it is no wonder that the need for more parking spaces has arisen.

"It is important that we as students are willing to do this," Scherer stated. "And it is just as important that we let President Cater and Student Board know that we are not going to be apathetic about this either."

Registration improved

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Gordy Scherer, Freshman Class President, posed to the administration on Wednesday several changes for next semester's arena registration. Every suggestion will be implemented.

Scherer wanted to address what he considered "common sense problems" created by a disorganized system.

"I suggested that there either be two different registration times in one day or two different days."

At one point Upperclassman would register, with seniors entering through one door and juniors through another.

At the next appointed time underclassman would register, with the two classes again entering through different doors. This would cut the number of students at each entrance in half.

"Ten or fifteen" students would also be chosen to aid security in crowd control and rope walkways will be erected to insure that only a few students will be attempting to enter at a time rather than the whole crowd at once.

Scherer stated that he met with Provost and Dean Elizabeth Baer, Ed Maxcy of Student Affairs and Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, to discuss his plans. According to Scherer there is no doubt that they will be implemented next Semester.

He will meet again with Baer after Thanksgiving to finalize everything.

Said Scherer, "Arena Registration is the fairest method for a college our size. It just needs to be organized better."

Students rally for women's lives

With the issue of abortion stepping from the moral realm into the more dangerous area of politics in the Bush era, it will indeed "be the issue of 1990," as National Organization for Women (NOW) president Molly Yard has stated. The turnout of more than 40 Washington College students at last week's "Mobilize for Women's Lives" rally marks a refreshing change; usually, an inordinate amount of attention is paid to the insignificant issues (i.e. alcohol) which seem to pervade this campus.

The very idea of a woman's body playing a major role in a politician's platform is repulsive; worse yet is the state governments' increasing intervention—or the federal government's hands-off policy, as it were—concerning a decision which should be a personal one.

The anti-choice movement is blatantly and intolerably righteous, presuming as it does to make the moral choices for a nation of women who may not agree with fundamentalists, like Operation Rescue's Randall Terry, who believe that abortion is never, ever an option.

More ridiculous than Terry himself are the members of the United States Supreme Court who opted to revamp the existing laws. Somehow, it slipped by these educated folks that the legality of abortion does not mean you have to do it!

Has the pro-choice movement ever been properly understood? It has often wrongly been termed a "pro-abortion" movement, which it is not, just as the anti-choice movement is wrongly called the "pro-life" movement, which it is not. Arguably, each side should be called by whichever catchword it prefers, but the fact remains that the pro-choice movement does not contend that pregnant women are compelled to have abortions, and the anit-choice movement does not save lives.

Simply put, had Roe vs. Wade been left untouched, the abortion option would today be guaranteed to all women who opt for it, regardless of their ability to pay. Those violently and/or morally opposed to abortion, on the other hand, would have to settle for being responsible only for their own decisions.

Back in the golden age of the Fifties, it's rumored that a large illegal abortion ring which called Chestertown home was busted. Kudos to the Washington College students who are working to make sure we never again have to see those days of illegal and unsafe abortions.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Article was "utter drivel"

To the Editor:

I can hardly believe my eyes! I picked up the Friday, Oct. 6 issue of the Elm, and turned through the pages. I got to page 7, and began reading Kimberly Cobern's [sic] "article" on the REM concert. Since when has the Elm started printing diary entries? That was UTTER DRIVEL - certainly, a concert review is nice, but I cannot believe SPACE WAS WASTED ON SOMEONE WHO ALL THEY HAD TO SAY WAS [sic] "What the hell, I gotta get psyched about something?" Setting content aside, the grammar and usage is so POOR that I cannot believe it was published. Here we are at a liberal Arts school renowned for its English program, and we have the word "CRAP" being used. Where is the editor? There is not enough room in the Elm to list why this article was stylistically & grammatically incorrect - and mentally assaulting to read.

Overall, the Elms recent articles have been extremely unimpressive! It would be nice to read a solid, less opinionated article rather than someone's diary entries.

Sincerely,
Miriam B. Dittmann

ISSUE: How should funds donated to Washington College be allocated?

WC needs more chairs, not furniture

Erin Murphy

One would hope that benefactors of colleges and universities donate money for the same reason that these institutions exist: to foster education. If this is the case, however, it is a mystery to me why so much of the money given to Washington College goes toward purposes which are only peripherally academic (if that), such as the all-brick fire lane to which one student referred in a recent letter to the Editor (incidentally, one can't help but think of Somoza's order to brick over all roads in Managua after the '72 earthquake, the bricks being supplied by a Somoza-owned brick factory).

So where should donors direct their money? Chairs are the answer (and not armchairs— after all, we've already got Robert Frost's). I mean faculty chairs. It's simple: instead of giving half a million dollars for another building, a benefactor provides an endowment for a specific chair, the interest of which pays the chair-holder's salary.

There are two types of chairs: those awarded to tenured faculty members and those awarded to temporary faculty members— usually big-name people— who come for a semester or two and are basically "extras" in the department. The former is one of the best ways to increase a college's endowment, and it is this type that we need more of at Washington College. This type of chair frees the money from the general fund that would normally be used for professors' salaries. This money becomes a permanent part of the endowment and can be used toward tuition, scholarships, and other educational purposes. And think about it: $40,000 to $50,000 can provide a lot scholarships.

The latter of the two types of chairs— the one that brings in "stars" who commute from the city for one or two semesters, teach one class and split, usually without contributing much to the college community— also has its benefits. It allows the College to attract scholars who normally might not teach at such a small school. Furthermore, the College has an impressive name to put in its catalog which arguably is good for recruitment and attrition. These benefits, however, are rather minimal (not to mention nebulous) compared to the benefits which result from actually taking a salary off the books and adding it to an endowment. Such chairs should be a luxury reserved for a time when there is already an abundance of tenured faculty chairs.

This is not the case at Washington College, which currently has five chairs (Howard, Nuttle, Jones, McLean, and Goldstein), the first three being the only ones currently awarded to permanent faculty members. The McLean Chair is "non-traditional," and does not fund a chair per se. The Goldstein Chair is currently being used to fund a couple of professors who are here temporarily. So in reality we have only three of the type of chair which is the "life-blood" of a college and the most important in terms of increasing the endowment.

So the two burning questions are 1) why don't we have more chairs? and 2) why is it that 40% of our chairs are not utilized to this institution's greatest educational and economical benefit?

A possible answer to the first question is that those who give money have the say-so about where it is allocated. But isn't it the duty of those in power to guide these contributions in the right direction? If a potential donor says, "I want to give money for a gym," and the school doesn't need another gym, can't the president say, "Look, we really appre-

Any new money that comes in should be divided between whatever departments or services seem to actually need it, rather than giving it to departments that already have a long budget. It shouldn't go to any specific person such as administrator's salary.

I think that scholarships should be funded because a lot of people need extra money to stay here at WC and I also think some of the money should go towards the sports program to help us look better and win more.

Perhaps the question is best answered by those that donate the money. They should be the ones to stipulate where they want their money to go. Other than that, the administration should consider supplying the students with better food and information rather than making everything look nicer on the outside.

College must allocate funds more efficiently

A.J. MacLennan

A common conversation here on campus concerns (among many other related and less than related topics) is the reportedly incredible size of the WC endowment. One of the topics most closely related to the endowment size is that of a similarly incredible alumni donation ratio. So where does all this money go to? Obviously, and necessarily, a good portion of alumni donated funds does go to the endowment. This allows in large part for the continued success of the school, and also for some return on the alumni investment. The money not allotted to the endowment is what is at question here. Most commonly used for special projects such as the Casey Swim Center or President Cater's Master Plan, questions often arise as to whether the money is put mostly for the good of the students or for the image of the College itself. While the Master Plan is also partially state funded, it cannot be denied that a good deal of money has been allotted to its completion. Is this money really for the best of the students' education, or could it be more effectively spent?

Of the related conversations mentioned above, a number are a litany of complaints, varying from outrageous fines for parking, excessive loudness, and drinking to the recently spotlighted lack of class selection. Also suggested is free on-campus calling, a policy in evidence at many, less affluent colleges. Another common complaint is at the lack of sufficient facilities for the sporting teams, with lighted fields and more equipment a priority. Especially prominent among certain athletes is the request for a proper Field House for the lacrosse team. Campus social life is also a major student complaint. Students miss the opportunities provided by on-campus parties and also very prominent is a regret at the situation of the Inter-Fraternity Association. A majority of socially active students come to college in the hopes of joining a fraternity or sorority only to be turned off by the college's unsupportive atmosphere. On a smaller but perhaps much more important scale, there is the obvious and unnecessary overspending of the college funds on such items as disposable cups, napkins and other such items which need no adornment. This money wasted on pretension, if at all dependent on alumni funds could definitely be put to much better use. Alumni undoubtedly appreciate the pretty little cups, but I'm sure they would prefer a college that is making its students as happy as they must have been. All of these problems if seriously considered may be simply, and expediently put right. All of these problems may in fact already be being worked on. However they are at the very least a serious morale problem among the students.

If this money is being spent effectively and for the purpose of meeting the students needs, it is being done so very discreetly. Perhaps too discreetly, considering the feelings of numerous students on and off campus. The administration would do well to consider student needs, including those not brought up at SGA. meetings. A pretty college that can't even satisfy it's students isn't very pretty at all.

A.J. MacLennan is a freshman.

PERSPECTIVES

Something to ponder over your Thanksgiving turkey

Carolin Leibig

A recent Time magazine cover story dealt with the plight of the African elephant. Poachers have so depleted the once large herds that by the middle of the next decade there will be no elephants roaming the vast African savanna. Most of us are pulling for the endangered elephant, but tragically, some people are not. A later issue of Time ran several letters responding to the article, all but one condemned the poachers and called for stricter guidelines to punish those involved in the trade of ivory. But most of all they want to help save the elephant.

One letter, however, criticized Time for not writing about the plight of all those "helpless" people involved in the ivory trade. This reader contended that the jobs of a few human beings are more important than the survival of an entire species. How dare he even think that! We humans are only one of thousands of living beings on this planet, yet we feel that all those other "lower" beings were put here for our own personal use. We have no right to take this view.

Argue this point with me if you wish, but it is a proven fact that man has done absolutely nothing positive for the earth. My faith in the human race is extremely frail, and I am sorry to say that we have to be the most idiotic beings around. Forget getting along with our environment, we do not even get along with each other. You do not see squirrels or dolphins devising better more efficient ways to totally annihilate each other. We do have the most intellectual capability of any animal, and it is a shame that we cannot use this to our advantage. Instead of making the world a better place for all who live here, we insist on making it difficult for each other and the innocent animals who are the victims of our stupidity.

Perhaps I should list the positive things we have accomplished: okay there is love and friendship (but they do not benefit anyone but us humans).

And now the negative things: severely endangering elephants, lions, buffalo, California condors, seals, dolphins, whales, manatees, wolves, snowy egrets, bald eagles, oysters, clams, chimpanzees, orangutans, pandas, red foxes, rhinoceros, tigers, antelope, zebras, crocodiles, alligators (I could go on and on...); We are also responsible for warfare, acid rain, styrofoam, nuclear weapons, toxic waste, trash, destruction of forests, plastics, disposable diapers, carbon monoxide, polyester, DDT, agent orange, chemical weapons, hand guns, rifles, shot guns, assault weapons, twinkees, grenades, nuclear winter, apathy, ignorance, hate, ozone depletion, diesel fuel, development, global warming, dumping, high-way construction, fur coats, arms race, hunting for sport, greed, air pollution, water pollution, killing the Chesapeake, leaded gasoline, preservatives, medical waste, fishing nets, fertilizer, mining, nuclear testing, drugs, smog, stars wars, asbestos, green-house effect, erosion, landfills, detergents, oil spills and so much more...

It is necessary for us, as the heirs of this mess, to figure out how we can stop the destruction of this planet. Maybe we should limit ourselves to what we need. We need clothing, but do we need fur coats? Most things can be made out of cotton and there are many kinds of wool. Leather is perhaps the only thing that it may be necessary to kill an animal for. Is it necessary to eat lobster, octopus, or other endangered "delicacies"? I am pretty satisfied with chicken, beef, and fish. Being a vegetarian does not make you a saint, it just means you're not getting the protein you need. Other animals eat meat, too. But there should be a limit to how much we eat. Restraining ourselves may be the answer.

The rate of "development" should be slowed down and eventually stopped. I have always wondered what people meant by developed and undeveloped land. I know technically what they mean, but does undeveloped mean land free of asphalt? To me, an area covered with trees and seemingly untouched by humans is very much developed, it is home to many things and we really have no right to disturb it. Did anyone ask that deer how long his lease is for? And where would all those rabbits go? Why don't State Highway Administrations ever think of them?

I suppose we will not stop until the only green left in the world will be Central Park in New York. Imagine all the people bringing their children to see it: "Look, honey, see that thing over there? That's called a tree. They they used to be everywhere when I was your age." Of course we would all be dead if we did manage to destroy the environment. If the elephant dies, we are just taking a step closer to our own demise, which we are helping along at an alarming rate.

The environment is the biggest problem we face today. It is more important than human rights violations, the arms race, drugs, wars, revolutions, and the deficit. Those things will not even be an issue after we destroy the environment, because we will all be to busy dropping dead to worry about them. Writing this reminded me of a book called On the Beach. The story takes place in Australia, which is the only place where life remains after an all out nuclear exchange in the northern hemisphere. With the radioactive cloud moving closer and closer, those remaining people down under don't have much to do except think about their fate. One character decides that this is the best thing that could have happened to the planet because it will give other species a chance to make a comeback, evolve and live in peace without human intervention. He described it as a cleansing of the Earth. Maybe that really would not be so bad, but we would have to have this nuclear war soon before the world is so destroyed that those other species would not be able to make a comeback...and the planet would just be dead.

News from around the world:

UNITED STATES:

Pro-choice demonstrators held rallies in 150 cities and towns across the United States as part of the campaign of the National Organization for Women (NOW) to "Mobilize for Women's Lives." In Washington, DC, NOW estimates that 300,000 people turned out for the rally at the Lincoln Memorial. Other large rallies were held in cities such as New Orleans where 15,000 people demonstrated; Austin, Texas where more than 20,000 people turned out; Milwaukee; in Jefferson City, Missouri where Webster v. Reproductive Services was tried, 15,000 people demonstrated; and Los Angeles where celebrities joined 50,000 demonstrators. The campaign began at sunrise outside President Bush's summer house in Kennebunkport, Maine, and ended with rallies in several Alaskan cities. In Michigan, pro-choice volunteers conducted a door to door canvassing of voters in an effort to target elected officials who had not supported abortion rights in the past.

EAST GERMANY:

In an effort to stem the flood of people leaving East Germany for improved economic opportunities in the West, the East German government announced Thursday of last week that it was opening its border with West Germany and ending restrictions on travel to the West. Within hours of the announcement, thousands of East Berliners swarmed through checkpoints and over the Berlin Wall into West Berlin, celebrating their newly granted freedom. On Saturday, the East German government announced the open border would be permanent, and East German workers began ripping a large hole in the wall to make room for crossings as the government announced that citizens would be free to move through any crossing in the wall.

Those East Germans who visited West Berlin last weekend were met by crowds of cheering, flag-waving West Germans. Some East Germans were offered tours by West Germans. Those who traveled to West Berlin were given $100 in gift money from the West German government, but were unable to use it as most stores were closed on Sunday.

The wall will not, however, be dismantled. In the 19 years since its building, 5000 East Germans have fled over, under and through the wall to West Berlin, while 5000 more were caught and jailed for their attempts. 191 people were killed by gunfire or exploding mines when attempting to cross into West Berlin.

My heroes, security guards

I'd first like to take this opportunity to announce that arena registration was once again a rousing success. The administration has shown that no matter how mature college students think they are, they can still be made to accumulate in a very small area and stand around for an hour just to take a course entitled "In Search of Don Juan." That sounds like a special hosted by Leonard Nimoy.

Brett Lankford

At least no brawls began in these close quarters, and this is mostly thanks to our beloved security department. These fine men in blue made sure nothing happened that would even slightly resemble the soccer riots in England. I'm sure we were all very relieved that no soccer games managed to break out in front of the athletic center. I'm not actually sure what security did to prevent any of these possible catastrophes, but we certainly appreciate their efforts.

Of course, it's rather routine for us to appreciate the efforts of the Washington College security department. We're always able to tell when they're on the job. They can often be seen awarding students who park in especially creative ways with very attractive pink slips. Sure, they're not around when fire alarms are going off at two in the morning. Sure, Spike spends most of his existence making sure that no one runs off with a salt or pepper shaker from Miss D's. Still, if you ever see a student's car parked in an RA spot, be confident that they will be nailed and dealt with severely for this horrible crime.

Not only that, security also has a wonderful appreciation of student's attitudes toward different circumstances. Over the years certain members of security have come to realize that when most students get tickets their reaction is "He was here. He was checking. He was watching out." That's the exact reaction we students have. When I found a parking violation on my car last month, I could hardly contain my glee. I suddenly felt very safe at this college. I realized that if any twisted criminals would even think to do something so vicious as park illegally on this campus, they would be doing time so fast it would make their head spin.

Security has also suggested a wonderful solution to many of the students' parking problems. Just park somewhere legal! What a revelation! It doesn't matter there are twice as many cars as there are legal parking spaces on this campus. Security feels the easiest way to solve this problem is to bring a friend along for the search. That way you have someone to help you scour the area for a free space, as well as help you hitch a ride back from the space you finally found in Rock Hall. If you bring enough friends along, you can probably pick up one of the cars in a legal parking space and move it to one of the fifty-eight NO PARKING zones on campus. By the way, if security gets such a kick out of ticketing people, they should take some time to write up the maintenance workers who practically run over unsuspecting students while drag racing their cars across what little grass still remains at WC.

It's also difficult to tell if security does anything other than ticket people. What happens if you're in real trouble and really need the help of security? Call their extension, right? Wrong! The only way to get in touch with security is by hanging around your illegally-parked car until they show up to tow it. If you're really in trouble, you can leave a message on their answering machine. That will certainly do you a lot of good if a fire breaks out in your building. As your belongings are being burned to the ground, it's nice to know security will be right on top of it the following day. Joe Gladu is the only member of the security department who actually makes a student feel secure.

Lenny Thompson and Jerry Roderick deserve most of the credit/blame for the role of security on this campus. In the Washington College Hall of Justice, these two men are little more than the Wonder Twins. You can almost hear it now. Shape of...a parking ticket! Form of...a tow truck! This is aside from the fact that they look almost exactly alike. Unfortunately they also think exactly alike, which causes most of the problems with security on this campus.

Of course, the security department seems to be improving drastically. If they tow a few more cars, the few remaining automobiles will automatically be parked in a legal space. They were also able to control the screaming masses at arena registration. At this rate security may soon become a help instead of a nuisance. I wish I could talk a little longer, but I'm presently parked in President Cater's official spot and may have to face the firing squad if I don't move.

Basketball hopes to repeat history in upcoming season

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Coach Tom Finnegan and the men's basketball team hope history will repeat itself in this 1989-1990 season. In the '85-'86 season, Finnegan entered the year with a team which lacked experience but was loaded with new freshmen talent. That team, led by Honorable Mention All-American Kurt Keller, surprised some preseason pessimists with a wonderful year. This year's team is led by Honorable Mention All-American Tim Keehan, the first WC player since Keller to receive such an honor. The team is also made up of eight freshmen and nine newcomers to the program, and Finnegan hopes this year's edition of WC basketball will continue the program's winning tradition. The Sho'men open their season this Friday against Moravian at the Scottywood Tournament at Muhlenberg College, then make their home debut Tuesday, November 21 against Frostburg State.

There are big expectations for this year's basketball team. The Washington College program has been playing at a consistently high level in this decade, recording a 127-52 record over the past seven years. They have also reached the NCAA tournament three of the last six years, including last year's impressive performance. Only five players return from last year's 20-7 team, and familiar names such as Andy Bauer, Tom Auvil, Steve Brody and Scott Jones will no longer be in uniform. Jones can still be seen on the WC bench, however, as he enters his first year as an assistant coach. Mike Hart, Webster Johnson and Fred McNeil round out Finnegan's coaching staff.

This year's squad must rely on the leadership of the team's five returning seniors. Keehan is the team captain, and he returns with MAC first team and Division III All-American honors under his belt. He returns with Chris Brandt and Chris Jamke to give the Sho'men a solid combination on the offensive half of the court. Keehan is also the team's top defender, and he should lead the traditionally stingy Sho'men defense. Charles "Tank" Duckett and Charles Johnson are the two other seniors who will play a major role in the team's success. Duckett may either start or play the important role of sixth man.

Despite the lack of experience on this team, Finnegan disagrees with suggestions this is a rebuilding year for the WC basketball program. "I don't look at this as a rebuilding year," Finnegan said. "I'd rather call it a replacing year. I'm optimistic about our chances this year. We're an enthusiastic team made up of people who have experienced winning."

Finnegan is also pleased with this year's freshmen recruits. "Our new recruits are learning quickly and have made a good effort in practice, but they're going to take time to be prepared for playing time this season. I put all new recruits in one of two categories–those who can step in and play right away and those who will help us down the road. We have some of both types on this team."

This year's new players will be needed to contribute in the front court immediately. Tim Liddy is a sophomore transfer who may crack Finnegan's starting lineup, while freshmen Philip Carr and Darren Vican should also play key roles in this team's success. Peter Basel, Tim Johnson and Bill Weber are all talented newcomers at the guard position, but they have difficulty getting playing time in an already solid backcourt. Bill Baldwin, Dan Dutton, Jerry Peden and Mike Swanson are other new additions who will give depth to this WC squad.

This team will be asked to continue the great play that has flourished at Washington College over the last few years. Finnegan believes that the program has received little credit for their impressive performance. "I tend to think our accomplishments over the last six years have been both overlooked and underplayed by the school and the local metropolitan media. No other team has been so strong over this long a period of time without any respect and acknowledgement."

The Sho'men of 1989-1990 will have to battle to gain respect this season as they face a difficult schedule, including two Division I schools and a couple of Division III powerhouses. Despite the team's lack of experience and their difficult schedule, Finnegan is confident the team will put together a good season. "There's a tradition that this team has to try to uphold. I think that as the season progresses, we will develop into a very good team." This development could result in yet another playoff berth and a date in the NCAA tournament for the Washington College men's basketball team.

Volleyball finishes brilliant season

by Amy R. Caddle

The Washington College women's volleyball team ended their strong season on a down note, losing their last match to Anne Arundel on November 8. The Sho'Women lost the first two games 15-10, 15-13, but they were able to come back in the third game and beat Anne Arundel 15-8. Anne Arundel then rallied for the win, capturing the final game by a score of 15-11.

Coach Penny Fall was disappointed about the loss and attributed it to the fact that the team had not played in a week and a half. Coach Fall also made changes in the lineup prior to the Anne Arundel match. "We played well, but not nearly as well as we have in the past," said Fall. Still, the women's volleyball coach is already looking forward to next season. "Next year is going to be a major rebuilding season. We have some excellent recruits, but it takes one or two years to learn volleyball at this level," Fall stated.

The Sho'Women have had a wonderful year on the volleyball court, ending their season with an impressive 24-14 record. The team also managed to capture the C-WAC Tournament, and three of the women received All-Conference honors. The women's volleyball team has good reason to be pleased with their performance this season. "The seniors met their goals, and the team played well as a unit. It was a pleasant, enjoyable season for everyone, and we are all positive about the team's final standing," said Fall.

Acclaimed writer to visit

by Stephanie Hess
Staff writer

Novelist and short story writer Richard Bausch is coming to WC on November 29 to read from his work and lead a workshop on short story writing. Bausch's visit is co-sponsored by the Writer's Union and the Douglass Wallop Room Fellowship Fund.

Senior Erin Murphy, who has been a fan of Bausch's for two years, arranged his visit to the College. She first discovered his work during the summer of 1987 while she was working as an intern at the New Virginia Review. Also that summer, she heard him give a reading, and was impressed with his work.

Murphy says that if she were to classify Bausch she would describe him as a "post-modernist writer." She says many of his stories deal with characters whose actions might be considered neurotic under normal circumstances. Through Bausch's development of these characters, however, the reader is able to identify with them.

While hearing him read his work, Murphy sensed Bausch is a writer who "is in tune with the process of writing," and who "would be helpful to student writers." After having her friends read his work, Murphy thought it would be interesting for Bausch to lead a workshop on writing here at WC.

A finalist for the 1988 PEN/Faulkner Award, Bausch is the author of four novels, including Real Presence, Take Me Back, The Last Good Time and most recently in May of 1989, Mr. Field's Daughter. He also has a collection of short stories entitled, Spirits and Other Stories and writes for the Atlantic Monthly.

About Bausch,critic Thomas Cahill says, "It is my deep, perverse suspicion that when I am an old man, in the second and third decades of the twenty-first century, all of Bausch- Spirits, his three novels, anything he may write- will be in print."

Bausch, will run an informal workshop with interested students prior to a reading of his work at 8PM on Wednesday, November 29 in the Sophie Kerr Room.

Brass Quartet to perform here

by Jennifer Del Nero

The American Brass Quintet, whose members were hailed by Newsweek as the "high priests of brass," will perform Monday night as the second presentation of this year"s Washington College-Concert Series.

Comprised of Robert Biddlecom (bass trombone), Michael Powell (tenor trombone), David Wakefield (horn) and Raymond Mase and Chris Gekker (trumpet), the American Brass Quintet is a recognized leader in the revival of classical brass.

In a Baltimore Sun review, the Quintet was touted as "probably this country's most distinguished ensemble of its kind now appearing before the public." Agreed the San Francisco Examiner 's concert critic, "Describe the ideal in brass playing and you're talking about the kind of sound and ensemble produced by the American Brass Quintet."

As it is established today, the American Brass Ensemble, performing chamber music from the Renaissance and Baroque periods in music history, was organized in 1960 by trombonists Arnold Fromme and Gilbert Cohen Fromme and debuted two years later in Carnegie Recital Hall.

Admitted The Daily Telegraph, "It is quite impossible to overpraise the playing of the Brass Quintet...they have everything...brilliance, attack, perfect ensemble and intonation, and a tone quality of unrivaled purity, range and power."

Not only have rave reviews of the Quintet been conceded by US critics, but by critics around the world. Wrote La Provencal, "This group is of very high caliber, especially regarding the technical mastery and musicality of each member," highlighting, "the exactness, the flexibility, the polish of the ensemble and the intelligence, sensitivity and refinement of the interpretations."

The Quintet, in addition to regularly touring throughout the US, performs around the world, including Europe where it performed in London, Paris, Amsterdam, Berne and Rome. In cooperation with the State Department, the ensemble also toured the Asia/Australia circuit through a cultural exchange program. After representing the US at the Zagreb Biennale Festival in Yugoslavia, the American Brass Quintet went on to participate in Iran's Festival of Shiraz, Italy's Spoleto Festival and both the Edinburgh and Casals Festivals.

In addition to performing its own edition of compositions from the Renaissance and Baroque periods, the American Brass Quintet has premiered over a hundred works, including scores by Henry Brandt, William Schuman and Virgil Thomson.

Praising the group,the New York Times described the concert as a "spectacular demonstration of ensemble virtuosity," and added, "the brilliance matched by the extraordinary sonics: crystal line definition, airy spaciousness, superb presence and an overall clarity that is positively breathtaking."

None of the original members still performs with the Quintet. In 1970, Fromme, father and nurturer of the Quintet, resigned in favor of a teaching career. Cohen departed from the ensemble in 1963, three years after its establishment, for the New York Philharmonic.

To date the Quintet has produced 25 records, the most recent completed in spring of 1980 in a combined effort with the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The music on the recording was performed on authentic period instruments from the collection of Dorothy and Robert Rosenbaum.

The American Brass Quintet will begin its performance promptly at 8PM Monday, November 10 in Tawes Theater. Students may use the tickets issued to them earlier in the semester by the Concert Series to gain free admission.

give yourself away. You should make a high stand, too. Wave the flag, invoke the Lord, just like the other side."

Senior David Johnson stated that he liked many of the slogans and was impressed by the spirit of the rally. "We (the Pro-Choice Movement) have the voice and the numbers. Hopefully the Anti-Choice people are not only outnumbered now, but outshouted."

Many fear that supporters of the movement will become complacent now that some victories are being attained. In light of this Johnson stressed the importance of making a stand now.

"I urge people to move to become politically involved about this issue at the local level and not vote for Anti-Choice...representatives. This is a basic issue of moral freedom and of choice."

He thought that Washington College was "really well represented. Here's an issue that actually warrants student involvement, not stupid, pissant things like 'attendance to convocation'. It's good that they are given something to really rally about."

Tapke stated, "I thought there was a pretty good turnout of Washington College students."

This man prays among the Pro-Life crosses in Washington. They were meant to signify the lost lives of aborted fetuses. It was a silent protest to the Pro-Choice rally across the street. (photo by David Johnson)

Dean Elizabeth Baer, Provost and Dean of the College, who also attended the rally, agreed student turnout was positive. "I was very pleased to see the strong student delegation and some faculty as well. I think it is very important for people who are Pro-Choice to...participate, despite the victories in recent elections," she said.

Baer was particularly struck by the diverse sampling of individuals. Signs designated, for example, Christians, Catholics , and Jews "for Choice", as well as democrats and republicans. Practically every belief system was present.

"It is very important for members of any group that feels their human rights are threatened to be supportive of each other's causes at this time."

Sophomore Cynthia Fields-Belanger interpreted this in a different way. "All the factions were there from one extreme to another. All these people were tagging on."

She also thought that as a college, "we were kind of weak. Once we got there we split up and became more individuals than a group." Fields-Belanger did admit that a good number of students went, given the fact that most had a lot of work to do.

Attendance and action was obviously a central theme for everyone who participated in the rally on Sunday. A flier distributed by WHAM! (Women's Health Action and Mobilization) stated, "Lobbying, voting and coming to Washington twice a year are not enough! You can and MUST do more. Take direction at Home, everyday, because the fight has just begun."

expulsion of that fraternity.

This recent attempt, at the Kappa Alpha house, was reported to Washington College Security at 2:20 a.m. by the County Dispatcher, after a message, which was left on Security's answering machine, procured no response.

The dispatcher said that there had been vandalism in the kitchen area of Middle Hall.

Residents in the building smelled smoke and immediately extinguished the fire before any damage was done.

According to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, the fire alarm system was working, but "The smoke never got to the point where it activated the smoke alarm."

Officers investigating the area found a detergent box that had been placed on a stove burner causing the box to ignite. Several containers were discovered laying on the floor and cleaning fluids had been sprayed on furnishings and laundry.

The Fire Marshall's Office is currently conducting an investigation in cooperation with college Security.

"This type of incident could easily have been a life threatening situation. We urge anyone with information to contact us," Roderick said.

Students living in Middle Hall were reluctant to comment about the possible arson.

Middle Hall Resident Assistant, Tony Caligiuri, stated that he hoped that "this is not taken as a black mark against fraternities being in a campus building. I just think that it's been a quiet year in the building."

Instructions for Self-Care of Common Colds

The symptoms of a cold at various stages may include any or all of the following: running or stopped up nose, headache, sneezing, watering of the eyes, sore throat, hoarseness, cough, fatigue, and generalized sick feeling with or without moderate sensation of warmth.

Colds are caused by VIRUSES and DO NOT respond to antibiotics such as penicillin which are effective against bacterial (not VIRAL) illnesses. Certain medications and measures are appropriate during different stages of the cold. They include:

Gargles for sore throat: Warm water with 1/2 teaspoon of salt per glass gargled every 2 - 3 hours. Throat lozenges may be substituted when gargling is inconvenient.

Antihistamines for runny nose & watering eyes: They may be used separately or in combination ("cold") tablets. (Coracidin and Coracidin D are available in the Health Service or from your R.A.) They may cause drowsiness and interfere with study and automobile driving. Nose drops or sprays need not be used if combination cold tablets are being taken.

Tylenol tablets: For muscle pain, headache, "feverish feeling" - 2 tablets every 4 hours.

General Measures: Attempt to rest more than usual. Get ample sleep. Avoid fatiguing activities. Eat sensibly. Do not continue reducing diets during your cold. Dress warmly. Avoid close contact with others and use common sense hygienic measures. Stop smoking. Increase fluid intake. Be optimistic. Most colds clear in less than 1 week.

Important Notice: The following are NOT considered part of a common cold: rash, fever over 100 degrees F. (usually causing shaking chills), chest pains and/or shortness of breath, large neck glands, earache, sharp pain in the sinus area, or having cold symptoms for an unduly long course of time. If any of these occur, or if any other symptoms develop that are different from those usually encountered during a common cold, request an appointment with a physician.

Philosophy fails President's funding test:

students attend conference at their own expense

by Sharon Bonner and Tracey Connell

College funding was recently denied to Washington College philosophy students who wanted to attend the 35th Annual Meeting for the Florida Philosophical Association, in Tallahassee, November 9-11.

One student, junior Cynthia Croot, was unable to go because of lack of funds.

Senior Barclay Green and junior Heather Donovan attended the conference, since they were able to fund the trip themselves. The two were accompanied by Dr. Ellen Klein, Assistant Visiting Professor of Philosophy and Religion at Washington College, who also presented a paper at the conference.

The conference was intended to give participants an opportunity to meet and discuss philosophical issues with well-known philosophers John Anton, R. M. Hare, Jaakko Hintikka, and others.

In addition, students were able to meet philosophers who have careers.

"When I study philosophy here I don't think of it as an active thing in the world today, so it gave me a lot of confidence to see so many people in the field....It really struck me. Being able to talk to these people and being able to clarify things," Donovan commented.

Added Green, "It was nice to go somewhere where people weren't asking, 'What are you going to do with a degree in philosophy?' I got to see people in the field doing things other than teaching. It helped me to see what's out there."

Several aspects of philosophy were addressed at this conference, such as Applied Ethics, Contemporary Philosophy, Ancient Philosophy, and Logic & Computers.

Dr. Klein presented a lecture on "Naturalized Epistemology: Lauden's Precarious Course." Other professional philosophers, graduate students, and undergraduate students presented papers as well.

In light of the advantages of attending such a conference, Green, Donovan, and Klein were disappointed that Croot was unable to attend.

Klein had submitted a letter to President Douglass Cater on October 24, requesting "$350.00 per student" and stating that she had chosen Croot and Green as the recipients of the money.

She wrote in the letter, "The advantages to Washington College, the Department of Philosophy and the individuals are obvious. The college and department will be represented by two outstanding undergraduate members, and the students will be given an opportunity to take an active part in an academic conference. In addition, the students will be able to mix formally and informally with other young philosophers."

Diocese refuses to print news release

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College may have fallen from grace with local Episcopal officials, as the Diocese of Easton recently refused to print a Washington College news release in their paper, The Eastern Shore Churchman. The release was to announce the visit of an infamous bishop, John Spong.

Reverend Bill Chilton of the Eastern Shore Diocese received a copy of the release "quite some time ago," according to Dr. Peter Tapke, Professor, Department of Philosophy and Religion.

Chilton contacted Tapke by phone November 28, only one week prior to the talk. Chilton told him that he had conferred with Bishop of Easton Sorge about printing the story in their newspaper. Sorge decided it would not "be in the best interests of the diocese to mention it because Spong is...controversial," said Tapke.

In Tapke's own estimation, Spong is an "outspoken champion of many liberal causes. I am told he is a charming person...and everyone says he is an exceptional speaker." Spong has also written several books.

Many local papers received and either printed or plan to print the release, making the diocese's decision to censure the information a mute point.

Said Tapke, "Needless to say the black out of news in this [paper] doesn't kill the meeting. It does raise some issues."

He conceded that the Churchman, essentially an organ of the diocese, is controlled by the bishop. "They have the right to print what they want, but does anyone in this day and age think they can squelch controversy? I think this supression is an example of silliness and futility."

Tapke claimed that Spong's talk, news of "legitimate interest," is being deliberately "blacked out."

"The whole thrust of religious development in the last thirty to forty years has been away from a paternalistic point of view. The whole movement of religion is to open the doors to a diversity of opinion. It's changing the whole complexion of Protestant Christianity. We live in an age of change, of questioning old dogmas and to attempt to stifle that by keeping a news item out of a paper is silly."

Spong will speak next Tuesday, December 5 in the Hynson Lounge at 7:30 PM. The subject of his talk, sponsored by Wash-

Library Grant axed

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

The National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) denied a challenge grant for the Miller Library last week. In conjunction with college funding, the Library would have received approximately three million dollars for improving its facilities.

William J. Tubbs, Librarian, stated that Washington College had stipulated funds for Miller Library in a challenge grant program.

"The parent organization supplies money so that we can tell NEH, 'We already have this amount, but we want to have this greater amount.'"

Tubbs proposed to allocate the money, if granted, for specific purposes such as buying and endowing more books and audio-visual equipment, improving the record collections and equipment, and improving the availability of primary source material.

Don't add rules—cure the honor code's impotence

The SGA is revamping the honor code. Apparently, the new and improved code will feature an addition to the academic section, which stipulates that if a student knowingly allows someone to cheat from him, or witnesses it and remains silent, it is a violation of the honor code. A new social section of the code is also in the works, which vaguely states that students are obligated to uphold the moral standards of Washington College.

This is all very well-intentioned, but let's face it: the honor code is essentially an impotent entity. If a student does not cheat, it's not because the honor code is stopping him. Likewise, a student who cheats won't be hindered by the code. Some people have the self-respect to uphold their values, and some don't. The honor code doesn't make the difference.

The penalties for violations of both sections of the code are appropriate: for the first infraction, the student fails the class in which he cheated; for the second, the student is suspended; the student is expelled for the third infraction.

When was the last time a student was found guilty of cheating even once, let alone two or three times? Cheating is a hard thing to prove—a discouraging fact. Why would any student want to report a case of cheating when the chances are slim to none that the cheater will be found guilty? The results are ironic: the student accused of cheating comes out smelling nauseatingly sweet, and the accuser is labeled a tattle.

This being the case, the new rule in the honor code is an insult to honest students, a threat which has not even a modicum of assurance to back it up which would make it worth the trouble to report a cheating student.

Instead of adding more rules to the honor code, perhaps the SGA should consider drafting a procedure for students to report cheaters at the time the cheating occurs (in an exam, for instance), so that the professor could also witness the act. Such a procedure would help to eliminate the one-student's-word-against-the-other dilemma which is so often a problem in reported cases of cheating.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

The environment: practice what you preach

To the Editor:

After reading Carolin Leibig's article in the November 17 issue, I guess it is safe to assume that she backpacked her way home for Thanksgiving break in fear that the car, plane, or train she could have taken would release carbon dioxide fumes into the ozone layer. Seriously though, the environmental crisis that is upon us now is probably the most pressing issue the human race has ever faced. However, I think that each and every one of us is well aware of what the only solution to the problem is, but we just won't accept it . . . yet.

I don't know about anybody else, but I think that those styrofoam trays are quite handy when you don't feel like eating in the dining hall and want to bring dinner back to your room. I LIKE being able to hop in the car and go for a drive when I want to. When I say car I mean the average mid-size sedan that has a V-6 engine and holds fourteen gallons of gas; NOT a car that is the size of a sardine can with three cylinders that you have to floor just top get it up to 50 MPH. I LIKE being able to put 1/4 cup of ERA detergent in the washing machine and not having to bring my clothes down to the river and slapping them over the rocks to get them clean. I LOVE the New Jersey Turnpike, which is 10 lanes wide in some places, instead of getting stuck in a traffic jam that is twenty miles long on some country road waiting for the traffic light to turn green. And, of course, I think most people like an occasional Twinkee, or something to that effect.

I like all of these things and don't want to give them up, but I know I will have to sooner or later . . . let's just hope it is soon. The fact that Ms. Leibig feels that leather is a necessary item leads me to believe that she doesn't want to give up many of the things she takes for granted either.

So, my message to Ms. Leibig is:

1. We KNOW what the problem is and how to solve it.
2. Practice what you preach before you cram it down my throat. The fact that you are preaching in the first place is illogical considering your faith in the rest of us is so frail.

Maintenance responds to article

To the Editor:

Dear Mr. Lankford: When was the last time you were hit by a drag racing maintenance worker? What's wrong? Couldn't you think of anything else to write about?

I have nothing against you, or anyone else at Washington College for that matter.

In fact I have a pretty decent rapport with most everyone there. But when someone just feels like taking a Cheap shot at my coworkers and myself for no reason well that just ruffles my feathers.

Just about every time I pick up a copy of the "elm" there's something in there about the staff or faculty. "W.C. staff/faculty could or should do things better from a lot of students stand points. All I can say to you is that if you can do a better job, W.C. is looking for a new President. We at maintenance pride ourselves on being prompt and efficient so things will be comfortable for everyone. If you have a problem with a certain employee take to him/her don't nail all of us to the cross.

R.E.M. writer responds

To the Editor:

In response to Miriam Dittman's complaint about my R.E.M. article, which was printed about six weeks ago, I would like to state that I have enjoyed all of Miss Dittman's articles in The Elm. Oh, wait a minute, there haven't been any. I apologize to anyone on campus who was offended by the word "crap." I didn't realize that The Elm's articles should be printed for a sheltered reading audience. As for my grammar and usage in the article, my grammar and usage are to the point and correct. The article was not written as late-breaking news, rather it was written for a certain population at Washington College who might have an interest in R.E.M.

Sincerely,

OPINION

ISSUE: President Bush has vetoed several bills proposing federal aid for abortions in the US and abroad. Should abortion be a political issue? Why or why not?

Politicians aren't listening to the voices of the people

Cecile Gutscher & Jenny Albers

Laws have entered the most intimate areas of our lives —our bedrooms. So it makes sense that abortion has become a political issue. Politics protect our rights as free individuals. If we believe abortion to be a woman's right, than we must make it a political issue in order to protect it.

Last week, hundreds of thousands of people took their politics to the streets in nation-wide demonstrations to keep abortion safe and legal. They did so because in recent months, the usual channels for articulating the public will— using elected officials as their mouthpiece— had failed. The sudden and overwhelming mobilization is a reaction against a government that is failing miserably to protect a human right; in fact, that it seeks to do away with it.

How has our government failed us?

Though the Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services ruling last July, which is slowly eroding abortion rights, took place under the Bush Administration, it was only the culmination of a process begun long before.

Now states have the authority to limit abortion. The federal government has passed the buck, so to speak, because it must not have felt abortion laws to be important enough to protect it as the inviolable right it is.

What we are presently witnessing in Pennsylvania is a direct outgrowth of this obvious disdain for abortion rights. The Abortion Control Act of 1989, passed by the Pennsylvania House of Representatives last week, called for the most stringent laws in the nation since 1973. They include: 1) Notification of husband's consent; 2) Women must be informed by physicians of fetal development and alternatives to abortion.

"Notification" seems harmless enough, though it still infringes on a woman's choice to have an abortion as well as putting unnecessary stress on relationships where the husband disagrees. Notification soon leads to consent. How would this "notification" be verified? Would a husband perhaps have to sign a form stating that he has been notified? And if he disagrees, could he simply refuse to sign this form? A woman would then not be granted an abortion and carries a baby to term for another person, her husband; she thus becomes an incubator.

"Being informed of fetal development," on the other hand, is nothing more than a code for explicit, off-putting and distorted information imposed on a woman at a vulnerable moment. It is blatant intimidation.

What is most indignating about these laws is the fact that most Pennsylvania polls indicated that residents who felt that abortion is a private issue to be decided by a woman and her doctor outnumbered those who did not by a 2 to 1 margin. Such stringent laws, then, reflect only the particular view of legislators, not their constituents.

Shouldn't laws reflect the popular will?

In this case, they clearly do not. George Bush carried this one step further, by trying to impose his own morality onto not only the District of Columbia, but the rest of the nation as well. Last month he vetoed a bill to permit Medicaid to pay for abortions of the victims of rape or incest, though he has said he supports abortion in such cases. He must just be against the government funding them for the poor. Maybe he is trying to tell poor women to "just say no" to rape and incest!

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

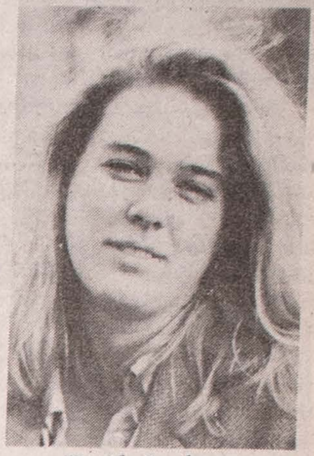
By making abortion a political issue, the human factor is forgotten. Federal funding for abortions leaves too many questions unanswered such as will the money really help those in need of an abortion.

Cynthia Croot
Junior
Crownsville, MD

If we are to make federal laws (either for or against abortion) the only avenue is through political process. Although I may not agree with the outcome of the government's (and the country's) decisions, I live in a system where it is the majority which counts, not personal choice.



Heath Cooley

Waynesboro, VA

Residing in an atmosphere of fear, created by the dictations of society's perceptions of wrong & right, women are placed in the position of choosing abortion or not. Because of this, federal funding becomes a necessity. And abortion naturally becomes a political issue.

Alex MacLennan

Yes. Not because either side is necessarily right or wrong but because so many people have such strong emotions and beliefs concerning it, and those beliefs need to be represented in America's leaders.

No, it should not. Individuals should be able to make their own decision in a democratic society.

It seems to me that it is inevitable, and as the great Pharoh Benjamin T. Hinkle once said, "Boy, you're gonna drive me to drinking if you don't stop drivin' that hot rod Lincoln."

Politicians don't have the right to make their morals the law

Kyndra Ponder

President Bush vetoed a bill that would provide abortions to victims of rape and incest in Washington. In addition, Bush shot down a package which would provide much needed aid to foreign nations, including Poland and Hungary. He vetoed the package because it would help fund the establishment of Planned Parenthood clinics in China— which happens to be in favor of abortion.

When I found out about this my admittedly conservative mouth was about to shout "Hooray! It's about time someone in government got some morals!"

I have been a very dedicated ultra-pro-lifer. Like most other pro-lifers, I feel that a fetus - no matter how small - IS life and that consequently, abortion IS murder and VERY wrong!

I also feel that there are some extenuating circumstances— such as rape, incest or endangerment of the mother's life— where abortion should be legal. Unfortunately, few abortions performed today are for any of those purposes.

I definitely feel that abortion should not be used as birth control when condoms and other forms of birth control are so widely available!

There are couples who want to have a baby but can't. They anguish while women who got pregnant and aren't ready to accept the responsibility take the easy way out and kill their unborn baby.

Despite my moral views regarding abortion, politically, I MUST be pro-choice. I have realized that I have no right to force my morality on anyone else.

We have the technology to abort pregnancies. Even if abortion were outlawed, that technology would still exist— and women would still have abortions. At least it is safe now and women aren't dying because they aren't ready to be a mother. Plus, I would rather see a baby aborted than to see it abused or neglected later in its life.

While I still think abortion is horrible and morally wrong, I don't think it is my place— or the president's place to force others to live according to one set of values.

That is why when I heard about the recent vetoes of abortion packages I really screamed— when Bush was inaugurated, he took an oath "to uphold and defend the Constitution," not "to uphold and defend the Constitution AND enforce the moral values I believe in."

I do think that pro-lifers and pro-choicers can agree on a middle ground, I just think that they're too busy screaming at each other to really listen to what the other is saying. Maybe we could put down all those picket signs and symbolic crosses and spend some of the money each side uses to yell at the other side on education.

While the country has been busy yelling at each other about "morality," the problems leading to abortions have increased. Let's stop trying to fluff our egos because we think we are right and get to work helping the people who SO DESPERATELY need it!

News from around the world: Soviets grant economic autonomy to Baltic States

UNITED STATES:

Two of the topics on President Bush's agenda for the Malta summit with Mikhail Gorbachev will be arms control and the suspected arming of Salvadoran rebels by the Soviet Union.

Although the president has announced he will not make any deals with the Soviets on arms control at this summit, he is expected to discuss with the Soviet leader how changes taking place in Eastern Europe might effect cuts in conventional forces.

Bush is also expected to protest Soviet involvement in Latin America, in particular El Salvador. According to Press Secretary Marvin Fitzwater, the Soviet Union has been supplying arms to the Salvadoran rebels, including Soviet-made SA-7 missiles.

On Monday, doctors in Chicago removed part of Teresa Smith's liver and transplanted it into the body of her daughter, Alyssa. The procedure, if successful, could offer new hope to patients, especially small children, waiting for organ transplants. It also raises ethical questions about when a family member could refuse to donate organs or tissues to another family member. The liver has an unusual power to be able to regenerate itself. Doctors are predicting that within a year, Teresa Smith's liver will be whole again.

L. Douglas Wilder was certified as the winner in Virginia's gubernatorial election on Monday. Wilder, a democrat, defeated his republican opponent, J. Marshall Coleman, by 6854 votes. Coleman has announced he will ask for a recount. Since Wilder defeated Coleman by a margin of only 38%, the closest race in Virginia history, the state will pay for the recount which could cost between $300,000 and $500,000. The new governor will assume office on January 13.

SOVIET UNION:

Effective January 1, 1990, the Soviet Baltic republics of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania will have economic autonomy from the Soviet Union. The measure was passed by the Soviet legislature by a wide margin and will free the three republics from Moscow's central economic planning and decisions. This autonomy measure is a result of the grass-roots political movements in the three republics, and was praised by Soviet leader Gorbachev. The measure means the republics will now have greater control of finance and banking, as well as factories and other state enterprises, but the Soviets will still remain in control of the armed forces stationed within the republics, and oil and natural gas pipelines.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA:

At noon on Monday, millions of Czechoslovakian workers walked out of factories and businesses to join in a massive strike. The strike was organized by the newly formed opposition party, the Civic Forum.

The Civic Forum was formed in response to police brutality against a group of non-violent protesters.

The Forum announced Monday night it was calling off any further strikes while it negotiated with Czechoslovakian Premier Ladislav Adamec. The results of the meeting were cheering. Adamec agreed to appoint a coalition government by Sunday and to begin writing a new constitution that will legalize two party rule. The new constitution will also abolish the education system which is based on Marxist and Leninist ideology.

COLOMBIA:

On Monday, a Colombian jetliner carrying 107 passengers from Bogota to Cali crashed shortly after taking off from Bogota. An anonymous phone call to Radio Caracol claimed a group called the Extraditables were responsible. The caller claimed the jet was bombed to prevent five alleged police informants from testifying. The five had apparently given police information that led to the discovery of the hideout of the head of the Medallin drug cartel.

WEST GERMANY:

On Tuesday, in the West German parliament Chancellor Helmut Kohl announced a long-term plan for reunification. Kohl unveiled his plan before the Bush-Gorbachev summit off Malta began. Kohl's plan is in three parts, and does not set a definite timetable for reunification. The first step would be joint committees on the economy, the political situation, and many other subjects. Kohl's suggestion met with applause from other members of the parliament, although some West Germans have expressed reluctance about reunification.

Date rape: the silent rape

by Katherine E. Absher
Staff writer

"A recent national survey found that one in every six college women is a victim of rape or attempted rape each year," according to US News and World Report.

Ninety percent of all cases are not reported to the police, making this statistic a gaping underestimation of rapes occurring on college campuses. Because the victim knows the assailant in one-third of all rapes, she does not usually report being sexually assaulted.

When the woman is acquainted with the rapist, the rape is defined as date rape, social rape, or silent rape. Silent rape is an appropriate term for victims of date rape because they refrain from reporting it—some women do not recognize that their body has been infringed upon. Therefore, bewildered and ashamed, they remain silent. A woman beaten and violated in a dark alley by a stranger is not the only form of rape; a male who disregards his female friend's "no" also commits rape. It is rape when a woman is forced, intimidated, or coerced to relinquish control of her body while another person defiles and abuses it.

One senior tells how she was date raped during her sophomore year: "I was living with my boyfriend. It was at a time when I was very busy. He was very jealous of the time I was spending away from him. He said I owed it to him. It was a really tragic time in my life, and it is very blurry. But I clearly remember coming in and feeling tired, and he would not let me sleep, but he said, 'I want to attack you'—not 'do you want to make love?'-but 'I want to attack you.' It got to the point where it was easier to detach my brain from my body and let it happen because I didn't have the physical strength, the emotional strength to stop it."

Eventually, the friends of the victim saw bruises on their friend's arms and urged her to leave her boyfriend, but she could not see what was happening to her. Finally, she left him: "I don't really think he knows what he did to me. The really scary thing is that I know in relationships after mine that the same thing has happened and the violence has gotten worse." Her boyfriend mentally and physically abused her for an extended period of time.

Now, she is in "a very loving and caring relationship, but sometimes I have to pull back. I will definitely say I'm emotionally scarred." She also reveals she has spoken with other female students on this campus that have been raped, usually due to the woman drinking and subsequently being taken advantage of.

Beth Roemer, Resident Assistant programming director, says, "There is a need to raise the consciousness concerning date rape here. I think a lot of times people aren't sure what date rape is. They are not aware of what made them feel uncomfortable. Television portrays it as a very overt act, but sometimes it is a very covert act. It can be violent through coercion as well as just physically."

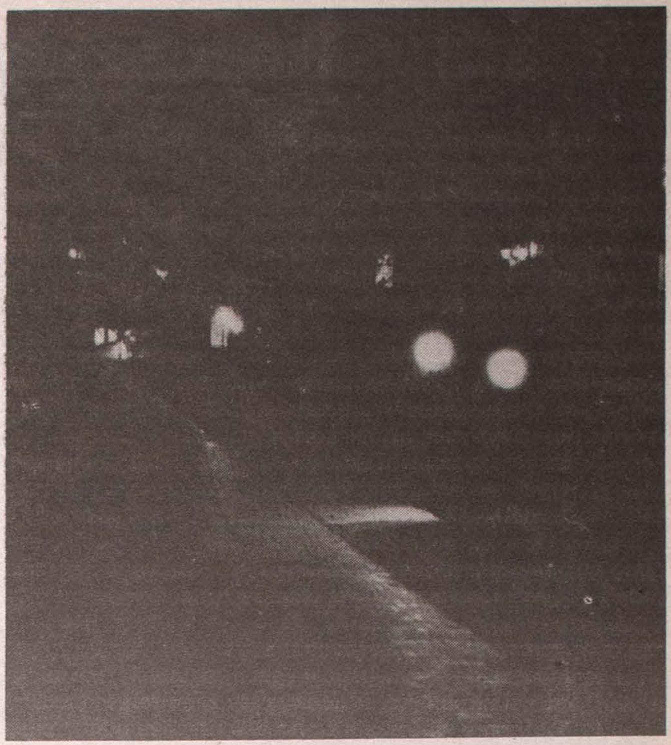
A woman's misunderstanding of her rape is due in part to society's sex role stereotypes. On television women are portrayed as submissive, weak, saying no to sex when they really mean yes. Men in the media vanquish women with their forceful embraces and then carry them up the staircase to the bedroom. In real life, however, men have to comprehend a woman's "no" means NO.

Often date rape occurs when a man and a woman are not communicating with each other about their sexual desires. The woman may wear a revealing dress or give off bodily signals contrary to her true intentions. The man misreads these signals, forces her to have sexual relations with him, and may never understand that he committed an act of rape.

"Date rapists are more sexually active than other males and more likely to have a history of antisocial behavior. Women—alone, in a new environment, suffer from low self-esteem and are not very good at asserting themselves," reports Time magazine on campus rape. Other characteristics of date rapists are displays of anger or aggression, viewing women as adversaries, subscribing excessively to traditional male and female stereotypes, attempting to make the woman feel guilty or accusing the woman of being tense. "Many date rapists are repeat offenders and are skilled at identifying weaknesses in potential victims. The rapist is looking for a woman he can control, since his primary motivation is power rather than sex," explains Carol Pritchard in Avoiding Rape on and Off the Campus. In a large percentage of date rape cases, the victim is often a virgin. A virgin is naive about male and female sexual relations, and is confused about what is happening to her.

Many times a woman is intoxicated; "It's much harder for you to be in control of the situation if you're under the influence of these substances. Be aware of how much your date drinks, too," counsels the pamphlet What Women and Men Should Know About Date Rape.

One of the preventions of date rape is to always be alert—alcohol dulls the ability to be alert. Psychology Today found, "When a man initiated a date, drove to and from the date, sexual aggression was more likely. They also found that if both people got drunk (at a party, for example) and parked or found themselves in the male's dorm room or apartment, then the date was more likely to end with the woman being forced to perform against her wishes." Some men think it is permissible to rape a woman who is inebriated but Roemer argues, "When you are high, it still does count as rape." Although a woman takes many precautions, she is still vulnerable. Roemer says, "Anything a girl can do for prevention is recommended. But you can do all these things and still be a victim."



Are female students jeopardizing themselves walking home alone?

After this experience, a woman may feel depressed, embarrassed, and guilty. The rapist "stole a part of you," states Roemer. The woman usually loses trust in people and belief in her own perceptions. Date rapes happen usually after the third or fourth date. By then the woman trusts her companion. When she is raped, she finds she misjudged the character of the man who raped her. Roemer elaborates, "They went out with someone they thought they knew. They built a relationship and then that trust was violated."

Rape victims may experience physical side effects such as nightmares, sleeplessness, headaches or nausea, but mostly their trauma is mental. Their self-image is destroyed. "They must learn to reempower themselves, learn to be more assertive," says Roemer.

The Margaret Horsely Society is helping women on this campus learn to be more assertive. The Society concerns itself with the presentation of women's issues to the campus. Its leaders, Senior Jennifer Harrison and Junior Tracey Connell, feel rape and the prevention of it is one of the tragic issues confronting women, especially women on college campuses. Connell states, "I think rape is real. It is not a phantom issue. It does happen. And despite what people think, rapes have happened on this campus." The humiliating reality of rape frightens Connell, prompting the Society to offer a self-defense class next semester.

It also frightens the long list of female students signing up for the class. Sophomore Katie Simms explains why she is interested in the defense class: "We were just watching a two part series of a girl in college being raped. Then we heard about the rapist in Chestertown, and we used to go jogging alone, and we decided to sign up." The television movie Simms and her friends were watching made her more aware of date rape: "How many times have we gone in a room and thought it was all right, and how easily it could happen."

Sophomore Jacqui Bell is taking the class because "I'm an RA and because I'm on a coed floor. A lot of times I'll have to deal with guys that have been drinking. I don't think it will come to that, but it would be nice to know." Because she has never been confronted with a rape situation, Bell is not fearful of rape, but realizes her attitude would change if something did happen to her. But she thinks that "the main problem is the amount of

Swimmers open regular season with two victories

by Greg Coss

This year the Washington College women's swim team looks very promising, thanks to two early wins in dual meets. The first meet was a convincing victory over Salisbury State on November 15, then they took a tough victory over the College of Notre Dame. Notre Dame was a tough opponent, and the score was nearly deadlocked after the first half of the meet. WC still managed to pull away in the second half and earn the victory. The team was led by Kasey Carroll, who nearly qualified for the NCAA Swim Championships in the 1650 meter freestyle. Other key members include Vicky Carroll, who excels at the butterfly, and Leslie Newcombe, a breast stroke specialist. Vicky Vahos is expected to replace Jen Korten as the top backstroker for WC.

In addition to the returning members of the team, some new talent is expected to play a big role in the team's success. Freshman Amy Capone is a key member of the team, since she can swim almost all strokes competitively and can be placed in relays in many positions. Bridget Fer-Ferris should compete with Vahos for the top backstroke spot. Liza Cohen and Monica Wilen are other members of a team loaded with talent and depth.

Dennis Berry and Kim Lessard return to help glue WC's talented pieces together. Berry is the motivator on the team, pushing the swimmers to give their best. He is also one to help the women with problems away from swimming. Lessard excels at detecting problems in swim styles to shave seconds off swimmer's times. These two people, masterminding a talented group of swimmers, have led the team to a 2-0 start and dreams of sending WC to the NCAA's this February.

WC's road to prominence continues, starting with a meet against Widener. They return home this Friday against Marymount, a team they are expected to beat. The following week pits them against Elizabethtown, who are tough on the road. Still, a 4-0 start could give WC the confidence it needs to win the meet.

This is a team loaded with talent and shouldn't be missed. WC takes on Marymount tonight at 7 in the Casey Swim Center.

WC wins tourney, home opener

by Matt Giller

Coach Tom Finnegan felt this year's team would have to depend on senior leadership and mistake-free basketball to be as successful as the squad that made it to the NCAA tournament. So far that's only half true.

Seniors Tim Keehan, Chris Brandt, Charles Duckett, Charles Johnson and Chris Jamke are the only returnees from last year's team. In the first three games they displayed enthusiasm, guile and savoir faire that spread to the youth movement (a.k.a. the bench) and starting sophomore pivot man Tim Liddy.

The Shoremen also showed that they don't have to play forty minutes of perfect basketball to win. They proved they can fall behind extremely worthy opponents and show enough guts to come back with second half surges and pull out a win.

Their first stop of the season was up at the Muhlenberg Tournament, where they faced an always feisty Moravian squad in the first round. It was nip and tuck for most of the way until the middle of the second half, when the Shoremen started to increase their lead. WC then proceeded to blow them out in the waning minutes, winning 82-68.

The final game was against the mighty mules of Muhlenberg, and the tournament hosts were up by eight late in the first half. The lead was quickly cut to one, thanks to three three-pointers by our resident long-range bomber, Charles Johnson. The Shoremen once again saved their offensive onslaught for the second half, winning 83-73. Tim Keehan ended the two games with a total of 45 points and was named tournament MVP, while at the other guard position Chris "Squirrel" Brandt was added to the tournament team with 48 points.

In the first two games the Shoremen rallied late in the game from a subpar first half, and the home opener against Frostburg State was no different. Before the game, the team felt they were going to have to play better to win, but before you could say "look at those pretty Frostburg warm up shirts", Frostburg was up by nine. WC rallied to within one late in the first half, but a Frostburg three pointer at the buzzer spread the lead to four.

The Shoremen came out with determination in the second half, remembering their most recent second half finishes. Unfortunately the second half began much like the first. Keehan was still cold from the floor, Frostburg big men were outrebounding Liddy and Jamke, and every loose ball bounced Frostburg's way.

All hope was not lost, as the Squirrel brought the team to life. He used his quickness to break a double team, then scored off a move children should only try when accompanied by an adult. His enthusiasm spread throughout the team, and no matter what combination Frostburg threw at WC the Shoremen momentum was not to be stopped. Some clutch foul shooting near the end enabled WC to lock up a win by the score of 83-76.

The Shoremen return for their second home game of the season this Saturday against Widener University. WC has always played extremely well at home, and their success appears to be continuing this season. The Wild Goose Classic takes place the following weekend at Cain Gymnasium.

Hockey honored

by Jennifer Stickney

Washington College field hockey players Carole Reece and Donna White were selected to play in the United States Field Hockey Association National Tournament, held November 22-26 at Catawba College. The two will represent the Southeastern Field Hockey Association. Selections for this tournament were made at the Southeastern Field Hockey Association Tournament, where Reece and White were on MWCFHA Team 1. The two played on the only MWCFHA team to ever make the finals of the Southeastern Tournament.

Congratulations also go out to the WC tandem of Reece and Jenifer Blenckstone. Reece was selected as a First Team Regional All-American, while Blenckstone was named to the Second Team. This honor makes them both eligible for selection to the National All-American teams.

Cousineau brings Krapp to campus

by Jennifer Del Nero

Making its American premiere Wednesday at WC is Krapp's Last Tape, written and directed by Samuel Beckett, performed by French actor Pierre Chabert and sponsored by both the French Ministry of Culture and the WC Lecture Series Committee.

Says Coordinator of Special Events Marshall Williams, "It's amazing that a production Samuel Beckett directed is to perform here at Washington College," adding that the performance is largely a result of Professor Tom Cousineau's friendship with Chabert.

Krapp's Last Tape, the tale of a man obsessed with reenacting memories of his life by replaying tapes recorded in the past and then in his present life, recording new tapes varying his memories, is one of Beckett's most famous short plays, renowned in the world of contemporary literature.

Beckett's play mirrors the same theme dominating his other great theatrical and literary works including Waiting for Godot and Endgame where repetition and variation are employed as metaphors for the question of human existence.

As an autobiographical sketch of Beckett's life, the play includes an episode set in Dublin, 1946, in which Beckett experienced a vision he claims marks the beginning of his creative life.

This production of Krapp's Last Tape, and more specifically, the collaboration of Beckett and Chabert, has been acclaimed not only by French critics, but hailed at theater festivals in Germany, Jerusalem and Madrid.

That Beckett directed the play makes the production unique. In fact, Beckett has spent the past decade directing many of his own plays in order to show how he feels his works should be interpreted.

Chabert, one of France's leading actors, has worked closely with Beckett for over twenty years. Much of his theater work has been devoted to Beckett's plays; Chabert has worked as an actor and director in Company, Catastrophe, Ohio Impromptu, Berceuse and What Where.

Cousineau originallysaw Krapp's Last Tape when Beckett first directed it in Paris in 1976. He remembers, "It was one of the most powerful theatrical experiences I've ever had." Since his initial encounter with the production, Cousineau has been interested in bringing Chabert to Chestertown.

Presently, Chabert is nearing completion of a book describing his collaborations with Beckett.

Krapp's Last Tape, a brief play with a running time of about a half hour, is spoken in French, but for audience members not speaking the language, a synopsis will be included in the program.

Also, on December 5 at 4 PM in the Literary House, there will be a reading of Krapp's Last Tape in English for people interested in hearing the play in English before seeing it performed in French on Wednesday night.

Even though the play is performed in a foreign language, Cousineau explains that there are "strong visual and musical images" employed that will "grasp you even if you don't understand the language."

Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape will commence at 8 PM December 6, in Norman James Theater.

The Last Temptation of Christ: brave and controversial

by Timothy J. Madison

The furor accompanying the release of Martin Scorsese's Last Temptation of Christ has, in retrospect, little to do with the actual content of the film and even less to do with respectable theology. Unfortunately, due to the nature of the film's subject matter, it becomes difficult to examine the merits of Last Temptation as a film without addressing its role as a "religious work." Suffice it to say that Last Temptation of Christ is neither impious nor irreverent in its interpretation of the Gospels. The film is an adaptation of Nikos Kazantzakis's novel—a provocative but not irreligious interpretation of Christ's Passion. Both Scorsese and Kazantzakis wrestle with the troubling dichotomy between Christ's humanity and divinity, the dual substance of Christ. It is this humanization of Christ and depiction of his weaknesses and desires which originally inflamed the tempers of high-profile pressure groups.

The Last Temptation of Christ is a brave, brutal and introspective retelling of the Gospels. Willem Dafoe portrays a very passionate Christ with human and superhuman motivations—his performance is a far cry from the pallid and ineffectual interpretations of Christ in "biblical epics." Scorsese in his direction succeeds in drawing universal and not necessarily Christian themes out of Christ's struggle without attacking Christ's divinity as proposed by the Gospels.

Unfortunately much of the casting calls attention to itself and seems oddly idiosyncratic. Harvey Keitel seems a strange choice for the crucial role of Judas with his hard New York vowels. While Barbara Hershey is effective in the role of Mary Magdalene, there seems to be no way to explain the casting of Harry Dean Stanton as Peter. One of the oddest bits is David Bowie's cameo as Pontius Pilate; with Sting being his first choice as Pilate, one has to wonder what strange point Scorsese is trying to make with his casting.

The Last Temptation of Christ is lushly photographed and beautifully scored by Peter Gabriel, but at times, like the casting, both the cinematography and the soundtrack seem a tad too lush and draw unwanted attention to themselves. However it is hard to fault such a brave and intelligent movie on these points alone. What is fascinating about The Last Temptation of Christ is Scorsese's ability to rediscover the allegory originally implicit in the Gospels and expand on it to make it take on a relevance to those who are without any particular interest in Christian myth.

alcohol drunk on campus; I think a lot of people get too drunk to push someone away."

What You Should Know About Rape suggests women should learn self-defense: "The best-prepared person (in a rape situation) is the one who has thought about and rehearsed many different strategies. Indeed, she is less likely to be attacked because of her attitude in the street and about herself." Self-defense encourages women to be more confident; rapists prey on weak and fearful women.

But, warns Gerald Roderick, Security Director, "you also have to realize your limitations. You're not going to be able to knock down a three-hundred pound guy with a blow to the stomach." Roderick recommends using "good common sense" before entering dangerous situations. Roderick further comments, "I tend to think that people get caught up in a false sense of security because it is a small campus."

Contrary to popular belief, date rape does occur at Washington College. The book, Sexual Assault on Campus: What Colleges Should Do, recommends colleges should revise "codes of student conduct to specifically prohibit rape and other sexual assaults, develop "an official written school policy condemning sexual assault," implement "educational programs on sexual assault" and establish "an effective program to assist the victim of sexual assault. With the implementation of these steps, some rapes could be prevented. But says Avoiding Rape On and Off Campus "for rapes to stop, men have to stop raping. Men must apply pressure on their peers to treat women with respect and as equals. Women must realize that they do contribute to making themselves vulnerable to dangerous situations, although they are never responsible for their rapes. Women must understand that they can lessen their vulnerability by being aware of their surroundings and by being assertive." The silent rape has to be heard, brought out into the open.

The request received no formal written acknowledgement.

Klein finally contacted Provost and Dean Elizabeth Baer, who reported to her that if funds were found they would come from the president's "discretionary fund." According to Klein, Baer stated that money from the fund is granted at the discretion of the president and that he is required to have "good reasons" for denying a request, but he is not required to disclose them.

Days before the conference Klein was informed that her request had been denied. She was also discouraged from asking other sources, particularly the Student Government Association, as so few students were involved, she said.

One concern of the Dean, according to Klein, was that if funds were allocated to the philosophy department, then "we'd have to give to everyone else."

Green was able to come up with the money himself. Croot was not, and so was not able to go. Klein then chose Donovan as an alternate for the trip, which Donovan also paid for on her own.

Said Green, "I would like to know why there was no money whatsoever for sending a good student to something that would have been a wonderful learning experience."

He qualified the statement by citing lack of communication.

"I wish the administration would make more of an effort to justify the ways in which money is being spent. Students are complaining about what seems to be strange priorities, but I can't really decide if it's justified or not. I would like to know what goes on so that I can make a decision about that."

Croot stated, "There are some things about funding that are none of my business. I understand that there are a lot of practical considerations and I feel it's unjust to criticize, but a lot of it comes down to communication. If we students are truly supposed to be the beneficiaries of this system then we should have some access to information about what's going on."

She added, "I hope the perceived needs are being met."

Baer explained that money was not provided for the trip because "we simply didn't have the money, not because we didn't think it was a good idea."

She stressed that the administration always supports student-faculty collaborations on academic matters. "We do want to make sure that more of those opportunities become available."

Part of the problem may also be the plethora of requests received by Dean Baer and President Cater. "I wish we could've supported it but I didn't want to give the appearance of favoritism."

Croot considers herself a "serious student of philosophy" and wanted to attend the conference to "see how real-life philosophy works" in order to apply the information to her own career choices. She was therefore disappointed when the fund request was denied, but not surprised.

Said Croot, "Money is something that I've always had to deal with as an issue. It's indicative of the way society works. I think it's a shame that a learning institution falls prey to that."

Klein is currently planning to attend another conference with students in the Fall, because, she said, this one was so successful.

Look for the administration's response to questions of funding and allocation in part two of this article, next week in Issue 13.

Endowment involves "putting money in the bank and using the interest."

Tubbs stressed that the Miller Library facilities are more than adequate but that he wanted the NEH grant to "enrich what we already have. It's not that the College administration isn't doing its job. We're just trying to do more." While the College has already allocated funds for renovations in Miller Library, the NEH grant would have supplemented those funds.

Tubbs was officially notified of the denial almost one week ago and unofficially "a few days before that." He has no current plans to search out funding from other sources.

Said Tubbs, "We'll get the comments of the NEH review board in December. Then we'll be able to see exactly how far away we were from being funded. If we were fairly close we may rework our proposal and reapply next year."

Coleman retires

William A. Coleman, Supervisor of Buildings and Grounds, has announced his intention to retire from his Washington College post. A search committee is being established to select his predecessor.

Coleman was employed at Washington College for 32 years.

He served under four college presidents. He witnessed the growth of the college in the mid-sixties and over the past five years.

Asked what advice he would give his successor, Coleman replied: "Think as a young person. You've got to understand the student's perspective."

Smart tips to help keep pounds off during this season of plenty:

- Before going to a party, eat a light snack (such as fresh fruit). This will help keep you from pigging out later.
- Choose crudites (raw vegetables), fruit, shrimp, or small pieces of hard cheese for hors d'oeuvres.
- Choose small portions of your favorite fattening foods. Eat slowly and enjoy every bite.
- No need to indulge in all of the goodies at one time. Many of the same foods will be offered again at other holiday celebrations.
- Plan holiday activities around things other than food and drink - such as skating, skiing, caroling, and tree trimming.
- Don't plan on losing weight during the holidays. Instead, aim to start the new year at the same weight you were in November.

Administrators answer funding questions

SEX! "Sex inside marriage is not always holy. Sex outside marriage is not always not holy." This was the cry with which Bishop Spong began his lecture on Tuesday night. Hynson Lounge was filled to its capacity with eager as well as hesitant listeners who ranged from students to Board members to townspeople.

Members of the administration and faculty recently addressed issues of funding, as philosophy students paid their own way to an academic conference when money was denied from the President's Discretionary Fund. At the same time Student Government President, Steven Attias, and Secretary, Kevin Kelly were given the means to attend a leadership seminar in Orlando, Florida, the National Conference on Student Services.

President Cater described the two primary uses of this monetary resource, which the president started and he, his brother, friends and other concerned parties replenish.

The first, larger "pocket" has been set up as the Faculty Enhancement Fund. Money from this allows professors, for example, to attend "summer sabbaticals that enrich their value as teachers and professors at Washington College...Well over a majority of the faculty has benefited."

The second "pocket" is to service other projects which may or may not be specifically student related.

Cater stated that he and Provost and Dean Elizabeth Baer review proposals for money twice a year having given the faculty ample notice to apply. "It's timely, so that the faculty member knows that he or she can count on" the support.

The president stressed that the fund is not endowed. (Endowment involves using only the interest generated by money in the bank.) Therefore there is no guarantee that it will even exist after Cater has retired. "I have been able by good luck to keep this fund going so far," he stated.

Professor Robert Anderson, Acting Chair for the Department of Philosophy and Religion, recognized what he called "budgetary constraints." He stated of the Philosophy conference, "I can agree with the administration's judgment that the financing of this excellent opportunity was beyond the means of the college."

President Cater was extremely positive about the SGA trip. "It was a very valuable investment."

Dean Baer, agreeing, assessed the importance of educating students in leadership positions. "Those conferences are directly related to a post which effects other students."

She also commented on the administration's responsibility to leaders. "We are supportive of students taking on the leadership role. We [the institution]

Students to blame?
Roderick repeats available information

by Cynthia Croot

Security has had little chance or motivation to answer harsh criticisms recently leveled against them, according to Gerald Roderick, Director of Security.

"Charges" range from overzealous ticketing to unreliable reaction time to fire alarms and other emergency situations. Roderick deems such complaints mere "opinions," to which he feels no responsibility to respond. Roderick asserts that with a couple minutes to discuss it, many such complaints can be explained away.

He maintains that no one has taken the time to interview Security in order to understand their system, so observations are merely idle talk. Nevertheless, Roderick was interviewed for The Elm in early November about ticketing student vehicles and towing. The article outlined Security's policies on the subject as well as including "common sense" safety tips from Roderick himself.

Probably most prominent in students' minds is the issue of the fire in Middle Hall. While Roderick did not address the situation explicitly, he offered a possible explanation.

Many students leave important messages on the security answering machine. Roderick says that in emergency situations, or instances which call for an "immediate response," the answering machine is not of any use.

On the informational sheet issued to students at the beginning of the year, alternative numbers are listed and proper procedure outlined.

"If students would take the time to familiarize themselves with the information, mix-ups would not occur."

On the sheet, several options are listed. In the case of a student being locked out of the room, or some other minor, non-emergency occurrence, he or she should try 778-2800, ext. 310 first.

If security personnel are not reached, information can be left on the answering machine. From

Health Center improved

by Jean McCall

Washington College Health Services recently announced that a new addition to the Health Center will be completed by the time students return from winter break.

According to Dawn Nordhoff, Associate Director of Health Services, the new examining room is being built in Queene Annes Dormitory just outside their present facilities, where vending machines used to be located. Money for the addition comes from a proposal submitted by President Cater and accepted by the Wellness Council.

This council is made up of fifteen members of Washington College staff and administration: Provost and Dean Elizabeth Baer, Virginia Collier, Sharon Crew of the Dining Services, Pat Engersaul, Vice President and Deputy Sherry Magill, Dean of Student Affairs Maureen McIntire, Michael Macielag, Associate Dean Ed Maxcy, Counseling Center Director Dr. Bonnie Michaelson Fisher, Director of Athletics Geoff Miller, Associate Director of Health Services Dawn Nordhoff, Dr. Walter Roemer, Associate Dean Sansing, Betty Anne Schauber, and Karen Smith.

New towing ordinance

By Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Chief Stetson recently announced that a new ordinance involving towing and storage of vehicles in Chestertown will go into effect December 10. The ordinance is meant to help local police encourage out of state drivers to settle their unpaid tickets.

Local police can now tow and store out of state vehicles whose owners have failed to pay five or more tickets. Said Stetson, "The car will be towed and stored without prior notice to the owner. We'll send them a notice after we've impounded the vehicle."

The Chief of Police stated that over 200 out of state drivers have unsatisfied citations and "probably three quarters of them are college students". One individual, not specified by Stetson as a student, has twenty two unpaid tickets, another has fifteen.

Students should realize that Chestertown Police intend to offer no significant grace period. "We're not going to go out at 12:01 [a.m. on the 10th], but we are going to start moving on these." Stetson added that unpaid tickets have cost Chestertown over $1,000 a year. "We just have to do something."

Maryland residents are not the primary focus of the new ordinance because police already have the means for dealing with their unsatisfied citations. Stetson simply places a "flag" on their registration, preventing them from getting new tags.

But collecting fines of state drivers has been a problem.

Stetson urges individuals with outstanding fines to pay them before the tenth. If a vehicle is impounded, the owner will not only be forced to settle outstanding fines before the car can be released, but also will be responsible for towing and storage fees. "It can be very expensive," Stetson warned.

When asked if students, unsure about tickets they have acquired, can call or visit the Chestertown Police Department, Stetson stated that they "should already know who they are."

The 1980's: a decade long lesson in mortality

The 1980's will be remembered for many things. There is AIDS which has frightened at least part of the nation into changing its sexual habits, and taught the world that humans are not invincible and nature still had a few tricks up her sleeve.

This decade has also shown the United States that we are not indestructible, and that our enemies are not either. Leonid Brezhnev, who ruled the Soviet Union longer than any other man, died, and a new, younger face appeared with a new vocabulary. These last few months of 1989 will be remembered as the time when that evil empire turned out to be a sick bear. There was a summit in Iceland that the American president prepared for by reading a popular novel. There was a nuclear arms treaty.

The eighties will also be remembered as the time of R. Reagan, an actor turned politician who gave more comedians more material than Gerald Ford. Mr Reagan, you taught a generation of young Americans that the Presidency does not have to be a position of respect and authority, especially if you smile better than your opponent.

The eighties will also be remembered as the decade when the Supreme Court decided to attempt to undo Roe v. Wade. They didn't quite do it. Massive rallies and demonstrations brought attention to both points of view, and while the legislatures of some states listened to the pro-choicers, the president ignored them.

There was an arms for hostages scandal that reached the very top of the Administration, a negative campaign for president, the public embarrassment, exposure and later trial of a prominent TV minister. There was a famine in Ethiopia, and a major nuclear accident near Kiev. An earthquake devastated San Francisco, hurricanes ravaged the east coast, and a volcano erupted in Washington State. Miss America lost her crown when nude photographs of her were published. The British heir to the throne married and had a family. America launched and later lost a Space Shuttle, while other space probes photograph distant, yet neighboring planets. And on our own planet, we began to realize how fragile our biosphere is.

The historians will decide what in the eighties was important, and what influenced the world in which they will be writing. But for now, Merry Christmas to all and to all a good vacation.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Wheelan defends Development

To the Editor:

I read with great interest Erin Murphy's and A. J. MacLennan's op-ed pieces on the issue of fundraising and the pressing need for endowment funds at Washington College. While I want to respond to some of the points made regarding the development effort in general, I think it's safe to say that in one important sense they are correct; Washington College does need more endowment, more student scholarships, better faculty salaries. In many ways, it is reassuring to know that these concerns are now the concerns of the entire community, including students. It is essential however for everyone to keep a few facts in mind when discussing the development program and I hope the following will clear up some misunderstandings related to fundraising and the goals of the College.

A bit of history might be helpful. In 1982, when Douglass Cater became President, Cambridge Associates of Boston, Massachusetts was retained to provide an intensive financial review of Washington College's standing. Its analysis was sobering to say the least. In its report to the Board, the firm stated:

The enrollment decline is a costly financial problem which also threatens the very nature of the College. As the community shrinks, rooms go unoccupied, facilities decay and classes are underenrolled...The College rapidly approaches the point where it cannot support a full academic program.

The College was moving to the point where its very existence was in jeopardy. Most of the faculty were still suffering from the 1970's, when the College was maintaining on average 4 percent increases in salaries during the most highly inflationary period since World War II. Deferred maintenance on buildings, particularly dormitories, was estimated at $9 million. If repairs were not made quickly, many would face condemnation. Endowment stood at approximately $8 million and contributed less than $650,000 a year to the College's $10 million annual operating costs. Scholarship assistance could not come close to meeting the financial needs of the students. It was not a pretty picture.

Following the Cambridge Associates' recommendations, the Board approved a five year fundraising campaign, directed almost exclusively to survival. Funds were raised to increase endowment, fortify existing buildings, and make major improvements in the embarassing conditions evident in Dunning Science Hall and McAlpin Art Studio.

Life beyond the "gates" of Washington

To the Editor:

One of the primary functions of a college is to prepare its students for life beyond its gates. Failing this, college serves as nothing more than a continuation of the HIgh School experience. In this preparation, the school must be very careful to treat all of its students as adults, much in the same way that they can expect to be treated in the outside world. In this respect, Washington College succeeds as it has for the past 207 years.

What is not clear, is why a school that is so concerned with a students growth patronizes them on a daily basis with the attendance policy that is followed by so many professors. While it is true that some students require the threat of punishment to help motivate them into the classroom, there is clearly something wrong with a policy which makes a student more concerned with physically being in the classroom over participating in the subject matter. It would seem as though "three for free" is not only the school's condom policy, but its attendance policy as well. Although professors are encouraged to set their own attendance policy, many subscribe to the famed "three unexcused then half-a-letter grade off for all subsequent absences." Now we all know that there are virtually no professors who are unwilling to make exceptions in special cases, but the official policy still stands.

In the real world, you are not judged on whether you are sitting in a room, but on whether or not you live up to the productivity requirements of the given position. If an individual is unable to keep up with his/her requisites, they simply loose their position. This is the attitude that Washington College should adopt in judging a student's performance in a given class. Not whether or not they idly made every class, but whether they are able to show a cognitive grasp of the subject matter.

Even with this type of attitude, one cannot discount the intrinsic value of class participation and it is not the purpose of this position to do so. Rather, it is believed that presence in a class does not compare with participation in a class. That fact being accepted, let us take the example of two students. One student is careful to make it to all of his/her classes, yet sits quietly by, while a second student, who misses class on the average of five absences a month, makes the most out of each of the classes that they do attend. It is the point of this position that we

ISSUE: Of Santa's reindeer, who is your favorite and why?

Rerun the Reindeer

You know Dasher and Dancer and Prancer and Vixen........

Comet and Cupid and Donner and Blitzen........

But do you recaaalll........the most faaamous Reeeindeer of all?

Ah yes; I remember Rerun.

Rerun and I were roommates at Eureka College during the heady days of '67, when he joined the Black Panthers and first started wearing that silly red hat. When he started getting his antlers, I thought it was merely some political statement. I can tell you, no one was more surprised than me when my old chum Rerun ended up as Santa's most notorious grazing quadruped.

It happened one December evening...'79, I think it was. We had been out of college for eleven years and we had yet to get jobs.

Jeffery Vail

It was about 4 AM. Raj, Dwayne and I were sucking down some Billy Beer in Raj's basement and watching "A Gong Show Family Christmas" starring Jamie Farr, Bobbie Vinton and Juicy J.P. Morgône. Mean Gene the Dancin' Machine had just come on, when there was a voice from behind us. There was a reindeer coming down the stairs.

But not your conventional reindeer, mind you. This one had a red beret and suspenders, pants that looked like a tablecloth from Pizza Hut, a huge, ridiculous smile and a gluteus maximus that could stop a bull elephant. It sort of looked like a high-speed collision between Pearl Bailey and a gnu. Anyway, it wasn't pretty, and it got worse when the reindeer flounced across the room and announced that it was Rerun, that it was the victim of a cruel genetic trick, and that it was leaving the next day to seek its destiny at the North Pole. There was consternation among us. Dwayne was so upset that he began leaping around the room, careening off walls and saying, "Hi-HI-hi!" until he passed out.

I was devastated. I had known Rerun all my life. I was there that long day in the hospital when Rerun was born. Rerun weighed thirty-five pounds at birth. His momma screamed so much when he was being born, they had to shoot her up with 300 cc.s of imported rhino tranquilizer. (By the way, there's a logical error in this article, and if you can find it, I'll give you a drawing of your favorite English professor.)

Anyway, you all know the rest of the story. As luck would have it, Rudolf got tanked and was sucked into the engine of a DC-10 the previous week, so the big S. was desperate. He's human like the rest us, he was in a bind, right? So he hired Rerun. I guess he figured, red nose, red hat, what's the difference? Nobody will notice.

Unfortunately, the Soviet Air Defense System did, when Rerun strayed into Soviet airspace on his first Christmas as a reindeer. Poor Rerun. His bulk made him look like a B-1 on their radar screens, and that was it for him.

Well...waitasecond. Okay. You're right, Rerun sucks. Vixen's my favorite reindeer. You wanna hear about Vixen? Wait...stop...what are you doing...NO! Susan Di Leo's editing my article and taking out the ending! No! No! Noooooaaaerrregeghurgle..........

I'd have to say Vixen. For some reason I always go for the lesser known and obscure. After all, who has really heard anything about him?

Rudolph: victim of odd jobs and mental disability

Brett Lankford

I must admit that my favorite reindeer used to be Rudolph. The red-nosed reindeer was my hero during my childhood, something for me to look up to and admire. I wanted to be just like Rudy, especially the red nose. I once dipped by nose in hydrochloric acid for three days in hopes of acquiring a crimson hue for my honker. This plan backfired drastically, however, and, well, I just don't like to talk about the rest of this story. Let's just say thank God for cosmetic surgery and leave it at that.

Anyway, my dream was shattered when I finally found out the truth about Rudolph's dark side. Like most gullible little tykes, I believed what I saw on that CBS Christmas special. You mean you still believe that junk? How realistic can a story be when it's told by a talking snowman? That show was just thought up to keep the little kids happy and give Burl Ives something to do. In reality, Yukon Cornelius was a chronic drinker who liked to eat paste. Hermie later lost his dentistry practice after he accidentally removed a fellow elf's tongue during surgery. Clarice was recognized as the most beautiful doe at the North Pole, then blew the whole thing by posing nude for Playelk. No antlers, nothing.

Well, Rudolph was no better. He tried to make the best of his genetic disaster, taking temporary jobs as a night light and a police siren. Neither of these jobs panned out, and Rudy became very depressed. He didn't take the name calling very well, either, and he soon became a recluse. In addition, his father and mother were having marriage problems at the time. Things came to a head when Mrs. Donner ran off with the Charlie-in-the-Box from the Island of Misfit Toys. This sticky situation scarred Rudolph for life, driving him further into hiding and contributing to his mental instability.

The Claus family and the rest of the North Pole did their best to leave Rudolph alone. Santa and Mrs. Claus had their hands full trying to curb the overactive sexual desires of their elves, since it was impossible to find condoms small enough for the horny little dudes. Rudolph was the last of their worries, but this changed quickly when the blizzard of blizzards struck the night before Christmas. Santa had given up hope and was in the process of downing a keg of spiked eggnog when Mrs. C suggested that Rudolph could help. The man in the red suit agreed to the plan and darted out to Rudolph's grotto.

Unfortunately, Rudolph was not going to agree to the trip without negotiating a huge multi-year contract. The lawyers were called together and an impressive pact was hammered out in short notice. Rudolph would have a song written about him, plus have a TV special aired that portrayed him as God's gift to venison. In return, Santa would have Rudy at his service every Christmas Eve.

This agreement worked wonderfully the first year, but it has since caused some problems at the Claus residence. Rudolph spends much of the year living it up on the party circuit, then reports to the sleigh out of shape

A new program to help the homeless

So far the Bush Administration and Congress have been unresponsive on topics such as day care, and they have reached an impasse on such issues as abortion. It seems the only thing they have agreed on is a pay raise for themselves. It would be nice if they could agree on something that might help a group of people in our society that don't have anything– the homeless.

The homeless are very visible in Washington DC, that same place where Congress and the administration agreed to give themselves more money per year. The homeless stand on grates outside the Smithsonian. They sleep on park benches and at Metro stops. They push their worldly possessions in shopping carts.

During the Reagan Administration, while defense budgets increased, housing budgets decreased. The President has a proposed $728 million package to help the homeless, which Congress says won't go far enough.

The package falls under the jurisdiction of Housing Secretary Jack Kemp. Kemp wants a three year program of federal aid that will be matched with social services of equal value from other federal, state, local or private programs.

Laura Hopper

Of the $728 million, over $450 million will be used to cover or help pay for rental costs, and $108 million will be used for rental subsidies for the handicapped or mentally disturbed. $150 million will be used to construct single-room-occupancy (SRO) structures for the mentally ill or for those dependent on drugs. There will be programs directed at the "severely dysfunctional who are frequently homeless or the long-term homeless."

Kemp also announced that 10% of housing foreclosed on by the Federal Housing Authority would be leased to non-profit organizations to help the homeless.

But as winter approaches, the question remains: is this too little, too late? Many of the homeless are former patients of state and federal mental hospitals which were forced to discharge patients when their funding was cut. The only way to help this type of homeless person, who can be dangerous to himself and others, is to send him back to the hospital, that is, to restore funding to these institutions.

With the president vetoing anything with the word abortion connected to it, the Congress would have to resist the temptation to add an abortion clause or two to this legislation. This is, after all, a proposed plan and will have to pass through the appropriate committees in Congress, and if this program is important to the president, they might just try to tie in funding for abortion.

But even if Congress and the administration don't find some way to obstruct programs to help the homeless, there is always the chance that the court will do it for them. A recent Supreme Court decision left intact a ruling which bars New York City from forcing developers who convert or demolish boarding houses where the elderly or ill live to provide substitute housing. The decision also leaves intact a lower court decision which prevents the City from blocking the development of these properties. This could set a precedent for developers who want to renovate slum areas of Washington.

Whatever Congress and administration decide to do about the homeless, they must do something soon. Although the Weather Service is predicting a warmer than usual winter, it will be cold enough for those who must live outside.

In the world: Aquino battles Philippine Coup

UNITED STATES:

A Central Intelligence Agency cargo plane carrying arms to US-backed rebels in Angola crashed in Angola, killing all of the Americans on board, and several rebels as well. The plane was carrying arms for the rebels seeking to overthrow the government. The crash, which occurred in a rebel-controlled area, was probably caused by pilot error or mechanical difficulties. The CIA refused to comment on the accident.

President Bush announced that he would veto a bill to extend student visas indefinitely for Chinese students studying in the US, although he did instruct Attorney General Dick Thornburgh to grant students a four year extension on visas approved by Congress. Beijing has been applying diplomatic pressure to the president, urging to veto the bill which would allow Chinese students to stay in the US for up to five years. The students fear recriminations for participating in pro-democracy demonstrations. The Chinese government has also threatened to prohibit college students from studying in the US and to end visits by American students to China. The president defended his decision by saying it would preserve his ability to manage foreign relations while accomplishing the same objectives of the Congress.

200 demonstrators gathered outside the White House to protest what they feel is the government's low level of support for AIDS research and services. 78 people were arrested for blocking traffic by policemen wearing surgical gloves. 600 museums, galleries and other institutions across the US observed "a day without art" to increase public awareness of AIDS.

THE PHILIPPINES:

Last Friday at dawn, 300 rebel troops seized two military bases, Villamov and Sangley, and staged aerial attacks on the Presidential Palace, the government TV station, and armed forces headquarters. President Bush offered to send American military aid. After hesitating for several hours, President Aquino accepted. American planes landed, and government troops were able to regain control of rebel-held military camps and TV stations.

This coup attempt is the fifth and "most serious" since Mrs Aquino took office in February 1986. US intervention came "as a shock" to the rebels and "caused significant disruption" in their operations. Mrs Aquino accepted the president's offer of aid because local troops "lacked ability to contain rebels."

The coup attempt comes at a time of public dissatisfaction over increasing economic hardship, a breakdown of public services, and allegations of increasing corruption in the government. Mrs Aquino's popularity has slipped badly in recent months.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA:

The communist government, headed by Milos Jakes, handed power over to the opposition party, the Civic Forum. Jakes will step down and Ladislav Adamec will become the "caretaker prime minister." Mr Adamec met with the leader of the Civic Forum, Vaclav Havel, and five other leaders and pledged to end the "leading role" of the Communist Party. However, the communist apparatus still remains in factories, schools, courts and the government.

On November 30, the Czech government announced that it would open its borders and begin removing barbed wire and other security fortifications along the border with Austria, and end virtually all restrictions on travel to the west.

FEATURES

Big Brothers/Sisters at WC

by Jennifer Golden

Today's generation of college students have been labeled the "me" generation because of their supposed apathy towards others. Certain students on this campus may disagree with this generalization. They have a right to argue with this label if they are volunteers in the Big Brother/ Big Sister Organization of the Upper Eastern Shore. This private, non-profit organization matches children from ages 6-16 with responsible, "screened" adults over 18.

It is a perfect chance for a student to make a difference in someone's life, right? Right, except no one said it was going to be easy. With the difficulties involved, these student volunteers are to be admired. A student already volunteers a large sum of time just being a student. Writing papers, studying for exams and just being involved in campus activities is as exhausting as a full time job. The students involved, however, feel that the program is worth the time and effort but stress how difficult it is being a Big Brother/ Big Sister.

Dianna Zaring, a sophomore intern for the organization, explains the process of becoming a Big Brother/Sister. She comments, "There's an application, then some pretty indepth interviews and then fingerprinting for protection." She also explains that when accepted, the Big Brother/Big Sister is "matched" with a "little" sister or brother and "morally" commits for at least one year. In describing the "littles" (of this area), they are generally from single parent homes where the father is either, "absent or just unavailable," quotes Zaring. She also explains the organization's need for Big Brothers, especially because the little boys "need a positive male role model since they spend so much of their time around women."

Junior Steve Bruchey has been a Big Brother since last spring. He brings up one of the main difficulties in becoming a Big Brother, "Time is toughest, I'm a lot busier than I was last semester." Another problem is his "match" lives beyond walking distance and Bruchey does not own a car. He also warns, "Things aren't as easy as most think;" it challenges the big brother's self-discipline. Whatever the hardships, Bruchey still encourages others saying, "Anyone who likes kids and if they're positive they have the time" should apply.

Sophomore Amy Caddle has also commented on the time demand and emphasizes the emotional drain of such a relationship. After knowing her little sister for a year, she is relatively close to her and spends a lot of time with her. Caddle comments, "It's really made me aware of how children look up to older people. I had to deal with not only my emotional needs but hers also." Caddle joined Big Brothers/Big Sisters because of her interest in charitable organizations, such as Amnesty International. She also saw the important need for the continuance of the organization in Chestertown. Her most important reason for becoming involved was that it is "a direct way [to help] instead of just sending money to charity."

As Caddle's "little" began to trust her and then proceeded to reveal painful details of her life; Caddle, at first, "just didn't know what to say." This situation can be a part of the program that can be very jarring to the volunteer. Caddle explains, "It really hits home when you're in this program, and you're confronted with [the harsh realities these children endure]."

Sophomore Pam Feeney has not been matched with her little sister, yet she feels she can handle both the time and emotional demands. As for the time commitment, Feeney will definitely change her schedule to fit the demands of the relationship. As for the emotional needs of her little sister, she is confident: "I would hope I would be able to relate to them. I think I've lived a little, and I'm a very open person." Feeney would also like to take an older child since she plans to teach high school. Mainly, however, Feeney "wants to help the underprivileged."

Senior Matt Zuech has also applied to be a Big Brother, although he acquired a "little brother" outside of the organization two years ago. He comments, "I just figured I could help and started helping him with his homework." Eventually, Zuech states, "Things kind of grew from there." So why did Zuech join the organization after being involved in a sort of match of his own? He replies, "I felt it was a good organization that offered more than just myself."

Zuech, furthermore, worked with Big Brothers in Denver. He comments, "The big brothers there, after four or five years, still seem to be a part of their little brothers' lives." Perhaps, most important a reason why these student become involved is as Zuech says, "Even if you spend a semester with them you are a part of their lives." Big Brothers/ Big Sisters is a difficult but rewarding experience. If interested, contact Dianna Zaring, extension 336 for information.

WC basketball battles inconsistency, Widener

by Matt Giller

Last week's games against Division I foe Delaware and MAC rival Widener highlighted a couple of weaknesses that must be ironed out if they plan to beat the likes of Hopkins and Ursinus. Recently, the Shoremen have fallen victim to a shallow bench and a lack of concentration. This prevented the team from handily defeating a weaker Widener squad.

By virtue of the tape ruler, the University of Delaware appeared to have a significant advantage over the much smaller Shoremen. But Washington College has always played tough and scrappy against the Newarkian netters, and this year proved no different. The large WC contingent that traveled north witnessed a spirited and unawed visiting team. The first half was closer than expected until about midway through the period, when Charles Johnson left the game with a bad ankle that has hampered him all season. The injury has since been diagnosed as pulled ligaments, forcing C.J. to miss the rest of this semester's action. An injury is always unfortunate but with the lack of depth Coach Finnegan has it is even more of a problem. At the time of the injury Delaware had a six point edge, but the lead stretched to ten at the half in C.J.'s absence.

Delaware was up by as many as 16 in the second half before WC made several runs. These spurts were only equalled by thunderous dunks from a bigger and faster home team that held on to prevail 80-64. Tim Keehan and Chris Brandt scored 15 and 20 points respectively, while Charles "Tank" Duckett came off the bench to tally 13 of his own.

The Widener game last Saturday night was a game that should stick in the minds of those who played for a long time. As the near-capacity crowd shuffled into the Cain Gymnasium the underdog Widener team shot out to a 9-0 lead. The Shoremen went almost four minutes before scoring a bucket. Widener opened with a ferocious defense that forced three early uncharacteristic turnovers from team captain Keehan.

The Shoremen took a time out, regrouped, then darted out to a 21-4 run behind strong inside play from senior Chris "Bull" Jamke and sophomore Tim Liddy. Although a Widener box and one prevented Keehan from netting more than one field goal in the first half, the Shoremen were able to dominate the rest of the half. Coach Finnegan took his gladiators into the locker room with a 29-21 lead.

Although guards Tank, Brandt and Keehan were starting to come to life offensively, the inside game fizzled and Widener took advantage. With a little more than six seconds left in the game, Widener tied the score. The two teams traded baskets until a couple of three pointers from the Shore spread the lead to six with under two minutes left. But, in the holiday spirit of giving, the Shoremen got rattled under the Widener pressure and let them back in the game. Bull, who played 38 minutes of his best basketball of the season, played the last two as if he had ten beans on Widener. He turned the ball over twice and brainlessly fouled an opponent 80 feet from the basket, assisting Widener in their comeback.

A turnover by the Shoremen with less than 10 seconds left gave Widener one last opportunity to break a tie score. After a timeout, Widener missed both an outside shot and a tip-in, delaying the post game festivities for five minutes of overtime.

For most of the five-minute overtime period the two teams traded baskets. Tank and Brandt continued to shine, and the excitement came to a feverish pitch when Widener went to the foul line with two seconds left and down by three. Widener made the front end of a one-and-one, then called time out to draw up the "carom off the rim, get the rebound, score and tie up the game" play. In one last ditch effort the man on the line - a career 40% free throw shooter - accidentally sank his free throw to give Washington College the victory.

The Shoremen record now stands at 4-1. The Wild Goose Classic takes place this weekend at Cain Gymnasium, and will hopefully provide some excitement. WC has invited Hunter, Spring Garden and Northeastern Bible to their tournament, which begins this Friday night.

Swimmers stay undefeated

by Greg Coss

They're exactly where they want to be for the Elizabethtown meet: 5-0 and riding on a lot of confidence. The WC swim team won three meets within a six day period, and are suddenly a strong contender in the MAC. A lot of that confidence came in the meet against Widener, where WC was behind at the first intermission but went on win. Widener was the first MAC opponent WC faced this season, but they did not fold when they were down by six at intermission. Assistant coach Kim Lessard had reviewed the meet beforehand, and she had remarkably predicted the team would trail at intermission by six points. Lessard also predicted a close victory, and several swimmers noted Lessard's talk as the key. "Kim told us we were right where she expected we would be," Eliza Cohen said. Freshman phenom Amy Capone added "We knew we could win because Kim said we would."

Capone was surprised, however, when her team was upset in the 200 medley relay. She managed to come back strong in the 100 and 200 yard breaststroke, finishing 1-2 with Leslie Newcomb in each race. Capone also captured the 200 yard IM.

Joan Colton was another big contributor to the win over Widener, shaving an amazing ten seconds off her time in the 200 breaststroke. Colton also remembered Lessard's talk. "None of us were worried. Kim said all we needed was a strong second half of the meet." Sophomore Kerstin Kjellberg also gave credit to the team itself. "This was a gutty win, one where everybody gave it their all in every race. We really got together as a team."

The team did pull things together. After dropping the opening medley, Kasey Carroll easily captured the 1000 freestyle. The meet was close, with Samantha Streamer winning the 50 yard freestyle to cut the lead at intermission. The second half of the meet stayed very even and came down to the last race. Streamer came through again, anchoring the winning relay team that catapulted WC to victory 136-125. This put their mark at 3-0.

Washington took its 3-0 mark into the meet against Marymount, and the Shorewomen quickly assured themselves of a 4-0 record. WC gave a total team effort while crushing Marymount 164-81. Their next victim was Goucher College, who was overmatched early as WC took first and third in the opening 200 relay. Bridgette Ferris, Newcomb, Streamer and Capone made up the winning relay team. The next event was the 1000 freestyle, which Kasey Carroll captured without any difficulty.

WC continued its winning ways as Karen Brady and Cotton finished 1-3 in the 200 meter freestyle, Newcomb won the 100 yard breaststroke, and Kasey Carroll won the 200 yard butterfly. Kjellberg finished third in the butterfly race. WC then steamrolled Goucher in the 50 freestyle, leading 86-45 at intermission. The team performed just as well in the second half, winning 155-107.

The team now prepares for the war Saturday afternoon against Elizabethtown. They look for revenge against a team that beat them by a mere six points last year. This is an important meet for the women, and Monica Wilen summed it up best. "I'm nervous. I see the girls that swam against this team before. There is a lot of respect for this team." Practices should be hard for their toughest opponent yet. "Wednesday and Thursday will be very tough, and hopefully we have a light practice Friday," Pula said. "I also think the fact that we are swimming at home will make a big difference, because we are used to the pool and we have the confidence to win here." Unfortunately Pula and Kerstin Kjellberg will leave the team after this semester, and these could be two damaging losses to the WC squad.

Washington College takes on Elizabethtown this Saturday at 1:00 in the Casey Swim Center.

Editorial distorts honor code?

To the Editor:

After reading your editorial on the honor code, I feel that you lack understanding of our intentions to revise it. Yes, you are correct in pointing out that the honor code is an impotent entity, and that is what we intend to remedy.

Your editorial distorts the true meaning of the honor code. Of course, the honor code should be a deterrent to dishonest academic behavior and be able to punish those implicated; however more importantly, the honor code should instill enough trust and honor in students so they will not act in a dishonorable manner. The honor code should reflect the honor and trust that the majority of the students at Washington College have for themselves and this institution.

In addition, the honor code will never be a cure all for all infractions: social or academic; instead, this revision emphasizes the College's committment [sic] to academic honesty and proper social behavior. Unfortunately laws in our society are broken daily, but these laws are not abolished and so is the case here at Washington College. Even though the majority of students are honest, there are those who do break the rules and there must a safeguard in place to discourage them.

Students are unwilling to turn in their peers for cheating knowing the penalties in the past have not been that strict. Our revisions will insure that students are not just reprimanded, but are punished for their wrongful actions. Also, you seem to imply that every student who reports cheating are [sic] acting out some vendetta or vengeance against the student accused. This is simply not true. Most students report cheating because it is the right thing to do.

Finally, I would like to say that I respect your opinion, but your arguments only state what we already know and provide us with few solutions. Our revisions are not planned to turn the College into a police state; instead, they will help to make this great academic institution even greater. Why don't you wait until our plans are implemented and then comment? If you do have suggestions to improve the honor code I would like to hear them.

Bill Kerbin
Chairman, SGA Honor Code Committee

Steven B. Attias
President, SGA

Editor's reply: While I am not discounting the value of the honor code, I do not believe that these additional rules will guarantee that cheaters will be reprimanded for their actions. I believe I suggested in my editorial that students need guidelines on how to report a case of cheating as it occurs; such guidelines can only improve the efficacy of the honor code, while more rules will only add to its impotence.

Annual Renaissance Christmas Dinner revelers entertained all those who attended the special event December 1 and 2.

WC a college of many, varied needs

Wheelan

Thanks to the exclusive support of the Eugene B. Casey family, the College has been able to bring together an academic centerpiece. In addition, these contributions afford us the opportunity to link the two sides of the campus, now divided by Gibson Avenue.

Campaign results to date have been rewarding. Endowment gifts have reached $12.8 million, bringing the total endowment to $19 million, with over $6 million committed within the next four years. Annual giving gifts now exceed $1.1 million, dedicated to faculty salaries and scholarship assistance. The Master Plan has included the renovation of O'Neill Literary House, Cullen, Minta Martin, Reid, Caroline, and the Hill Dorms. At the same time the Dunning and Decker Science buildings are in full use. Students will be working in the Larrabee Creative Arts Center by next January, and using the Casey Center by September.

The impact of these improvements on student recruitment and alumni support cannot be underestimated. With the number of high school graduates shrinking, Washington College, like all colleges, must be seen by prospective students as a school with a well-maintained campus and attractive facilities. This is not simply a matter of aesthetics, but vital to recruiting the best students possible and providing a setting conducive to learning.

The state of the College's campus has dramatically affected alumni support. For many, particularly alumni from the 70's and early 80's, Washington College was an institution in decline, often best forgotten. In 1982, only 28% of the alumni were supporting the College, at a level of less than $100,000 a year. This year, we are predicting that over 55% of alumni will support the Washington College Fund, producing $400,000 in income directly for student aid and faculty salaries. The revitalization of the campus and its programs have been the key motivating factors in these substantial increases, and will undoubtedly bring greater increases in gifts and bequests down the road.

I think it's imprtant for the College Community to understand the rationale for the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, which at this point is probably the most misunderstood of all the College's fundraising goals. At the very heart of this building is the notion that one cannot be truly educated if one lives merely on a cerebral level. Recognizing the Greek ideal of a sound mind in a sound body, the College wishes to provide a facility encouraging this theme as the central focus of the building. The Lifetime Fitness Center will not only be a home for "jocks" but a central part of student life, where the seeds of lifetime fitness and health maintenance are learned and supported. It would be very difficult to convince a significant number of alumni, who are also devoting considerable resources to the College's annual scholarship needs, that this is not a primary need of the College.

To conclude: when the President or a Board member is on the road raising funds for Washington College, the objective in almost all cases is to stimulate interest in the College, not simply to obtain a gift to a specific project. Remember, Washington College is one of thousands of charitable organizations looking for funding. This is also a fragile institution with many, many needs, all of which cannot be fully funded. We should be proud that we are finally suceeding to the point where, in the next two years, we will have the opportunity of fundraising for furthering endowment and expanded Miller Library. I trust when we reach that point we can count on the college community's support. Meantime I would be glad to meet with any student or faculty member to discuss these important issues in more detail.

Sincerely,
F. David Wheelan

cannot refer to the first as the better student. The determining factor here is whether or not both students have met the content requirements for the class in question. After all, is this not the primary purpose of classroom instruction?

It is common practice that the larger lecture classes and some of the more difficult courses typically do not require attendance. it is in these classes that a truly enlightened attitude toward attendance may be found. These professors know that the only way to excel in the class is by showing up on some sort of regular basis. Instructors of smaller, less complicated courses might consider concentrating on a students performance in class rather than his/her ability to show up in the first place. The student (or someone else) has paid for the course, obviously they need it for their major, distribution, etc., so it is then up to them to make the conscious decision to show up.

Rather than an attendance policy which limits a student to three unexcused absences, let the professors more clearly define and emphasize classroom participation. Clearly, if a student does not meet this participation requirement, the instructor may surely penalize the student for not keeping up with one of the core requirements of the course. In a sense, this motivates a student to show up; not because they are afraid of the amount of the classes they have missed, but rather because they fear being penalized for missing being involved in the subject matter. as was shown in the above example, there is clearly a difference between presence and participation in a classroom. Only in a class where a student is required to participate in the discussion or lecture, while maintaining passing grades on all required tests and papers, can one become truly educated. This type of format enables a student to become self started rather than reactive to a sophomoric approach to attendance.

In conclusion, it is the stated position of this letter to promote a change in thought when it comes to the subject of attendance. Rather than continue to require a student to physically attend class, let us begin to concern ourselves more with the students actual participation in the subject matter. It may be argued (against this point) that if a student is not in class, how can we concern ourselves with his/her participation? The fact is, the sooner our students become able to make the conscious decision that class attendance is vital to academic success, the sooner they will be able to become truly self-dependant. The practice of having mandatory attendance prolongs the time that students feel that they must attend class rather than having the understanding that they need to attend class.

Sincerely,
Stuart Neiman

Well, that's the real story of Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer. Sort of changes your image of him, doesn't it? I don't actually have a favorite reindeer, but I don't like Vixen very much either. Theft case resolved

by Suzie Mazzullo

Three Washington College students, who were cited for theft of college property on August 25 of this year, have recently been sentenced.

Mark Cavallaro, Nicholas Darcangelo, and Michael Johnson, all charged with theft of property worth over $300, faced trial on November 21 in district court of Kent County Courthouse.

The three were sentenced to one year probation.

During that time they may not be involved in "any further alleged violations of criminal law including motor vehicle violations." Each of them must also serve 50 hours of community service work within three months of the day of the trial.

Cavallaro, Darcangelo and Johnson were arrested after being observed loading some Washington College furniture into the back of a truck on the night of August 25. Lt. John Price made the arrest.

have to give moral and financial support, otherwise the students may shy away from doing these jobs."

Attias felt that the seminar he attended was "an outstanding experience" and has since applied much of what he's learned. One example of that application is contained in plans for the new Student Union.

"We need a Student Union that is not stereotyped. Right now it is known as a place where people don't go." He added, "We should have an outside coordinator to take pressure off of students working there."

Attias thought the seminar was valuable for "establishing contacts" and he was able to exchange ideas with other student leaders.

Anderson, summarised what to many seems to be the main issue in terms of both conferences. He was reluctant to avoid the financial problems of students.

"There have been several cases recently in which certain educational opportunities have seemed open only to those who can afford them. We should guard against drifting towards a two-track curriculum that discriminates against those with less money."

He added, "On the other hand it would seem foolish to pass up extra-curricular events which benefit those who have the means to participate. The situation of the philosophy conference appears to fall closer to the latter of these two principles."

Stating that this general problem has not been adequately studied by the College. Anderson recommended "that it be put on the agenda of the appropriate college committee."

Security

8 AM to 12 AM Monday – Saturday and 12 noon – 12 AM Sunday, the switchboard (dial 0 on a campus extension and 778-2800 on an outside phone) has a direct radio link to security, but this option is to be used only when no one can be reached at 310.

Finally, in the event of fire alarms, etc., security can be reached at 911, or 778-1241 (the Kent County Central Alarm dispatch). These numbers are to be used only in the event of a real emergency.

In the past, says Roderick, the 778-1241 number has been "overloaded with misuse," so students are urged to call only in extremely important situations. This system, albeit a bit complicated, "runs smoothly," states Roderick, "when people understand it."

Roderick continues, "a breakdown in communication is frustrating for both us and the student. Our main goal here is to serve the campus community."

Some students have raised the issue of improperly functioning fire extinguishers and alarms. Roderick explains that "all dorms which are required to have alarms and extinguishers, do." He further notes that security contacts a service company which inspects dormitories with installed apparatuses three times a semester in accordance with fire codes. He mentions the continued abuse by students of the extinguishers, which are sometimes "used as toys," are costly to maintain.

Finally, Roderick readdressed the parking issue. To many who use the facilities it seems harder and harder to find parking spots. Parking regulations are aimed at freeing up spots that are being improperly used so that students who need spots can find them. Also emergency access routes must be maintained.

For a while, Roderick admits, "parking enforcement even increased to encourage the registration of vehicles. Also we have towed vehicles, but not without at least one warning and often only following repeated attempts to contact the student, until we have no alternative."

On the whole, Security has a wide array of duties, from safety, parking and party registration, to handling legal disputes and patrolling the campus. Roderick is pleased to note that most shifts have two guards on them who are responsible for all of the enforcement duties as well as patrolling the 34 buildings on campus.

Says Roderick, "the Security Department has expanded over the past few years, and we hope to continue to grow along with the College. There isn't an administrator on campus who wouldn't like to have more money, but the administration has been supportive of our requests for money and the program in general. We have a successful program here, with no serious crime problem. I would say the grounds of WC are even safer than Chestertown."

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

The holiday season is upon us. To start off the festivities, the Washington College Dining Service held its annual Student's Christmas Buffet last Wednesday evening. The dining hall was draped insophisticated Christmas attire. Those who attended the buffet dinner seemed to enjoy their meal, the seasonal piano music, played by Adky Wun and the decorations.

Speaking of decorations, a special "THANK YOU" to the S.G.A. Social Committee for all their hard work last Saturday decorating the Dining Hall and letting the Dining Hall utilize the decorations during the month.

Sunday, December 10th, the W.C.D.S. will again sponsor the "Midnight Breakfast" from 11:30 P.M. to 12:30 A.M. All students are encouraged to take a break from studies and attend.

Starting Monday, December 11th, and running through Friday, coffee and assorted pastries will be served in the Coffee House at 11:00 P.M.

This is a joint venture sponsored by the S.G.A. Food Service Committee and the W.C.D.S. We hope it will prove a pleasant break from sudying for exams.

Dining Hall meal hours will remain the same as always during exam week. The only change will be on Saturday, December 16th. On that day, HOT BREAKFAST will be served from 7:30 A.M. to 8:30 A.M. and CONTINENTAL BREAKFAST will be available from 8:30 A.M. to 9:30 A.M.. LUNCH, the last meal of the semester, will run from 11:15 A.M. to 1:30 P.M.. DINNER, January 15th, served from 5:00 P.M. to 6:00 P.M., will be the first meal served for the second semester.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish everyone the best of luck on your finals. I hope everyone has a very THE BEST HOLIDAY SEASON EVER AND A HAPPY AND HEALTHY NEW YEAR. I look forward to seeing you all gain next semester.

Until then..............................MOM

SGA to revise Honor Code

by Amanda Burt

Washington College's Student Government Association has recently begun initiating changes into the Honor Code.

According to Bill Kerbin, Chairman of the SGA Honor Code Committee, a revised Honor Code will reinforce the strong standards that Washington College holds for academic and social conduct. Both Kerbin and SGA President Steve Attias contend that the present Honor Code is not a doctrine which hold students' respect.

According to Attias, the revision, a three step process, will strengthen the document. The first change occurred within the Student Conduct Council. "There is no longer a jury, but a five member hearing panel. This was not easy to pass through the faculty, " said Attias.

In addition to a lengthened outline of the Honor Code philosophy, the committee added the notion of academic dishonesty, "willfully knowing that a student has violated [the Honor Code]."

There is also a Social Code, "a subdivision of the Honor Code." It states that students should conduct themselves in a responsible manner and respect the rights of their peers.

Penalties for violation include "first offense, social probation; second offense, suspension from the College; and third offense, expulsion from the College."

Another change requires students to sign the Honor Code pledge at the beginning of each semester, as opposed to the previous practice of requiring only incoming freshmen to sign the pledge.

Kerbin has ordered Honor Codes from other schools such as Washington and Lee and William and Mary. "We would like to look at what other colleges have done and use it as a basis...This would help to reinforce commitment to the code. The purpose is not to create a police state."

Instituting the new Honor Code will be the final step in the process. "Educating incoming freshmen and reeducating upperclassmen is important," said Attias.

Attias hopes that students may begin to regard the doctrine seriously.

Master Plan update

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, recently outlined work on the Master Plan that was completed over Christmas break. He also updated the cable issue and addressed concerns that the College may retain a professional housecleaning service.

The Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center opened the first day of classes after a "less than ten month construction schedule." Baer deemed the center "proof positive that the College is bringing the cycle of the Master Plan Project to completion."

Only minor work remains to be completed; for example, some temporary windows still need to be replaced. Baer stated this would be accomplished within six weeks.

The firelane's conversion into College Lane is almost complete. According to Baer weather over Christmas break "cooperated" allowing workman to do much of the work. "We are aware that it's frustrating to students."

He also asked that students to "walk on the clear walkways. Avoid taking the direct path

Computer survey near completion

by Ryder Daniels

On Monday, January 15 at Registration students were asked to take a few minutes while they waited to register and fill out a survey for the Academic Computing Committee entitled: "HAVE YOU EVER HAD A COMPUTER PROBLEM?" Almost 500 students filled out a survey between 8:30 am and 4:30 pm.

First of all, members of the committee would like to thank all the students who took the time to complete these surveys as they will be invaluable in helping the committee to make important decisions about campus computing and long range planning that effect all students who use the Macintosh, from writing papers to doing computer class homework.

Some of the popular, and often heated issues on the survey were: Whether or not there should be a Computer Lab Assistant in the Library. Whether or not more hours are needed at the Computer Center. Whether a $5/ Semester Computing Fee that would allow free laser printing and more available hours is worthwhile and whether a required "Computing Component" in the curriculum that would teach students computing skills would be useful.

The Computing Committee will be evaluating student consensus based on the surveys this semester.

The data from the surveys is currently being compiled. The results should be available in two weeks. Anyone interested in

Security, local police join in campus cocaine bust

On December 12, Freshman Carlos Henriquez was arrested and charged with "Possession of Cocaine" and "Possession with the intent to Distribute Cocaine" by the Chestertown Police Department. He was jailed in lieu of $25,000 bail.

According to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security at WC, campus security received the information "about the cocaine being shipped to campus to Mr. Henriquez and the information checked out."

The Chestertown Police Department was notified along with the Kent County Sheriff's Department.

Officers from the various agencies waited until Henriquez accepted the package from Central Services. They confiscated the package from Henriquez and presented it to a drug-sniffing dog from the K-9 Corps of the Sheriff's Dept.

The dog's reaction gave the officers probable cause to ask for a "Search and Seizure Warrant."

When the warrant was presented and a search was conducted, police found an undisclosed amount of cocaine.

Police have not disclosed further information about the case because a trial is pending. They are apparently trying to avoid jeopardizing the case against Henriquez.

Letters to the Editor: KAs respond to charges of racism

To The Editor:

I am writing in response to Jim Sobczaks' article in The Best Paper in The World, entitled " KA W.C.'s RACIST FRATERNITY ", which appeared in the paper's final issue last semester. I would like to congratulate Mr. Sobczack on his timing. By printing the article in his own paper during the last week of class he avoided an immediate response. The Elm was already out, so I was forced to remain silent until this semester. I would like to present the other side of the argument, one that Mr. Sobczak mentioned but failed to address. It is the argument that, and I quote, "These guys aren't racists, that's just their stereotype, I mean, just because they dress up like Confederates doesn't mean that they're racist." Mr. Sobczack is partly wrong and partly right. I am not defending individuals in Kappa Alpha Order. Just as you find racists in society, you find racists in Kappa Alpha Order. However, to label Kappa Alpha Order as founded on and supportive of racism is incorrect. Just because racism exists in America doesn't mean that all Americans should be labeled racists. The same can be said of Kappa Alpha Order.

First let me indulge Mr. Sobczak in a history lesson, which should dispel some common, but incorrect, ideas about the civil war. In 1776 thirteen colonies decided the unfair practices of the British had gone too far. They joined together to declare independence from Britain. Revolutionary war ensued and eventually the colonies triumphed. To this day Americans celebrate July fourth as a national holiday, you can bet that the British don't. So, is it not natural for southerners to celebrate the day of secession from the Union, when they attempted to stand up for their beliefs'? This is why once a year the brothers of Kappa Alpha dress in Confederate uniforms and celebrate Old South. We do not put on white-hooded robes and burn a cross. We simply celebrate a day important to southern tradition.

In order to understand why the South wished to secede, we must examine pre-civil war history. As the northern states developed industrially and populations increased, the south remained mostly agrarian. Also during this period the United States was experiencing a westward expansion into new territories won during the Mexican-American War. This expansion caused a debate in Washington over whether these territories would be free states or slave states. The debate continued, with no real agreement reached. Additionally the south was angered by the reaction of the north to the Supreme Courts' Dread Scott decision. In his ruling Chief Justice Tawney said slaves were property. He went on to say that slaves were not citizens of the United States, and could never become citizens, therefore the case had no right to appear before the Court. Slave owners were delighted, while abolitionists were outraged, so outraged that they refused to obey the ruling. Tensions between the north and south escalated and relations deteriorated. The south declared itself independent, and civil war followed. Most southern states believed in the supreme right of the state. Since the states had existed before the Union, they felt they could leave at any time. The south also argued that slavery was protected by the Constitution. The ruling by Justice Tawney reinforced the belief in the south of the legitimacy of slavery. So the south not only went to war to protect rights it felt were being violated, but to defend against the disappearance of their way of life. Though their beliefs' were misguided, they felt justified in their actions.

The common belief is that the noble abolitionists of the north declared war on the evil men of the south in order to free slaves and make men equal. While many people in the north disliked the idea of slavery, few actively opposed it. Lincoln was no abolitionist, and saw blacks as unequal. When the Union went to war with the Confederates, there was no mention of freeing the blacks, only preserving the Union. Even within the Union there were four slave states. And while blacks fought with the Union, regiments remained segregated. Even after Appomattox blacks were treated badly in both the north and south. In New Jersey, restaurants, housing, and public transportation remained segregated.

Kappa Alpha Order does not so much uphold the ideals of the south, as it does those of Robert E. Lee. While it is true that General Lee was the commander of the Confederate Army, he was personally against slavery and did not own slaves. (However, Grant commander of the Union forces owned slaves). Robert E. Lee was offered command of the Union Army by Lincoln, but after consideration turned it down. Lee could not command an Army that was to destroy his homeland. It is his beliefs, his sense of responsibility, and his strength of character that Kappa Alpha Order holds most important. Since Lee was southern, the tradition inherent in his life is found in the beliefs' of Kappa Alpha's members.

Next I would like to address the activities that Kappa Alpha Order carries out on campus. Kappa Alpha Order has as a philanthropy, the Muscular Dystrophy Association. Throughout the year we are involved in fund raising activities and the money is turned over to the MDA. This money goes to help research efforts and to help those afflicted with Muscular Dystrophy. MDA effects everyone regardless of race. The money we send helps everyone, black or white. Does this resemble the policy of a racist organization? Each year at Christmas our chapter sponsors a party for needy children in Chestertown. We receive donations from businesses, and we provide the food and entertainment, which includes a visit by Santa to distribute gifts. This party is open to all disadvantaged kids, black or white. As Mr. Sobczak mentioned we hold the highest GPA on campus for Fraternities. Members of our Order are visible on campus in a number of areas, from the SGA president to RA's. Three brothers are volunteer firemen and two serve on the rescue squad. Kappa Alpha Order prides itself in beneficial service on and off campus.

To indict an entire culture, and way of life simply because of a blemish in it's past is narrow minded. The United States has perpetrated numerous atrocities in the name of Freedom, yet I am still proud to be an American and I can only assume that Mr. Sobczak is proud to be an American. If this is true I can only conclude that either Mr. Sobczak supports those injustices, or as he put it in his article, "... he must choose to ignore this dark aspect... consequently live the life of self- deception, and therefore he is an idiot." Here's a better answer, perhaps we are all human. Maybe in the future before Mr. Sobczak forms his opinions and makes broad generalizations he should be sure of his information and better aware of the historical background involved. When Mr. Sobczak claims in his article that Kappa Alpha supports racism and when he states that southern ideology is directly linked to racism and bigotry he is grossly incorrect.

Respectfully submitted,
The Brothers of Kappa Alpha Order

ISSUE: Would the proposed revisions of the Honor Code compel you to report an incident of cheating? Why or why not?

Stricter Honor Code will prevent cheating

Jane Horsefield

It seems that there is a growing controversy over the fairness of the newly revised Washington College Honor Code. This stronger version of the Honor Code is tougher and clearer than the preexisting version and is opposed by those students who feel that it is too stringent. Some students claim that the new Honor Code is unfair in that it stipulates that any student who has knowledge of another student's violation of the Honor Code and does not report that individual is himself guilty of academic dishonesty. This addition to our school's Honor Code is probably the most important component.

There is absolutely no reason any form of cheating should be tolerated by anyone at this college. Cheating is a despicable act of thievery that is completely unacceptable. When one person cheats every single one of us is cheated.

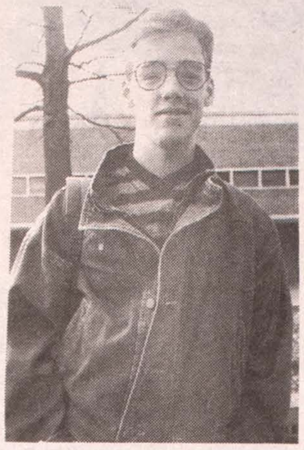
According to some, holding a witness of cheating responsible for reporting the incident is too strict and will only result in that witness coming off as a tattletale. Although it may be true in the past that there were incidents of cheating which went unpunished even though they were reported, with this new Honor Code there are provisions which specify exactly how a case of cheating should be dealt with by the All Campus Judiciary so that the past will not repeat itself. Too often I hear stories from outraged students who were certain their classmates were cheating on an exam, paper, or homework assignment but who refused to report the incident to their professor. Reasons given range from, "It's only my word against their's. No one would believe me." to, "I don't want to say anything because I don't want to have anyone mad at me," or, "I can't turn in a friend of mine." All three are lame excuses and do not have the least bit of substance.

Willfully knowing about an act of academic dishonesty and failing to report it is definitely a sign of weakness. But what befuddles me is that so many people let it happen. The message seems to be it's not acceptable to cheat but it is acceptable to look the other way when someone else is doing it. Doesn't it bother you when you have spent hours, maybe days, preparing for a test or a paper, that someone else could receive the same credit as you without having done any of the work? Well, it happens. It happens here, and it will continue to go on unless we as conscientious students begin to realize the honor code exists to help us and not to hurt us.

My freshman year I attended Randolph-Macon Woman's College where the honor code is an integral part of student life. Because the honor code was so highly respected by the students as well as the faculty there existed an atmosphere of absolute trust which allowed the students certain privileges unheard of at most colleges such as a totally free examination period.

Until students begin to take the Honor Code seriously, and as educated adults every one of us should, instances of cheating will occur and good students will continue to be hurt by those who care about nothing of which this college stands. I believe that the majority of the students at Washington College are honest and responsible people who want what is fair. I think the best way to insure academic fairness for all is to adhere to and advocate a strong Honor Code which punishes those who cheat and those who consciously allow others to cheat. The more people believe in it, the more people will abide by it.

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler



Matt Roche

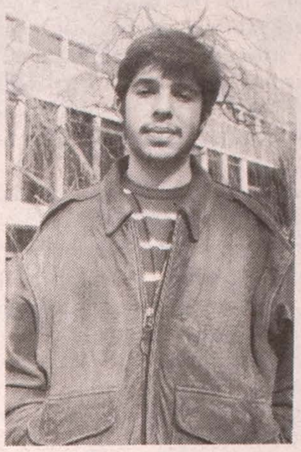
As can be seen in various military schools, such intolerance of cheating and those who cheat I believe is an effective deterrent. Turning a blind eye toward dishonesty is indeed easier but only perpetuates such behavior. Effective punishment to all those involved will I feel discourage others to participate..

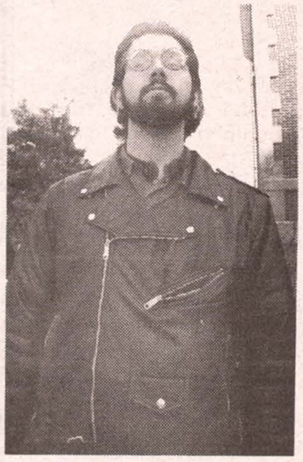


Scott Cagan
Hatboro, PA
Sophomore

While I do not condone cheating, I probably wouldn't report it. I feel that it is the responsibility of each student to study so cheating is not necessary and the responsibility of the professor to insure that cheating does not occur in his or her classroom.

Deborah Boyer
Syracuse, NY
Sophomore

I'd rather stay out of a situation of someone else cheating. I don't think that it's the student's responsibility to be turning in other students. It puts everyone in a bad situation and it's not fair for someone to be punished for not turning in somebody cheating when they are not involved.

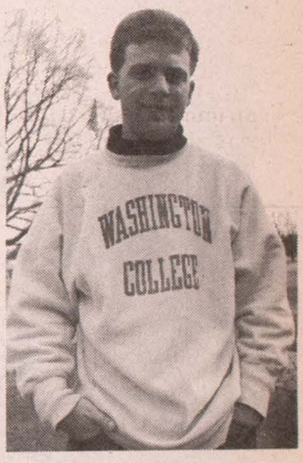


Clay Eichelberger
Salisbury, MD
Junior

I would be just as likely to report cheating now as I would after any revision. In any case, I'm not sure a revision of the Honor Code would make a difference to anyone who doesn't uphold it already.

Samantha Milbredt, Junior
Muttontown, NY
Jennifer McNamara, Senior
Hunt Valley, MD

We think all cheating should be reported but in actuality it is your own responsibility to respect the honor code due to the fact that if you cheat you are only hurting yourself.



Greg Coss
Bethesda, MD
Junior

If not reporting cheating will bring me into the picture of dishonesty, that poses a big problem. But I would have to say I'd report whoever it was that was cheating, because in a situation like that you have to put yourself first.

Revisions to Honor Code need further clarification

Michelle Beattie
Stephanie Tennyson

As students at Washington College, we believe the Honor Code to be and integral part of the college community.

In its present form, the Honor Code plays an important role in the academic lives of the students. Students are required upon admission to the College to sign the Honor Pledge, which demands adherence to the utmost standards of academic achievement. In signing this pledge, students are expected to fulfill several obligations which are currently outlined on page 24 of the student handbook. These include dishonest acts such as plagiarism, resubmitting material, use of crib notes, copying or discussing another student's answers, theft, etc. Punishments for violations of the Honor Code include honor probation, suspension, and even expulsion.

Several revisions of the Honor Code have been proposed by elected representatives of the student government. The first modification is the addition of a social code. This code regulates the behavior of student activities outside the classroom. Specifically, students are expected to conduct themselves in a responsible manner with respect to their peers. Although the College will not infringe upon students' personal rights, it will attempt to ensure the safety of all students. The shortcoming of this proposal is that it lacks explicit examples of prohibited behavior. Perhaps the dimension of practicality could be incorporated into the code by adhering to the concrete standards utilized by the Student Conduct Council.

Upon an initial violation of the social code, your social privileges (pledging a fraternity or sorority, eating in the dining hall, attending social events, etc.) will be revoked. A second offense warrants suspension, and if a third offense is committed, expulsion is mandatory.

The original Honor Code was altered to include a provision to punish those who witness a violation and willfully withhold this information. This person is susceptible to the same punishment as those who actively defy the ideals of the Honor Code. The consequences of transgressing the academic code entail failure of the class upon original offense and/ or honor probation. Upon second offense, you are suspended form the college and a third offense warrants expulsion.

This final feature of the Honor Code cannot be realistically enforced as it is nearly impossible to determine the extent of a student's knowledge with respect to a suspected violation. This added principle is a attempt on the part of the authorities to appeal to our consciences and report a violation.

Within the Honor Code it is necessary to include the method of reporting any offenders and to stress the anonymity of the process. The Honor Code needs to clarify what is meant by social probation and to expound upon honor probation. The intentions of the proposed revisions are well meaning, however they are inadequately developed. The Honor Code Committee has provided a general structure, but they need to endeavor upon a more detailed model.

Michelle Beattie and Stephanie Tennyson are sophomores.

PERSPECTIVES

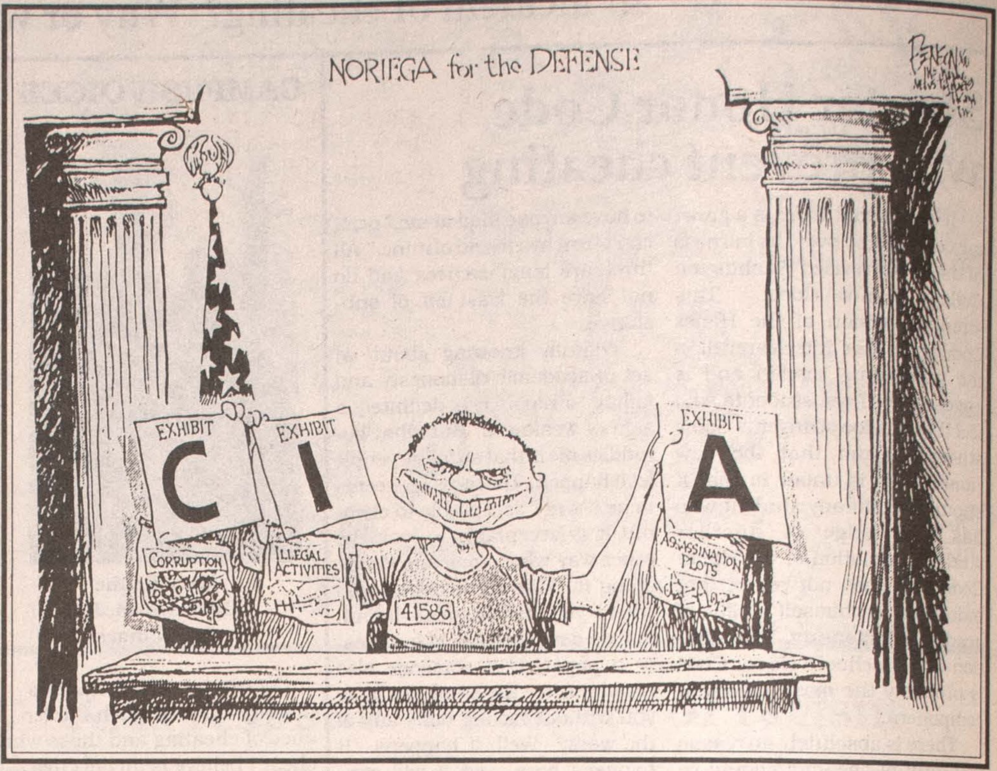
Where is this Panama place anyway?

Laura Hopper

There is a little girl in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan who decided to take an active interest in world affairs. She had watched a news magazine program on TV like 60 Minutes, and was interested in one of the stories. So she became the pen pal of General Noriega. They wrote to each other, and she even visited Panama, twice. Since Noriega's arrest, this little girl's connection with the general has come out into the open, and she has been subjected to hate mail, telling her what a terrible person she is for taking an interest in world affairs (I had pen pals when I was in Middle School but they were from ordinary places like Germany and Austria.).

Now, she is young, maybe in middle school. So, she probably didn't understand that all the terrible things being said about Noriega were most likely true. Stories about human rights violations and drug trafficking. And she would never have guessed that, like Samantha Smith who visited the Soviet Union when Leonid Brezhnev was in power, she was being used for propaganda purposes.

Next, look at all the stories in the media that tell us that American school children don't know where Panama is located. This little girl not only knew, but she visited there. Twice. Furthermore, she has, since this whole messy thing came out, expressed an interest in going back and learning about the country. While she says this, people in her hometown are telling us, on national TV, what a terrible brat she is and how they would deal with her if she were their child. Thank heavens, she is not. While I am not a great personal fan of Noriega, I am concerned about the polls broadcast on network TV that illustrate how American school children don't have the faintest idea where Saudi Arabia, Libya, and the Soviet Union are located. We all have a responsibility to be informed about our world, lest we accidentally decide to take a pleasure cruise on the Persian Gulf, or drive from Chicago to Buenos Aires by way of Nicaragua and El Salvador (something AAA does not suggest).



As for Noriega, following his trial, he may be traveling to Marion, Illinois, and to the prison that was built to replace Alcatraz. If he is sent to Marion, he will be joining the likes of John Walker, accused and convicted of espionage. One of the convicted members of the Medallin drug cartel is also in residence.

Marion is the highest security prison in the US. Inmates sleep on concrete slab beds, and are allowed out in the yard for two hours a day. They are not permitted to do knitting or oil painting. They are not permitted to have cellophane or aspirin. When walking down corridors, they wear handcuffs and sometimes leg cuffs. Outside, rolls of razor wire and guards with machine guns separate the prison from the rest of southern Illinois. Life will not be easy for the former General in Marion.

In the basement of the prison is a special group of cells. They have carpeting, nice furniture, typewriters, even pool tables. This is where John Walker lives. But like the souls condemned to Limbo, in Dante's Inferno, their punishment is just as harsh as anywhere else in the prison, they have no hope of ever leaving, they are threats to national security.

Noriega's hope for avoiding Marion, Illinois lies in being able to embarrass the president with CIA documents. Noriega was, after all, on the CIA payroll from the time he was a cadet at a military academy in Peru. He has met with the president more than once since President Ford appointed George Bush director of the CIA. What comes out in the trial could be very damaging to the president both at home and abroad. The court could decide that releasing confidential government records represents a threat to national security, and that they also have no bearing on the case.

George Bush was appointed Director of the CIA for the purposes of damage control. He knows how to protect himself and how to keep this issue from touching and damaging him. His current problem is patching up relations with Latin America. At least, he knows where that is.

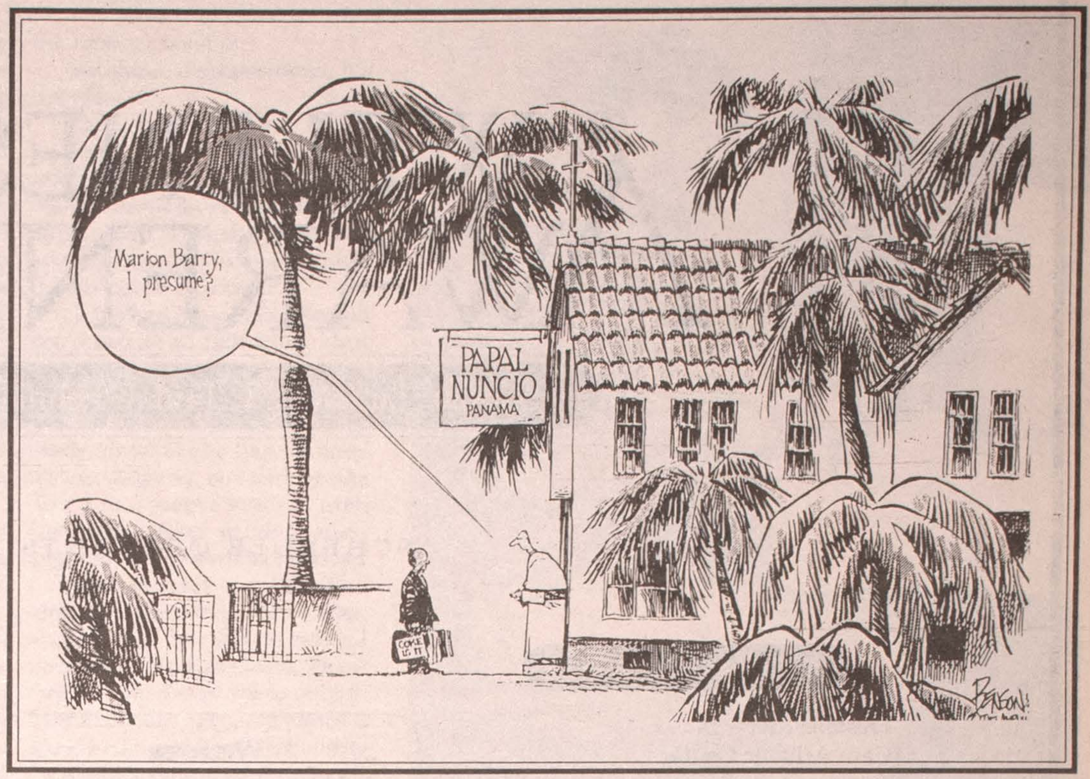
News from around the world: DC Mayor seeks treatment



UNITED STATES:

Washington, DC Mayor Marion Barry announced on Sunday he would seek treatment for his drug and alcohol addictions. Barry was arrested last week by FBI agents after purchasing crack in a sting operation. Barry handed the daily operations of the city over to the city administrator while he seeks drug rehabilitation. There is much speculation as to the possibility of Mayor Barry resigning his office or at least not seeking another term.

But the Mayor's problems may not end with drug treatment. The US attorney for Washington, DC suggested that further charges against the mayor may be forthcoming within the next month. These charges could include perjury, corruption involving city contracts, and drug-related conspiracy.

The arrest of Mayor Barry has brought the Reverend Jesse Jackson back into the news. Reverend Jackson moved to the District last fall from Chicago where he had been instrumental in the election of the late Mayor Harold Washington.

When Jackson first moved to the District, which had been in the news because of its high drug-related crime rate, the general expectation was that he would face Barry in the next mayoral election. But since then his attitude has apparently changed. Although he has not, at this time, commented on the Barry arrest, there is a feeling that he will not want to give up what he terms his "national leverage" and become mayor.

Reverend Jackson is currently working on a TV show. His plans include registering minorities to vote in the US, and travel abroad.

The office of the Vice President announced last week that Vice President Quayle would travel to Honduras and Panama later this month. The Vice President's trip was originally to have included Mexico and Venezuela, but their vocal criticism of the US invasion of Panama led the White House to drop them from the Vice President's itinerary. The White House is trying to arrange a meeting between the Vice President and the President of Venezuela, Carlos André Pérez.

In March, the Vice President will travel to Chile and Brazil to attend Presidential inaugurations in those countries. That trip could be expanded to include stops in Paraguay, Uruguay and Argentina. Quayle does not currently have plans to visit Costa Rica.

Miami Federal Judge William M. Hoeveler set the week of March 5 as the hopeful starting date for the trial of former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega.

This week, the court heard arguments for and against the releasing on bail of one of Noriega's co-defendants, Luis del Cid. Noriega's bail hearing is scheduled for next week. If del Cid is released on bail, lawyers for Noriega could use the same arguments. However, a federal judge has already denied bail to Eduardo Pardo, a pilot for the former Panamanian strongman, so it seems unlikely that Noriega will be released on bail.

In the meantime, the defense lawyers for Noreiga have indicated they will file requests for classified documents to use in his defense. Noreiga worked for the CIA for many years, including when President Bush was its director.

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously last week that states may charge sales tax on religious books and articles. The court upheld the decision of a California appeals court that decided the Jimmy Swaggart Ministries had to pay the sales tax on the sale of two million dollars of religious pamphlets, tapes, records, and other items. Swaggart argued before the Supreme Court that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion exempts religious organizations from paying sales taxes.

Swaggart also challenged the sales tax placed on his mail order goods. The Supreme Court refused to rule on the challenge since the appeals court had done the same.

SOVIET UNION:

In the southern soviet republic of Azerbaijan, violence continued between the Islamic Azerbaijanis and the Christian Armenians, and now between the Azerbaijanis and the Red Army. In Baku, the capital of Azerbaijan, military cadets clashed with the Soviet forces patrolling the city. The Kremlin has imposed a state of emergency on the republic, and sent the army to try and restore order. The presence of the army is, however, increasing the anti-Soviet feeling in this republic that recently announced it wants to be unified with Iran.

There is concern that Gorbachev will be unable to reestablish Soviet control in the area. Over the past year, Azerbaijan Communist party and republic leaders have become increasingly independent of Moscow, a move supported and encouraged by the nationalist movement called the Popular Front.

Soviet television has broadcast pictures from Azerbaijan of massive gatherings to protest military intervention. The media has also reported the continuing clashes between the army and Azerbaijani nationalists.

In a televised speech, Gorbachev lashed out at the Azerbaijani government and the Popular Front, and suggested that the threat of anarchy was his major concern.

The Popular Front was founded last July along the lines of the nationalist movements in the Baltic States. One of the major goals of the Front is Azerbaijan control of Nagorno-Karabakh, a region claimed by both Azerbaijan and Armenia.

The intervention of the army in Azerbaijan raises concerns about other nationalistic movements within the Soviet Union, including not only the Baltic States, but also the Ukraine, a major agricultural area.

Boris Yeltsin and other Soviet reformers have criticized the use of the army. Yeltsin supposedly told Japanese leaders during a recent visit to Tokyo that not only was it wrong to use the violence to suppress ethnic conflict but also warned that Gorbachev could fall from power shortly.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA:

Czechoslovakian President Vaclav Havel is planning to visit both Washington, DC and Moscow within the next few weeks. He is seeking the withdrawal of Soviet and American troops from eastern Europe. Havel is hoping to cut the Czechoslovakian defense budget by 30 percent, a move that could help the financially strained government.

Havel has also extended an invitation to Pope John Paul II to visit Czechoslovakia. The archbishop of Prague, Cardinal Frantisek Tomasek, announced on Saturday that the invitation had been accepted and the visit might take place at the end of April.

During his visit to Moscow, Havel is expected to insist on the severing of ties between the Czechoslovakian Security Service and the KGB. Havel declined to give dates for his upcoming trips.

IRAN:

A five member team is being sent to Iran by the UN to investigate charges of human rights violations. The team, led by Reynaldo Galindo Pohl, is to conduct the first on-site investigations of alleged human rights violations in Iran since the revolution in 1978.

Pohl received documents from an Iraqi-supported group, the Mujaheddin-e-Khalq, earlier this month that reportedly listed the names of 2000 Iranians executed for anti-government activities, as well as lists of thousands of political prisoners, hundreds of jails and torture centers and 30 mass grave sites.

CHINA:

The Chinese government published a 22 point press code aimed at tightening control of the foreign press in China. The code calls for foreign journalists not to "distort facts, create rumors or obtain interviews or reports through illegal means." The Chinese government blamed the foreign press for the world reaction to the crackdown and massacre of Chinese students last June. Following the massacre, two resident journalists and five correspondents who had been working on tourist visas were expelled. The new press code will allow the government to expel any journalist who breaks these rules and threatens "state interests."

The expelled journalists worked for Voice of America and were accused of violating martial law regulations by spreading rumors and propaganda.

is the term used to describe your potential for experiencing physical, mental, emotional, occupational, social, and intellectual well-being. Each of these areas affects the others. Viewing the six dimensions of wellness as interdependent emphasizes the importance of creating a balance in the many different areas that make up your being and your lifestyle to achieve an optimum level of health and vitality.

EMOTIONAL: emphasizes an awareness and acceptance of your feelings including the positive and enthusiastic feelings about your self and life, assessment of your limitations, development of autonomy, the ability to cope with stress, and maintaining satisfying relationships with others.

PHYSICAL: emphasizes flexibility, strength, and cardiovascular endurance through regular physical activity. Positive physical development includes knowledge about food and nutrition; encourages recreation, medical self-care, and appropriate use of the medical system; and discourages use of tobacco, alcohol, caffeine, and drugs.

INTELLECTUAL: encourages creative and stimulating mental activities. An intellectually well person uses the resources available to expand knowledge, improve skills, and increase the potential for sharing intellectual and cultural activities with others.

SPIRITUAL: involves seeking meaning and purpose in human existence, appreciating the natural forces in the universe, and developing a strong sense of personal values and ethics.

SOCIAL: encourages contributing to the human and physical environment for the common welfare, emphasizing interdependence with others and nature and the pursuit of harmony with family, community and nature.

OCCUPATIONAL: involves preparing for work in which you will gain personal satisfaction and find enrichment, developing a positive attitude about your work, and creating a pleasant, fulfilling environment in the workplace.

The underground world of broadcasting

by Raphael Koster

Let us venture into a deep, dark and deadly realm of addiction. Come with me and witness the frightening power of the most psychologically addictive activity on the campus: BroadCast.

It seems so innocent on the face of it—a simple and easy to use method of communication, allowing any computer to talk to any other connected to the network. Well, it's the simple ideas that get abused (sex comes to mind as another example...), and as usual, it is overuse that is the most common type of abuse. Do you know someone who spends inordinate amounts of time at a computer? Does your friend, lover, spouse and/or pet continually talk about acquaintances with names sounding like a cross between Playboy and Saturday morning cartoons? Then you may know someone suffering from this awful addiction.

What are the symptoms? How can you save your loved ones from this dread disease? Read on!

Case Study #1: "The Shadow": well known on BroadCast as a trickster, a nefarious person delighting in maintaining absolute secrecy about who and what he was, The Shadow recently told me he has quit BroadCast, going cold turkey over the break. Whether this decision, like most New Year's resolutions, vanishes by February is as yet undetermined (because it isn't February yet). But the prognosis is not good.

As The Shadow described his life with BroadCast, a frightening picture emerged...Calling himself a BroadCast ex-junkie, he decried how "people spend more time on BroadCast than they do on homework, classwork, social life." This is a common symptom of B'Cast junkies. They hole up in their room or in the library, never venturing forth except to eat or maybe go to class. Their lunchtime conversations revolve around who they tricked into saying what.

The secrecy aspect is very important on BroadCast, because each person enters a false name or "handle" (to use CB terminology). One of the preferred games on BroadCast is to figure out exactly whom you are talking to. Misdirection, evasiveness, and a general attitude of sneakiness therefore can characterize the B'Cast junkie, because he or she has a desperate need to remain secret. One of the greatest joys of the junkie is to realize the person one is talking to thinks you are someone else. The Shadow confesses that this has happened to him often. Poor fellow!

BroadCast is ridiculously simple to use. It hides under the apple in the top left corner of your Mac screen. A little list of names appears, and you can talk to any one of them. There is also a list of so-called "zones"—the areas you can talk to. Beware! For some areas are dangerous.

Dormitories, Computing Center, and Miller LIbrary are well-known as dens of addicts. Often poor students who are bravely trying to write a paper in the Library have discovered the prior user of their start-up disk was a junkie, and have been inundated with awful, insulting, invasive messages like "Hi, Aphrodisiac Angel! How was Annapolis? Did you [censored] after all?" Ryder Daniels, senior and Computing Center employee, reports many students have been practically in tears after losing pages of work when a message came in and crashed the machine.

Well, take heart, all of you who are innocent victims of invasive messages! Never again! From now on, when you turn on the computer the first thing you should do is check something called the "receiver." The receiver should be set in the "off" position. Then, you, the "user," will be unavailable to those trying to "reach you." You will find no more "bombs" appearing and destroying your homework. Never again will you be propositioned by a junior in Worcester unless you really want to be, and turn the receiver back on.

Speaking of propositions, it's time for...

Case study #2: "Skip Maxwell": An unrepentant, unreformed junkie, Skip has been on Broadcast since December of 1988. Here is a testimony to the power of the libido when under the influence of B'cast:

"It took an hour before I could get someone to talk to me, but when I did it was [name withheld] in Minta Martin. I was still a naive freshman, and so I was not ready for what she had planned for me. Anyway, she told me she was a prospective student from Colorado. After sending messages to her for a while, I told her I wanted to meet her. She had already figured out who I was, and told me to come to second floor Minta Martin. Well, like a fool, I rushed over there only to hear about forty giggling voices. I stood in the middle of the hallway for about a minute before I realized what had happened: I had been set up by the entire Alpha Chi hall."

Again, another example of how powerful Broadcast can be—despite this dreadful experience, Skip is till a user and shows no signs of reforming.

Many people refuse to admit how much BroadCast has them in its deadly grip. While gathering research for this article, an open letter was sent to every student who had a computer mailbox. Many of them are known to be junkies. Few replied. Denial is the first stage of addiction! Tales like the above are not uncommon at all, for sting operations are one of the favorite activities of 'Casters. Posing as the opposite sex is also frequent (for purposes of disguise only, hopefully).

The counterculture of Broadcast includes such facets as icon thieves, hackers with tracing programs, pun or quote battles, and one-night stands.

While space precludes my going into all of these here, let me just mention that the last has enjoyed a continuing popularity as the ultimate form of blind date.

What is perhaps worse is when things come out into the open...

Case Study #3: "Anonymous": Anonymous has used zillions of names in the past. Perhaps her biggest problem on B'Cast is that people always seem to know who she is...As she tells the story, she was 'Casting to some guys in the Computing Center that she happened to know would be there. She liked one of them, and hoped to talk to that one. Unfortunately, she fell prey to the most common mistake in B'Casting: getting the wrong person. After confessing her affection to the wrong person while the right person looked over his shoulder, she then had to sit through the embarrassment of realizing that they knew who she was! All through dinner, she reports, they kept "looking at her."

And did this shameful experience cure her? No! She is a victim of BroadCast, just like approximately 20% of this campus. Junkies are all around you. Fear of them is so pervasive that the Literary House voted not to be hooked up to the network this year, worried about pestering messages like "So, are you the next Fitzgerald? (or Hemingway or Frost or Danielle Steel or whomever you choose)" Of course, this was from ignorance of the malaise. They could easily have used the simple trick given above, and freed themselves from B'Cast. Ignorance of the problem. Yes, indeed, that is the key to combating it. Imagine, people know so little about it that a junkie had to write this article.

A subtle guide to tripping the light fantastic

Brett Lankford

It's spring semester already, and once again that means it's time for formal dances and high-class receptions. Whether you're attending the Birthday Ball or some similar cotillion or just going out to a fancy dinner, you must be on your best behavior at all times. Proper etiquette is a very important part of making a good showing. I fully realize Miss Manners has dedicated her entire being to preaching good behavior, but here are a few do's and don'ts she may have missed over the years.

Some suggestions for men:

DO make an effort to comment on your date's appearance.

DON'T do this by saying "Hey babe, do you wear a 36D?"

DO pull out the chair for your date and allow her to sit down.

DON'T pull the chair out from under her just before she takes her seat.

DO offer to pay for the check at dinner.

DON'T look at the check and yell "Thirty-six bucks!! You better at least put out a little if I'm going to spend this much!"

DO attempt to show your date a unique and memorable time.

DON'T do this by putting her in the new wrestling hold you just learned while watching "Saturday Night's Main Event".

DO serenade your date with a wonderfully romantic song.

DON'T break into Rod Stewart's "Do Ya Think I'm Sexy" in an effort to seduce her.

DO act enthusiastic when you are first introduced to her parents.

DON'T give her father a "noogie" when you first meet him.

DO end the night by telling your date how ravishing her hair looks in the moonlight.

DON'T say "You know, when it's this dark out I can hardly see your dandruff."

And for the women:

DO make an effort to comment on your date's appearance.

DON'T do this by saying "Is that a toupee or is your hair just really silly-looking?"

DO mention how nice your date looks in his suit/tuxedo.

DON'T mention the $100 he had to spend to rent the thing for one night.

DO dazzle your date with your knowledge of unique dance steps.

DON'T interrupt a slow song by breaking into "The Hustle".

DO blow in his ear during a nice, romantic moment on the dance floor.

DON'T do this if you have a toothpick in your mouth.

DO ask your date if he's seen any good movies lately.

DON'T ask him if he's seen the film where some woman goes completely crazy at this major social function and kills her date with a Poulan power saw.

DO build up your date's ego by mentioning he looks like a movie star.

DON'T say "You look a lot like Curly!"

DO thank your date for a wonderful evening.

DON'T tell him you haven't had that much fun since your last visit to the gynecologist.

I hope I have been able to clarify any questions you may have about proper etiquette and higher culture. You now have no excuse if you turn a perfectly romantic evening into a complete disaster. I've done all I can - the rest is simply up to you.

Bowman resigns as soccer coach; Allen takes over

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Coach Tom Bowman resigned from his position of men's soccer coach two weeks ago. Assistant coach Peter Allen has been named as the head coach of the 1990 men's soccer team, and Bowman will remain in the program as assistant coach.

"The single biggest factor affecting my decision was the fact that the job required more time than I could provide," Bowman said recently. "Being the soccer coach had turned into a full-time, year-round job." Bowman is also a veterinarian, and he was unable to give coaching his round-the -clock attention. "Recruiting has become especially intense over the years, and I just wasn't in a position where I could spend as much time recruiting as coaches do at other schools."

Bowman made it a point to note that he was not leaving a sinking ship. "I think everyone would admit that right now the program is the strongest it has been in fifteen years. Our level of competition has gone way up. We lost to Greensboro in overtime, and they went on to finish number two in the nation. If a few different wrinkles had unfolded last year and we had received a few different breaks, the team may have had a tremendous season."

Bowman took over the head coaching position from Ed Athey at the beginning of the 1981 season. In his eight years as coach of the Shoremen, Bowman made a concerted effort to give his team a challenging schedule. This was never more evident than this past season, when Washington College faced Division I schools Delaware and Mount St. Mary's as well as Division III powerhouse Greensboro. Although the Shoremen finished the 1989 season with a somewhat disappointing 8-10 season, all but four players remain from that talented team.

Peter Allen is not promising any drastic changes now that he has taken over as the new head coach. All of his coaching experience has come under Bowman, and he and Bowman are very good friends. There will be some differences, however, and Allen says that this is a result of their different perspectives. "Dr. Bowman was a goalkeeper when he played, so as a coach he had a goalkeeper's perspective. I played out in the field, so I think I have a field player's perspective."

Allen's main philosophy involves the stressing of discipline. "I will stress discipline with the players, but mainly so they will respond as a unit and as a team instead of as individuals. With the type of players who come through the WC program, we have to play a team game."

Recruiting should be a new experience for Allen, who has spend the last eight years watching Bowman handle most of the recruiting. "I've seen Coach Bowman use a number of different strategies over the years, and it always pretty much turns out the same. We aren't recruiting at any particular position - we just need players. The key will be to get as many people interested as possible."

Allen's squad is already filled with a number of proven performers. "It's a plus to start as a coach with a Mike Bishop already in the program," Allen mentioned. "He's possibly the most talented soccer player I've ever encountered." Bishop is just one of many players returned from last year's squad, which many considered to be the most talented team in Washington College history.

The new coach is pleased with the tradition of Washington College soccer. "I like the fact that the program has been handed down from Coach Athey to Tom and now to me. It's almost as if we're keeping it in the family."

Peter Allen will add this head coaching position to his prestigious career in the world of soccer. After earning All-Metro honors at Edgewood High School, Allen came to Washington College in 1973 after spending a year at the University of Virginia. He then spent three years playing for the Shoremen, captaining the squad during his senior year. In 1981 he returned to Washington College as an assistant coach to Dr. Tom Bowman.

Bull scores 1000th

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Chris Jamke joined a select group of Washington College basketball players recently when he became the 21st player in school history to reach the 1000 point plateau. Jamke scored his 1000th point in a recent win over Catholic, and he was honored before last week's game against Johns Hopkins.

Jamke, affectionately nicknamed Bull, has proven to be a major force for Washington College this season. Bull has provided a consistent inside scoring punch to perfectly complement the team's frequent long-range bombs. He is presently averaging a shade under 20 points a game, and in addition averages ten rebounds for the Shoremen. The 6'5" senior has also been an inspiration to the WC basketball team with his feisty and energetic style of play.

Bull has really come into his own during the 1989-1990 season. He teamed with Tom Auvil to form a devastating 1-2 punch in the WC front court for his first three years. Auvil graduated last summer, and Jamke's experience became his key attribute when he was joined up front by a parade of underclassmen this fall. Tim Liddy, Darren Vican and Dan Dutton have all helped underneath, but Bull has clearly become the inside force coach Finnegan was hoping he would be in his final year.

Dr. Jock and the problems caused by steroid abuse

Just say no to steroid substitutes.

Dear Dr. Jock: I've been reading a lot lately about athletes taking steroids. I have been lifting weights for some time now WITHOUT taking steroids, but I'm sick and tired of watching others who haven't lifted as long as I have grow enormously big by taking steroids.

Now I see a flood of ads for products that are "natural alternatives" to steroids (Smilax, Gamma Oryzanol, GH Enhancers, etc.). I think I'm not the only one who would like to know if I should try these natural products, which cost a lot and might not work, or for the same cost go for the sure thing, risking the side effects. What's your opinion? – R.C., Niagara Falls, N.Y.

Dear Readers: In this matter, Dr. Jock's opinion is simple: Stay away from steroids, steroid substitutes, natural alternatives to steroids and all other products that promise to make you bigger and stronger by ingesting a pill, a powder or a special potion. They can be dangerous, addictive and damaging to your system.

Risks and temptation high. Why is it that so many people are still trying to buy enhanced speed, strength and athletic performance in a bottle? Olympic athlete Ben Johnson apparently did run faster after taking steroids. But look what it got him. No gold medal and a lot of attorney's fees. Of course, he's not alone. Many of the nation's (and world's) top athletes boost their performance with black market drugs. If the desire to cheat and risk your health is what you get from sports and fitness, you ought to give it up.

'Natural' alternatives are blind items. The new fad you mention is to market "natural alternatives" to steroids. You can buy these various substances at your favorite gym or health food store. Drugs prescribed by your doctor and sold in pharmacies and hospitals are regulated by the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA tries to make pharmaceutical manufacturers prove that the drugs are both safe and effective before they are allowed to market them to the public. Health food stores and gyms are not selling prescription drugs. There's no reliable way to know if the items they sell are safe or effective.

What are these wonder drugs? It's hard to tell how the product works just from reading the ads. Sometimes you're just buying megadoses of vitamins and minerals. Sometimes they are combinations of amino acids. Both are unnecessary if you're eating a well-balanced diet. Even if you're not, neither product will give you the added strength and power you're looking for.

Another popular combination claims to include small doses of hypothalamus and pituitary – sections of the brain that secrete hormones that regulate some important body functions. If you want to ingest part of some poor animal's brain, be our guest. But don't think it's going to make you stronger any more than eating some animal's heart is going to give you more courage.

Don't be a sucker. Sure, it's frustrating to watch other people take shortcuts to body-building. Too bad. Live with it. Don't be a sucker and waste your money on "natural steroid substitutes." If you want to improve your strength, work out harder, more often, with greater concentration than before. And don't worry so much about how the other guy is doing. The best competition in sports is the race you run against yourself. So be smart and do it WITHOUT steroids.

Dear Dr. Jock: I'm a TV football fan and can't help but notice how some of the guys take oxygen on the sidelines in between plays. My husband says it's a way for them to get some instant energy. Is that true? How does it work? – C.S. Arlington, VA.

Dear Readers: It may look impressive but, according to the most recent research, breathing 100 percent oxygen on the sidelines for a few minutes doesn't do much for a player physiologically. It's biggest benefit, it seems, is psychological. That is, a player believes that breathing the oxygen will help improve his performance on the field, and low and behold, it does.

Bringing the mind into play. There's nothing so unusual about that. All of us know that sports performance is a combination of physical and psychological factors. The more you can bring your mind into play, the better your performance can be. If players believe that breathin supplemental oxygen is helpfu in boosting performance, then may very well be. It certain won't harm them. Indeed, at an stressful point in life, taking few moments to sit quietly a breath deeply is quite helpf We could all benefit greatly fo that.

Basketball leading MAC with 4-0 conference record

y Matt Giller

To recap the last month and a alf of Shoremen basketball, we ave seen some odd things. We itnessed two 100+ games from ie Shoremen, a loss to a team iey beat last season by scoring)3 points, and a not-so-strange ss to UMBC. The team is in the iver's seat with a 4-0 record in ie Middle Atlantic Conference, id the Shoremen raised their erall record to 12-3.

On December 5 the Shore-en traveled to Gallaudet Uni-rsity. Although Gallaudet is sually an easy "W" for WC, the horemen struggled to a 79-78 ctory in D.C. The team then ished the fall semester at the citing Wild Goose Classic. The horemen continued their Ming-ke dynasty in their own tourna-ent. Northeastern Bible Col-ge (who, incidentally, don't actly tear up the "Bible-school ur) came to the eastern shore play WC in the first round and ceived a good old-fashioned atholic school whippin', 104-). Needless to say, the bench t some playing time and made e most of it. In fact, they itscored the opponent 50 to 49, l by freshmen Phillip Carr, Bill eber and Peter Basel. The three shmen scored ten, eight and ven points respectively.

Washington finished off the urney with a solid 90-73 vic-ry over Hunter College from Y.C. This once again earned e Shoremen the championship ophy of their own tournament. these less-than-quality teams ntinue to be invited to the urnament interest will wane id the tourney will have to be named the Lame Duck.

After an abbreviated winter eak the basketball team was lcomed into the new decade th a 77-71 defeat at the hands Gettysburg. The Shoremen id defeated Gettysburg the evious year with a 103 point ort, but they were never able to t untracked in their first game er thelayoff. WC responded to e defeat just two days later in a ad game against Catholic. The am celebrated Chris Jamke's 00th point by producing an -78 victory to end their brief e game losing streak.

Their next game took them up UMBC on January 11th. IBC schedules the Shoremen for the same reason we schedule Hunter - for the "W". That is exactly what WC gave them, losing the game 96-78. Seniors Tim Keehan and Chris "Squirrel" Brandt still managed to shine with 19 and 18 points.

If you arrived back to school early for the Salisbury State game, you were treated to a rare game where the team with 111 points still lost. The Shoremen sloppily sprinted to a 128-111 win over their eastern shore rivals. The WAC was powered by an amazing 67% field goal shooting performance, led by Keehan and Brandt with 34 and 32 respectively.

With school back in session, the Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins flew into Cain Gymnasium only to have their feathers plucked. This rivalry has seen many bizarre events, but few could compare to the strange happenings in this game. The contest was extremely close for 40 minutes, and Brandt tied the score on a free throw with 14 seconds left. After a missed shot by Hopkins, a scramble for the loose ball ensued. Squirrel gained control of the ball at midcourt with only two ticks left on the clock, but for some unexplained reason the opponent senselessly fouled Brandt 40 feet from the basket. The referee called an intentional foul, sending Brandt to the foul line for two shots plus possession of the ball. Brandt hit both free throws and the Shoremen sealed up the most important victory of the season thus far. The WAC managed to win despite shooting a measly 37% in the second half.

The Shoremen tried to carry the momentum into another game at Cain last Saturday against a much improved Swarthmore squad. The WAC seem to enjoy playing in tight games, keeping this game close before managing to eke out a 71-65 win at home. The team was led Brandt and Jamke with 21 and 19 respectively. After two back-to-back conference victories, the Shoremen traveled to Pennsylvania to try to blow out Ursinus. This team presented problems for the WAC last season, defeating the Shoremen in three straight games. This game was close all the way as the Shoremen had to play much of the first half without three of their starters. Squirrel poured in 29 in the game and Tank Duckett added 22 for the team. The Shoremen scored their last 11 points from the foul stripe to defeat Ursinus 85-79. This improved their conference record to four wins without a loss.

The Shoremen's most consistent player over the last ten games has been Chris Jamke. In the last month, Bull not only scored his 1000th point but entered the Ursinus game leading the team in points per game(19.9) and rebounds per game(10.1). Chris Brandt is also closing in on the 1000 point mark, and Squirrel has been one of the keys to the team's success this season.

The team continues their busy schedule with a series of road games over the next week. They play three consecutive games on the road, taking on the likes of Swarthmore, Haverford and St. Mary's. The Shoremen then return to Cain Gymnasium for a game against Western Maryland on Thursday, February 1st.

Swim team remains undefeated

by Greg Coss

By the end of last Saturday's tri-meet involving Washington College, Lycoming and Juniata College, the Shorewomen were standing undefeated and were off to their best start in years. The victory over these two teams lifted the WC record to 8-0, and this was an impressive performance following their emotional 132-126 victory over Elizabethtown the Saturday of final exam weekend. The Shorewomen were able to maintain their composure and avoid a letdown despite their long layoff over the holidays.

The victory was another outstanding team effort, with no individual standouts. Samantha Streamer took the 100 and 200 yard freestyle events, putting Washington College off to a good start. The 200 yard medley relay was won by the quartet of Karen Brady, Brigid Ferris, Amy Capone and Vicki Carroll, while the 200 yard free relay was captured by Karen Brady, Leslie Newcombe, Samantha Streamer and Vicki Carroll. The success of the relay teams is extremely good news for WC and could help lead them to an undefeated regular season.

Kasey Carroll pointed out the significance of the solid WC victories. "I think the team has a really good chance to do well at the MAC's. We could move up in the rankings a lot this year. This team has a lot of depth. I'm really looking forward to the MAC's." Kasey Carroll also gave her usual excellent performance in the meet, winning the 200 butterfly, 500 freestyle and the 1000 freestyle events. Carroll is also planning three more attempts at possible qualification times for the NCAA Division III 1650 meter freestyle event.

Amy Capone also continued up her winning ways, capturing the 200 yard breaststroke. Brigid Ferris and Vicki Carroll performed well in the 200 yard backstroke to close the events and solidify an easy Washington College victory at the tri-meet. The meet against York that was scheduled for last Tuesday was canceled, an occurrence that didn't seem to bother the women. "I didn't feel like going that far for a meet anyway," Amy Capone admitted, "we're really tired and we certainly need the rest."

In place of the canceled York meet, the coaches have scheduled an intramural meet to help warm the team up as well as relax them. Coach Kim Lessard likes to give the team a chance to swim in a competition style meet without the pressure. After the tight victories WC has managed against Widener and Elizabethtown, the intramural meet should help the Shorewomen. "We compete against each other while swimming in events that we don't normally swim in," Kasey Carroll explained. "It should be relaxing and a lot of fun."

There are only three meets left in the WC regular season. Lebanon Valley and Western Maryland are the next two meets on the schedule. They close out the year with their most difficult challenge of them all, a dual meet against Ursinus and Franklin & Marshall. After that the Shorewomen move on to the MAC's, where WC looks to be very impressive this year. Regardless of what happens the rest of the year, it's already been a storybook season for the Shorewomen.

Clarke addresses the future of the Democratic Party

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

Baltimore City Council President Mary Pat Clarke, who believes that "we have a generation of talent that has not been encouraged " will speak in the Sophie Kerr Room next Tuesday afternoon on "The Future of the Democratic Party."

Clarke, mother of Washington College sophomore Jennifer, predicts a bright future for the Democratic party: "Democrats and republicans take turns having control. Now, it's time for the democrats to take a turn."

"Getting a president elected is the major issue [for the Democratic Party]," explains Clarke, "we have control of the Senate in Congress, but we need control of the White House."

President Clarke believes self-improvement should be stressed in the US: "We need to restore pride in ourselves and our work.".

Not only does Clarke believe in finding jobs for the unemployed and helping welfare recipients back on their feet, she emphasizes the importance of getting youth involved in government.

"Their real job is to go out and run a nation," reasons Clarke. "The ideal for the Democratic Party is to reach out to young people and take the chance of young people joining in the leadership."

Yet there is one particular problem in the party, according to Clarke, which is "at the moment, it does not have a clear leader. We were blessed to have dynamic leaders like Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy who inspired us to believe Americans could do anything, but," she concedes, "we are lacking that type of leadership."

Although that lack of leadership does exist, scrutiny of Maryland's current political leaders does provide possible inspirational figures, including Governor William Donald Schaefer, US Senator Barbara Mikulski and in the distant future, Baltimore's Mayor Kurt Schmoke.

Clarke describes Schaefer as an "ideal democratic candidate for the presidency," emphasizing that fact that although he is conservative money-wise, he is liberal in the advancement of people. "He has a middle-of-the-road political thinking," she explains.

Another people-oriented democrat who has already established herself as an influential politician is Senator Mikulski. Points out Clarke, "She cares about people and knows that the success of the country depends upon giving people a future."

To Clarke, both Schaefer and Mikulski have "demonstrated that they aren't going to bankrupt voters, but that they will help people to become upwardly mobile."

As for Mayor Schmoke, Clarke says in reference to recent publicity on his stance to legalize drugs, "I admire the fact that he wanted to start a national debate....it took a lot of courage. He opened up discussion and people looked at the issue with fresh eyes."

In terms of state politics, Clarke says, "We're still trying to figure how best to make our influence." Currrent party efforts involve generating revenue in order to help democratic candidates preparing for election campaigns.

Serving two terms of four years each on the Baltimore City Council before losing a 1983 election, Clarke worked as a geriatrics administrator for Johns Hopkins School of Medicine until 1987, when she was elected city-wide as president of the city council.

With a BA in English Literature form Emmaculate College in Philadelphia and an MA in the same area from University of Pennsylvania, Clarke taught undergraduate composition at Johns Hopkins University and University of MD Baltimore County between 1983 and 1987. Currently, she is working towards her Ph.D. from Penn's Graduate School of Education.

Clarke's accomplishments as Baltimore City Council President include helping to draft and pass legislation to require tenants' right of first refusal to purchase the homes in which they reside; to create a Baltimore City Women's Commission; to phase out massage parlors, a "blighting influence in downtown neighborhoods," and to provide priority seating for elderly and disabled on public transit vehicles.

Clarke, describing herself as a "parent, educator and elected official who admires Washington College, especially for its emphasis on writing," will begin her lecture "The Future of the Democratic Party" Tuesday at 4PM in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library. Admission is free.

Concert review:

Joel storms the Capital Centre

by Clay Eichelberger

Billy Joel's January 10th performance at the Capital Centre in Landover, Maryland, was a delight for both the audience and, clearly, for the performer himself. Joel, touring in support of his Top-Ten album Storm Front, performed for two hours and twenty minutes a set that was a mixture of old and new Joel songs, with a few rock oldies thrown in for good measure.

The concert, which had no opening act, opened with the title track of his new album and continued with a few of Joel's early songs such as "Angry Young Man" and the lesser-known "Miami 2017." Throughout the set, Joel seemed to prefer fast-paced rockers like "You May Be Right" to slower songs like "Honesty" or "She's Always a Woman," both classic Joel songs excluded from the set. This kept the show moving, and the audience seemed to appreciate it; when the band kicked off the opening notes to Joel's recent Number One hit, "We Didn't Start the Fire," the crowd's reaction was deafening.

Every so often, though, Joel and the band did a slow song or two to let themselves (and the audience) catch their breath. One of the earliest of these was "Leningrad," a song from Storm Front which he composed during his stay in the USSR. Introducing the song from behind his trademark Ray Charles sunglasses, Joel explained that the story the song tells is true; that the Russian clown he met and became friends with gave him a new perspective on US/Soviet relations. "For me," he explained, "the Cold War ended in 1987." The social consciousness present in this song was carried over into another song from the new album, "Downeaster Alexa," about the plight of the struggling commercial fishermen on the Long Island Sound, and into his earlier song "Goodnight Saigon," his ode to the Vietnam veterans.

Joel never allowed the serious subject matter of those songs to interfere with the sheer fun of the concert. At one point, he launched into an impromptu medley of three oldies: "Spanish Harlem," "Stand By Me," and a terrific rendition of Sam Cooke's "Another Saturday Night," before continuing with his 1983 hit "An Innocent Man." He seemed to be in a nostalgic mood that night, bringing the house down with a great performance of the Isley Brothers' "Shout," which he reprised after his singing his own "Uptown Girl."

Whenever he wasn't seated at a keyboard, Joel kept moving; at one point even doing a back flip off the top of his baby grand, and clearly having a great time.

By the end of the show, however, he was just as obviously tired, and many members of the audience were happily surprised when he returned to the stage for his second encore, a show-stopping performance (literally) of what is perhaps his best-known song, "Piano Man." This song was incredible, with Joel remaining silent during the choruses while the crowd sang. When the song was over, he thanked the audience and closed with his usual parting remark: "Don't take any shit from anybody." Certainly none was taken that night, for none was given—just good music by a good musician who still, after all these years, insists that he is just a piano player.

Clay Eichelberger is a life-long fan of Billy Joel majoring in drama.

Coffee House preview: bands & posters

by Ryder Daniels

Welcome back in the New Year! The Coffee House is offering a diverse set of activities in the next several weeks. Check out your Special Events Calendar, the Dining Hall and the Mail Room to see what's happening. If you did not receive a calendar in your dorm, or if you live off-campus and you would like one, stop by the Coffee House any weekday from 9 am to midnight.

This Friday and Saturday, January 26 & 27 we kick-off Double-Header LIVE Weekend at the Coffee House.

On Friday night, starting at 9 o'clock, is the Bill Dicey Blues Band from Annapolis playing electric dance blues, fast and slow. Dicey, who plays harmonica and guitar in the band, is considered one of the foremost harmonica players on the blues scene today. Other members of the band include: Joe Dicey on lead guitar, Brian Bader on bass, Hal Squire on drums and vocals from Denise Dicey. Bill Dicey has been playing for over thirty years and promises to put on a great show.

On Saturday night, starting at 9 o'clock we welcome back Washington College's own Plaid Rabbit playing rock and roll, old and new. Members of that band include: Chris Premo on lead guitar, W.C. Alumni Tom Hopkins on bass, Mark Harfeld on keyboards, Andy Chandler on sax, Dave Harfeld on guitar and dazzling vocals from junior Felicia Shakman.

Looking ahead, Monday, January 29 is Wellness Week at W.C. On Tuesday at 12 noon in the Coffee House John Ferber is giving a lecture on exercises for the lower back. Wednesday is Substance-Free Day, so please try not to eat, drink or breathe anything. Wednesday night, Mike Macielag, President of Chesapeake Bank and Trust and non-alcoholic beer drinker, will be on campus in the Coffee House from 9-10 pm giving free taste tests of every non-alcoholic beer you can think of so you can be the judge.

The Coffee House and the Bookstore get together on Thursday and Friday, February 1 &2 to bring a Super Poster Sale to campus. Trent Graphics Corporation will bring hundreds of posters & prints of every kind to the Coffee House on sale from 11 am until 7 pm and you can charge them on your bookstore bill if you wish. Put something new on your walls this semester!

More live entertainment for Thursday Night, February 1: W.C. favorite Tom Larsen returns starting at 9 pm.

In addition to our upcoming scheduled events, as always we welcome and appreciate any and all suggestions, criticisms and contributions, especially from off-campus students, to make the Coffee House someplace you would like to spend some free time. The Coffee House is your place. Without student support, we don't have a place. So make the effort to come in and see what's going on. Try something new.

Remember, no inflation from last year: Coffee House LIVE entertainment is the cheapest around, $2 at the door, a great way to get together with some friends and some live music. We'll see you this weekend.

Security busy over break

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College administration and staff were not alone over semester break, despite the fact that students were absent from campus.

An unidentified black male, who had apparently been staying in the newly christened Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center during night hours, was sighted and chased on January 8, according to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security. He escaped.

Initially, Roderick received a report from a contractor working for Arena Construction that they suspected someone was staying in the Creative Arts Center at night.

On the 8th, Sergeant Lenny Thompson observed a black male in the area of the Creative Arts Center. Suspecting that he may have already gained entrance into the building, Thompson contacted Security Officer Sommerville. Sommerville conducted a check of the outside of the building and Thompson of the inside.

According to Roderick, the intruder was inside the Center, he "quickly exited and a chase ensued."

Officer Sommerville was able to "grab ahold of the suspect...they both fell. The suspect got up and continued to run." Sommerville then proceeded to grab the suspect's jacket, which the suspect "managed to get out of and keep running. He ran several blocks."

The Security officers' efforts were fortunately not in vain when on inspection of the jacket several items were discovered which had been stolen from the downtown area.

The Chestertown Police are currently investigating the incident.

Several items were also stolen from a room in Kent House over break.

Security is currently investigating that incident as well.

Said Roderick, "Break is our most vulnerable time so we take extra precautions to make sure the buildings are secure."

Recycling Plan in action

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

The Recycling Plan, a joint venture between students and the administration which was proposed last semester, is now underway, according to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects.

Maintenance recently placed special containers in most of the dormitories and central dumping facilities outside for recyclable aluminum cans. Eventually, there will be recycling containers on each floor in each dorm.

Paper is also a source for recycling at Washington College. All offices use white paper, which is recyclable, and all offices have bins for its collection.

All students and staff are required to do is deposit the proper material in the proper place. Aluminum should be deposited in specially marked cans and white paper in specially marked boxes. Individuals are asked to be careful not to put other trash in with the recyclable items. The Infinity Recycling Company will collect both the Aluminum and the paper each week.

Baer stated that this only an initial effort. The project may be expanded depending on the success of current efforts.

That success however depends on student and staff cooperation. Steve Attias, Student Government President and one student coordinator of the plan, stated, "This has to be a student effort...We need to get this going as quickly and effectively as possible."

James Finlay, another student coordinator, reiterated the point, citing individual responsibility. He stated that "there is no reason not to do it because the cans are right there."

Finlay also commented on one reason for the Student Government to sponsor such a project: they will collect the generated funds. Said Finlay, "I don't know how much money is involved. The exact figures haven't been nailed down yet."

Accident

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

On Monday, January 15, a Washington College student was seriously injured in a car accident approximately fifteen minutes away from campus on Route 554. Freshman Francoise Gavigan is currently listed as critical in shock trauma at University Hospital in Baltimore.

Gavigan and her sister, Christian, were driving a Cabriolet convertible on route 554 when they were hit on passenger side. Their car rolled two to three times. The cause of the accident is undetermined.

Gavigan suffered injuries to her head as well as a broken pelvis. Her sister suffered only minor back problems.

Friends and family are hopeful of Gavigan's recovery.

Her parents ask for the College community's support through prayer.

through construction. That will cause less disturbance to the construction. The good news is that it's almost over."

Workmen are preparing to pour the concrete for the plaza in front of the Fine Arts Center. Brickwork,, a new terrace, and new steps will soon be completed.

All of the exterior work on the Academic Resources Center is almost finished. Several departments will move there: Admissions, the Bookstore, and Student Affairs. In addition, the Center will contain a a central forum, seminar rooms, and a multi-media meeting room.

The Heath Center was renovated over break. Walls were repainted, a new examining room was built, and new carpet and furnishings were installed.

Students may also have noticed the small green pedestals along Washington Avenue. According to the administration they mark where underground cable service is to be installed from College Lane to Campus Avenue. In the next few weeks, the executive council will review a proposal for complete restoration of service.

Following the retirement of Bill Coleman, former Supervisor of Buildings and Grounds, Marriot and Service Master are both conducting audits of Washington College facilities. The two will submit proposals to provide Housecleaning and Maintenance services for management only. Baer stressed that current employees will remain in their jobs. The administration is considering several other applicants for Coleman's position.

Fire

According to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, Resident Assistant Jason Ebrite noticed the odor of smoke in the second floor north hallway of Kent. Upon investigation, Ebrite discovered that the source of the smoke was a couch in Room 219. Student Dave Littleton assisted the RA in his check of the room. The occupants were not present.

The Fire Department was immediately alerted. They responded and extinguished the couch with no apparent damage to the room or building. "The couch itself was obviously destroyed," said Roderick.

According to procedure, the Fire Marshall investigated and ruled the fire accidental, due to careless smoking.

Roderick commended Ebrite. "The RA deserves a lot of credit for his initiative. He saved a lot of property, nobody was displaced, and damage was minimal."

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

The W.C.D.S. events calendar for the next few weeks will be as follows:

Sunday, January 28th, Super Bowl Dinner
Tuesday, January 30th, WELLNESS EXPO - in Hynson Lounge
Wednesday, January 31st, J.P. BROKERAGE FOOD SHOW
Sunday, February 4th, "Eye Opener" Brunch Buffet
Wednesday, February 7th, Chinese New Year's Dinner
Wednesday, February 14th, Valentine's Day Dinner

Wellness information: This being the cold and flu season, I am reminded of an article I read in Tufts Diet and Nutrition Letter, November 1988. Have you ever felt cold while everyone in the room is perfectly comfortable? It may be a lack of iron in your diet. In a study at the Department of Agriculture's Human Nutrition Research Center in Grand Forks, North Dakota, a group of women who were put on low iron diets for 2-1/2 months lost almost 30% more body heat while sitting in a drafty room than they did after their iron stores were replenished. In addition, the women were able to tolerate the cold for slightly longer periods of time when they were given adequate amounts of iron.

You do not have to be suffering from iron-deficiency anemia to respond poorly to the cold. even a relatively mild deficiency can increase the likelihood of experiencing chills and shivers, which is reason enough for everyone to make an effort to follow a diet that supplies adequate amounts of iron. That means including lean meats, fish, poultry, dried beans and enriched grain products on a regular basis. To best absorb the iron in these foods, especially the beans and grains, eat them with a food enriched with Vitamin C, such as orange juice or tomato sauce.

A reminder for board students who attend classes during the lunch hour or who are student teaching or doing internship in Annapolis can order box lunches to go. Just contact a supervisor, give him/her your request (must be 24 hours in advance). Your order will be prepared and ready for you to pick up at the designated time.

Did you know the WCDS is offering five (5) lunch or five (5) dinner meal tickets? The meal tickets have been designed for students who live off campus. These tickets entitle you to select any five (5) lunches or any five (5) dinners from January 15 through May 11, 1990. The cost of the FIVE LUNCH TICKET is $20.00 and the cost of the FIVE DINNER TICKET is $30.00.

You may purchase these money saving meal tickets from the Business Office from now until Friday, May 4, 1990. (These tickets may be charged to your college account.) Once you have purchased the ticket, all you have to do is present it to the cashier each time you come to the dining hall for a meal. It is that simple! And you can enjoy the convenience of an all-you-can-eat meal with your friends plus a wide variety of nutritious foods and fast service in a clean environment.

These are but a couple of the services the W.C.D.S. provides to board students and non-board students.

I guess that is it for another week.
Until next time...MOM

Logo Contest for Wellness Week and Lifetime Fitness

The President's Advisory Council on Lifetime Fitness announces a contest to design a LOGO to kick off Washington College's Wellness Week and the College's focus on Wellness. The LOGO will be used to highlight all activities at the College which are associated with Fitness. The design of the LOGO should incorporate the six elements of Wellness: spiritual, occupational, social, intellectual, physical and emotional.

All members of the Washington College community are eligible to submit an entry. The LOGO can be hand-drawn or computer-enhanced. Prize for the best LOGO is a $25.00 gift certificate at the Washington College Bookstore. Judging will be done by members of the Fitness Council. Deadline for submission is March 1, 1990.

Entries should be sent to Dean Edward Maxcy in the Student Affairs Office.

Mayor Elmer E. Horsey recently announced, during the course of his State of the Town Address Monday, January 22, plans to work with Washington College on two major projects in 1990. They include building public basketball and tennis courts and removing the water tower from campus grounds.

When he reviewed the decade, Horsey mentioned Washington College and the success of at least one joint endeavor, the Mayor's Scholarship Program, initiated in 1986.

After addressing the eighties, Horsey looked toward future goals.

One project involves the College and Program Open Space in creating outdoor basketball and tennis courts. They would be open to the public and built on College-owned property.

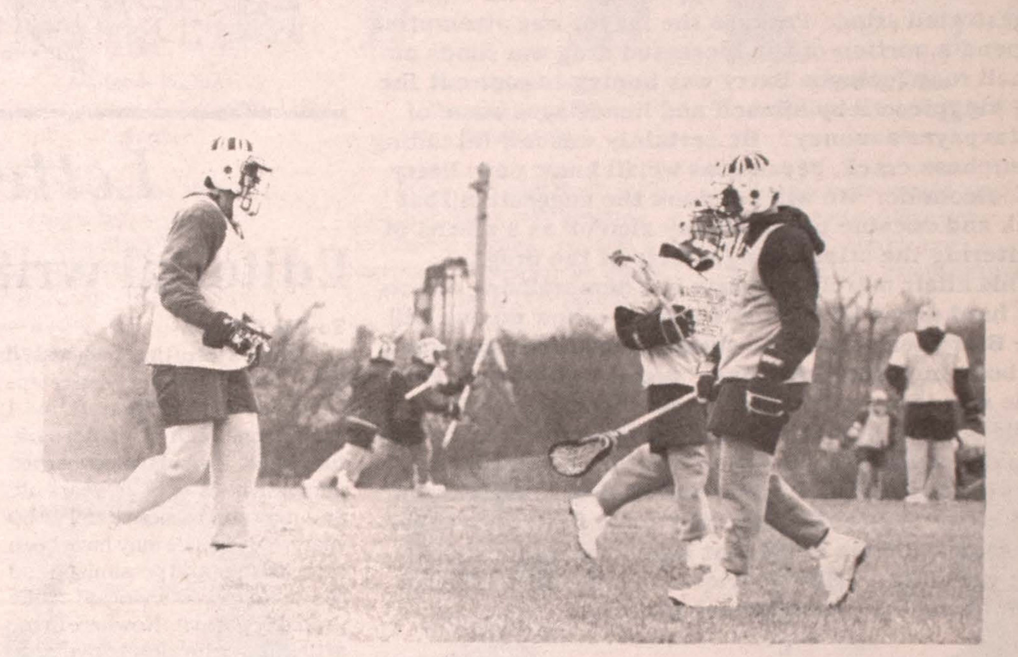
Other plans involve cooperation between the town and College to remove the water tower and to construct a new 100,000 gallon elevated water storage facility at another undisclosed location.

Though the tower appears to be on College property, the town actually owns it. According to Senior Vice President for Management and Finance Gene Hessey, Washington College granted Chestertown an easement in order that they might build the tower.

Therefore, "we do need to negotiate with the town. It's their property."

Washington College President Douglass Cater confirmed the College's cooperation with Chestertown on both projects. He recently stated that a proposal has been submitted and is currently being reviewed by the office of the mayor.

"The Board Executive Committee has considered this and has responded to the mayor's proposals. We are now waiting on the mayor eagerly."



Despite the fact that their first game is almost a month away, Lacrosse practice is already in full swing.

SGA meeting report:

Neiman to run for president

by Kyndra Ponder

Tracey Coleman, SGA Vice President was the first of the officers to speak at last week's student government meeting. She reported on the changes before the Student Academic Board (SAB) on the Senior Thesis. Coleman stated that as of now, the only information to appear on a student's transcript is his degree, the date of completion, honors that the student has received, and the student's SAT verbal and math scores.

Coleman has worked to have an additional piece of information about the senior thesis on the transcript.

If her proposal is accepted by the faculty, seniors will have a place on their transcript informing prospective employers and graduate school admissions offices about their thesis. In addition, the it will tell whether the thesis has recieved any college or departmental honors. In order for this year's seniors to benefit from the proposal, the faculty will have to approve it by February 5.

In addition, Coleman would like to see a more complete explanation of the senior thesis in the Student Handbook.

Kevin Kelly, who is working with the Social Committee, reported that the SGA will attempt to have more big-name bands appear at Washington College this year.

Bill Kerbin, Chairman of the Honor Code Committee reported that the revisions to the Honor Code are still before the Student Affairs Committee. He added that he has received a lot of positive feedback both from the faculty and from students regarding the Honor Code.

Jim Finlay, Chairman of the Recycling Committee then updated the SGA on the recycling efforts. He noted that a letter would be sent to all students reminding them of the recycling drive and asking for student support.

Other committee members noted that there had been some controversy among the students regarding the destination of the proceeds from the drive. The committee wishes to assure all students that the money coming from the recycling effort will go DIRECTLY to the SGA and will not be channelled through another office on campus.

Freshman class President, Gordy Scherer presented the Inter-Club Council Constitution to the SGA for their approval. He stated that the sole purpose of the ICC will be to serve as a liason between clubs on campus and not to control any of the various independent functions of the clubs. The ICC received full support from the SGA.

SGA President Attias announced that Clint Baer will be having an open forum regarding the Hodson Hall Renovations. A date has not been announced.

Senator, Beth-Ann Sheppard proposed an ammendment for the SGA Constitution. Article VI, Section III of the Constitution presently states that no one is eligable to be a candidate for a campus election if they are not a member of the SGA. In order to aviod confusion, Sheppard has proposed that the section be changed to state that no person may be a candidated for an executive SGA position if they are not a full-time student at Washington College. The proposed

PCB worries almost over

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

What has been called the Washington College PCB "scandal" is quickly drawing to a close due to conscientious effort on the part of the administration.

According to an attorney for the EPA, fines are often reduced when the offender complies and cooperates with the EPA.

The college was warned to remove all transformers by May of 1990. It is February, 1990, a full three months ahead of time, and every transformer has been removed.

In addition, well over the amount of the fine was spent in removing and replacing transformers. Though no administrator is ready to comment on the amount spent, Gene Hessey anticipated last year that it would cost $300,000.

College officials, President Cater among them, expect the issue to wind down after the Executive Committee meeting on February 8. The EPA attorney stated that they expect to settle with the College in the next thirty days.

It began on June 6, 1988 when the Environmental Protection Agency conducted a polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB) inspection. The College was cited at that time for administrative infractions.

PCB is a fire retarding additive which was used in the cooling oil of the old transformers. It poses two main dangers: ingesting PCB directly can cause liver damage and cancer, in the case of a serious fire PCB becomes a lethal dioxin.

Both EPA and College officials were quick to assure students at that time that they were in no immediate danger.

By the following February, a month after the complaint was received by the President's office, students had learned that their college was fined $150,000 and that EPA officials were quoted as saying chances that the environment had been harmed were "pretty good."

Though no one can slight the Washington College administration for their actions in response to the fine, some students have not forgotten the struggle to gain information from the College at the time the scandal was breaking. Most of the information was obtained through the Freedom of Information Act from the EPA by student Ryder Daniels.

Continuing the drug war?

Several years ago the supreme leader, President Reagan, declared a "war on drugs." All sub-leaders were to assist in the effort to rid the country of substance abuse...

Presently the Reagan era has ended, and the new ultimate leader, President Bush, has pledged to continue the war. In fact, Bush desires to increase the government's role in the drug war. Basically what Bush is promoting is his wish to allot more of the taxpayer's money toward the purchase of man-power, guns, and ammunition—for wars require well equipped warriors. Thus the sub-leaders—mayors for instance—will follow suit and increase spending on the war. Why does more money need to be spent? Mr. Reagan started a war; have we lost another dispute already?

Apparently so. "DC's Official Coke-head," Mayor Marion Barry, was recently apprehended in an F.B.I. orchestrated sting. Perhaps the mayor was attempting to spend a portion of the increased drug war funds on a small rock? Maybe Barry was hoping to root out the drug kingpins all by himself and hence save some of the taxpayer's money? He certainly was not intending to purchase crack, because as we all know now: Barry is an alcoholic. We will overlook the suggestion that crack and cocaine users employ alcohol as a means of countering the stimulating effects of the drugs.

This affair merely suggests the demoralizing effects that hard drugs have on any society. Now no one will take Barry seriously if he should hypocritically wear a cap boasting something like: "proud to be drug free" while attending a drug awareness meeting at a DC public school (in fact he did). Furthermore sports fans should also begin to question whether a star player is great because of pure talent and desire, or because of pure coke. Dexter Manley sure was a fine pass rusher. The same problem is evident right here: who would have voted for Carlos Henriquez had he been able to run for a student government position?

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Editorial writer responds to letter

To the Editor:

I know a lot of time has passed since Peter De Jong's letter appeared in the Elm (Dec. 1), but I want to answer it. I am not a nature freak, I am just a concerned person who is only 21 years old and may still be here in 50 or 60 years. My article may have been rather strong and pessimistic and the point I was trying to make probably got lost. Nowhere in my article did write: don't drive cars, don't use styrofoam trays, wash your clothes down at the river. Some of the solutions do not require the all or nothing approach. For instance, if everyone would take the time to read the label on their laundry detergent they would find that many are now biodegradable and contain no phosphorous. Chances are your ERA isn't the problem anymore. I was referring to some of the detergents still used in industry. Did you know that it is possible to recycle styrofaom and even plastic? The problem is that it is cheaper to throw those things in the garbage. Maybe our generation should start with mass recycling. As far as leather goes, it is a byproduct of the beef industry. Seems like there is little waste there. We get our hamburgers and shoes from the same herd.

As far as backpacking home goes, no I did not. But I don't have a car on campus. I see nothing wrong with your V6, if it passes an emissions test. There are a lot of things we can do to save gas and clean the air. One example is what happened in São Paulo, Brazil. That city used to have one of the worst pollution problems in the world, almost all caused by car exhaust. Since they began using a mixture of gasoline and alcohol (20%), the air is virtually clean. Here's another fact to ponder: if everybody in the U.S. drove the speed limit all the time we would save 9 million gallons of gas everyday.

Mr. De Jong says we know the problems, well we do know them I suppose, but then he says we know how to solve them. Wow, if you do then why are here at Washington College? You should be working for the EPA or an environmental company. I'm sure they would love to hear your solutions. Where should we put all our trash now that the landfills are filling up? What about nuclear power? Toxic waste? We have many problems without answers.

I cannot change the world, I'm not better than anyone else. Do you at least recycle aluminum cans, glass bottles and newspapers? I do. I just want this world to survive...its the only one we have.

A challenge to students

To the Editor:

To my fellow students, young and old, I would like to issue a challenge. Last summer, students from China's leading universities were stomped to death in Peking's Tianenman Square. In recent weeks students in Czechoslovakia have seemingly prevailed in a dangerous eye-ball to eye-ball confrontation with their Communist rulers. Even in this jaded era of spin-control, these children of iron will are truly heroes. They recall, with a more sober and enduring mettle, the anti-war idealism of my own undergraduate years.

I mention all this because, to the best of my knowledge, these students on the firing line of democracy and freedom have derived little moral, material or financial support from their fellow students in the U.S. Certainly I can see no written or published plea for support among the students at Washington College. Instead, I read cheap shots about philosophy seminars to which the President did not give rubber-stamp approval etc. There are still societies in this world where students can't even discuss philosophy as we know it, much less travel on a junket to a distant city. In China the administrations at leading Universities are compiling lists of ringleaders, planning the importation of dissident leaders from their American sanctuaries, and torturing some of the unfortunates caught last summer. If I had my own 'discretionary' fund for some truly worthwhile cause I would send it the brave souls in East Germany, Czechoslovakia, and (we all know it's coming), the Soviet Union.

Now to the challenge. Why not put Washington College on the political map with a student fund-raising drive to help the students of Czechoslovakia? I understand they need good quality computers for Information processing and dispersal and some very good ones are made in East Germany (This would help East Germany's hard currency problem too.) If enough money were raised a WC student might even deliver the merchandise and write back, like John Reed, about the history taking place in Prague. It is a matter of your own cultural and moral literacy to take an interest in such things. Organizations like the AFL-CIO (now don't tell Daddy about this) have patiently developed conduits for funds and their responsible dispersal among the freedom fighters in Eastern Europe.

Oh and one last thing, the money. There are some of us here in the Buntagon who know a thing or two about raising money. Come see me. With all of the arguing around this campus about how to spend our small patrimony, I thought I might add that it helps to have a good cause. Washington, who gave us the first fifty guineas, would surely understand.

Sincerely,
Marty Williams
Director of Development

OPINION

ISSUE: Following Washington, DC Mayor Marion Barry's arrest for cocaine, many charged that racial bias was involved. Was it?

Abusive Barry's fall was well deserved

Carolin Leibig

Ah, Washington, DC our nation's capital. The monuments, the museums, the White House, the drug war, and the Mayor. Marion Barry gets my vote for outstanding abuse of his office. He has been mayor for quite awhile now, didn't anyone notice anything odd about him? Probably, but he picked the men who surrounded him well, and his fall was a long time coming because of them.

Granted, most people would not choose to be the Mayor of the District. The city has many problems, but a mayor should try to solve problems, not become a part of them. Although, it's hard not to admire a man who can go to an inner city elementary school and tell the kids to say no to drugs and then meet a model at a motel and do cocaine all in the same day. But hey, when you're the mayor of the nation's capital its all in a day's work.

Since Marion Barry is black, the issue of race certainly is an important part of this case. It seems to me, however, that it contributed more to his ability to stay in office than the fact that he was arrested on drug charges. Barry always denied any wrongdoing and his accusers were often called racists. It is understandable why the overwhelming black population in the District would continue to vote Barry into office, especially when his opponents were white. I guess Barry was able to convince a lot of people that everything was a-okay and he was on the job.

Even now he says he was set up. Set up? So the cops came up to him and said: "Good evening, Mayor. Would you mind doing us a little favor? You see, they are filming an episode of Candid Camera right here and they want you to go over there and buy some drugs from that model. Isn't that funny? You of all people! Don't worry, it's not really coke." Barry, having an acute sense of humor, naturally agreed...and the rest is history.

What I can't understand is how he could face the citizens of DC for such a long time and continue to deny everything. Anybody is capable of deceit for a time, but years? The man either has no conscience or he does a hell of a job ignoring it. He used city revenues to take trips to the islands.

To say nothing of his drug habit. He was hospitalized several times over the years for "undisclosed reasons" or "chest pains." And how about all those questionable friends?

Meanwhile, the health of Washington deteriorated rapidly to the point where we now have the highest murder rate in the country. I'm sure glad we're making a good impression on the rest of the country and the world. Hopefully, the District is rid of Mayor Barry, and the city can get on with the business at hand: finding a decent Mayor, be he black or white, which is something the people of DC clearly need and deserve.

No, I think the NAACP is creating a bigger problem where one already exists. Hopefully, Marion Barry's actions will not have an adverse effect on other black politicians.

Brendan Casey
Washington DC
Freshman

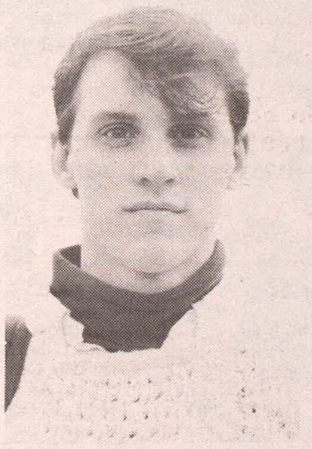
I live in DC and there is no way that Barry was arrested because of racism. He was a horrible and despicable mayor who constantly contradicted his so called war against drugs by being involved with drugs himself. I am glad he is gone.

Drew Elburn
Reisterstown, MD
Senior

No. He's stone cold-busted. And as the great Pharaoh Benjamin T. Hinkle once said, "He who passes gas in church, sits in pew."

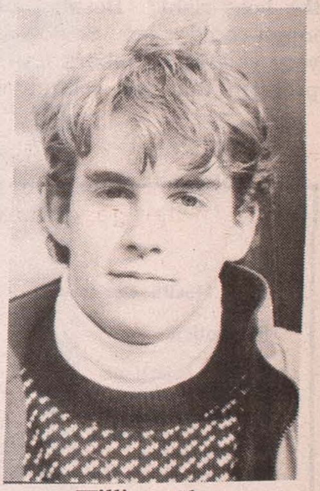
Jacqui Bell
Middletown, DE
Junior

No. I think that just because he got caught doing something illegal, people should not try to look beyond the actual crime for other causes.



Mike Sell
Seattle, WA
Senior

His arrest had nothing to do with his skin color, he was a hypocrite who got caught in an illegal activity. He has to pay the same price as any American citizen.



William Clegg
Sharon, CT
Sophomore

No, I don't believe that there was any racial bias motivating the FBI. Marion Barry has long been a rumored drug-user, so his arrest really shouldn't be a surprise to anyone, especially to Mayor Barry.

Barry was a crack-smoking forefinger of a mayor

Mike Cannon

Is the forefinger a better swab than a Q-tip? Of course not. A cottony soft Q-tip is better than even the moist adroit pinky, but as the package says, a Q-tip can be dangerous if wielded improperly. Residents of Washington DC now face a decision comparable to that of swabbing. Do they want a rough around the edges, crack smoking forefinger of a mayor like Marion Barry or do they want a volatile and potentially a tremendously effective Q-tip like Jesse Jackson? I say neither. They need a pinky in the dark and murky ear canal of such dubious issues as baseball and statehood—one with finesse and cunning but still able to scrape with their nails. He should be skinny, too. No need for a roly-poly overachiever in this situation.

And this gets right to my point. Was there a racial bias involved in the arrest of Mayor Barry? No. The feds have footage of him smoking crack in a hotel room with two women who weren't even his wives! Benjamin Hooks is wrong, and I must add, a bellyacher in his criticisms of the feds singling out black people as the targets of investigations. Especially with so many other famous people smoking crack in a notorious hotel with two women who weren't even their wives. For shame—the FBI has obviously been very picky in this case, eh Randolph.

And that brings me right back to my point. So what if even all the confounding variables were eliminated through intense grilling of the sandwiches, er, rather, the agents involved in the case and there was found to be a racial bias. "Yepper," each agent sez, "we done plugged us another Negro politician a smokin' crack. Har Harr." Neverthemore, he still got caught on tape smoking crack, which is illegal. One should never get caught doing that on tape.

The ramifications of his acts are astounding and so speculative and obvious that I don't need to and would be thoroughly bored if I went into it here. Why you know what—it's even beside the point. Barry got caught smoking crack. Nannee nannee boo boo. He should go to jail or whatever it is they do to criminals nowadays. What an off-the-wall idea. This whole issue is as much of a load of crap as that diplomatic immunity thing. They get the flu too. The rhino virus does not discriminate.

So so what if Benjamin Hooks wants SEC criminals to be denied their Rolls Royces and Barbie Dolls. Change one system at a time dude and be impartial or else the whole shebang turns out to be a big congress of ineptitude that any further wranglings with it would tangle it like a bunched up slinky.

Additionally, I don't see why the people who say Barry's arrest was racially motivated fail to overlook the fact that he hasn't done squat in the last twelve years of his administration. Don't they want some positive change in their hovel? When a prairie dogs den is old and replete of creature comforts he moves on a digs a new one right? Well the people of DC can't just move on like the prairie dogs do but they can take the measures to bring in some new dirt to dig. They need a pinky in charge of things there to sweep house a bit. Perhaps, though, Barry may have whittled himself down into a pinky by virtue of getting busted and is doing the sweeping himself. Yay!

PERSPECTIVES

Good Luck, Gorby, we wish you well

Ever have a feeling that absolutely nothing's going right for you? Well, join the club, and try putting yourself in this man's shoes.

Imagine getting your dream job. Big office, lots of perks like nice vacations in fun places like Washington DC, and London, big black limousines and security guards, not to mention lots of free press.

Sounds great, doesn't it? Well, one day you're driving down the street in your nice car and you look outside through your tinted windows and see...tens and hundreds of people standing in lines waiting for...waiting for...waiting for toilet paper? You think to yourself, "such a shame" and drive on. Later that night your wife berates you about the toilet paper and in an effort to quiet rather loud protestations, you promise, with the aid of your dream job, to try to do something about shops that have nothing to sell, and people that have nothing to eat.

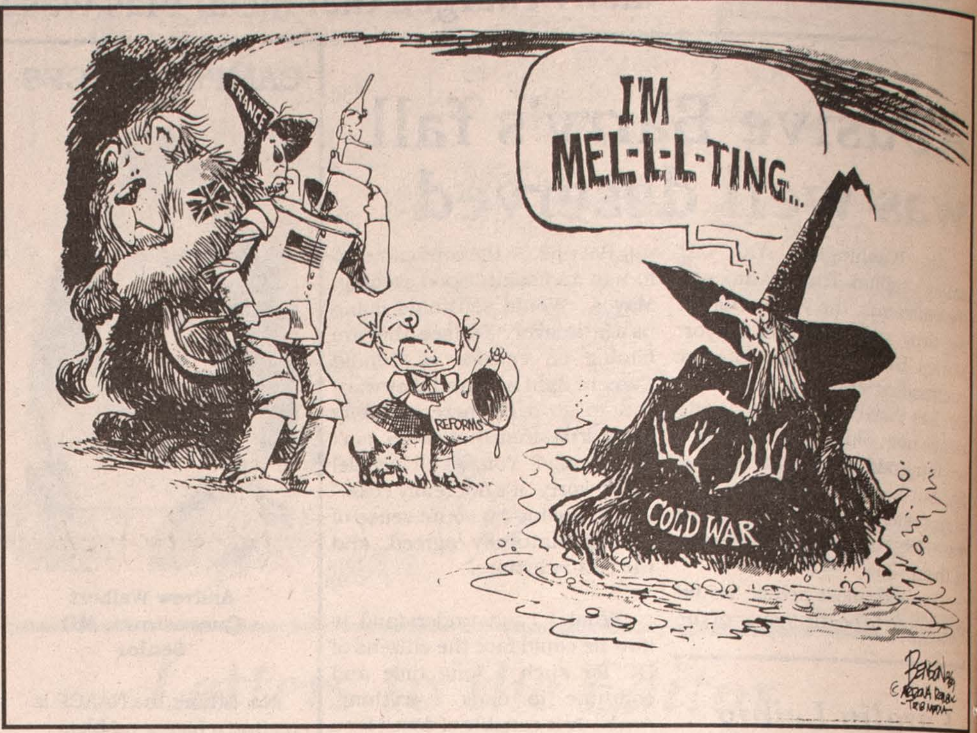
Well, the next morning you get to the office and tell the other guys your plan. They're not so gung ho about it but hey, you're the boss right? Besides, how tough could it be? So you and your comrades embark on this program that will reform and revolutionize the country.

You think this would make these poor people happy, don't you? They can produce whatever they want to in your factories. They can travel around the country. They can tell you what's on their minds? So why are they causing such a fuss? Why are they killing themselves in Azerbaijan? What are they protesting about in Lithuania? What's wrong with these people, don't they appreciate what you're trying to do for them? Don't they know how tough your job is? Don't they appreciate how protected they are? And the Ukrainians, don't they know how important they are to the country?

Laura Hopper

You're in a bind. Every time you open your mouth you seem to annoy some other group. If you're soft with one group, another group will accuse you of being weak.

There are other problems. The currency has no value outside the country. People don't want to work. And when they work they do it so poorly half the stuff falls apart. Alcoholism is becoming more and more of a problem. And your allies, they're in worse shape. They're deserting left and right.



Some joker thinks you're messing things up. Goes off and tells the Japanese how you're in danger of getting sacked. Comrade? Ha! With comrades like these who needs enemies.

Speaking of enemies, not even your biggest former rival has the cash to help you out.

And now, you're in trouble. You're in danger of losing your job. But it's not your fault, it was those bullheaded, paranoid people who had your job before you. You can't undo decades of neglect and mismanagement in one year, or even two. You aren't the one responsible. But you are, it's your job, it's your country.

Good Luck, Gorby.

Dining in and around Chestertown

What could possibly better opener to a night of dancing than a romantic dinner for two (or more)? Chestertown and the surrounding area offers a wide variety of charming and historic restaurants. For those who don't feel like staying in Chestertown, Annapolis is a mere 45 minutes away. Philadelphia, DC, and Baltimore roughly 2 hours away and Chicago a mere 1.5, by plane.

The Imperial Hotel
208 High Street
Chestertown
778-5000

The Imperial, perhaps Chestertown's premier restaurant, is a real treat. Excellent cuisine, such as filet mignon or Norwegian salmon, is complemented by excellent service and elegant surroundings. The Imperial is within walking distance from the College, making it the perfect option for those without cars who prefer to dine with style. Entrees are priced between $23.00 and $26.00. Reservations are required and should be made as soon as possible. One thing to remember: the Imperial does not accept any credit cards.

The Ironstone Cafe
236 Cannon Street
Chestertown
778-0188

The Ironstone is a small, charming restaurant. It offers a wide variety of entrees priced between $11 and $20. The Ironstone tends to be crowded on the night of the Birthday Ball, so reservations should be made as soon as possible.

Rolph's Wharf
Route 1, Chestertown
778-3227

Located on the Chester River, Rolph's Wharf has a pleasant, informal atmosphere. The menu includes seafood, steak, and pasta, as well as nightly specials. Reservations should be made for large groups.

The Old Wharf Inn
Cannon Street
Chestertown
778-3566

Located on the Chester River, the Old Wharf Inn offers a variety of entrees reasonably priced between $6.95 and $20.00 served in an informal setting. Reservations are required only for large parties.

Roy Rogers
Kent Plaza
Chestertown

For those who feel that a quick, yet intimate dinner is more to their taste, Roy Rogers offers a simple and inexpensive alternative. Fast, friendly service and the Free Fixin's Bar, are the perfect complement to Roy's menu. Entrees are prices between $2 and $5, with drinks and french fries not included. Roy's does not accept credit cards but reservations are not needed.

For those who wish to escape Chestertown, the surrounding area offers a wide selection for your dining pleasure.

The Kitty Knight House
Route 213
Georgetown
648-5305

The Kitty Knight House is off of 213 between Chestertown and Elkton. Situated on the Sassafras River, the restaurant offers seafood and beef entrees ranging from $10.50 to $26.00. Reservations are required and should be made as soon as possible.

Schaefer's Canal House
Chesapeake City
885-2200

Located just across the bridge in Chesapeake City, Schaefer's Canal House offers a panoramic view of the C&D canal. The menu includes prime rib, duck, and shrimp almondine. Entrees range in price from $15.00 to $26.00, and reservations are required.

The Bayard House
11 Bohemia Ave, S
Chesapeake City
885-5040

Across the canal located in Chesapeake City's historic district is the Baynard House. The restaurant offers unique entrees such as braised pheasant with plums, and lobster thermadore. Prices range from $16.95 to $23.95 per entree. Reservations are required. To get to the Baynard House, watch for signs for the Historic District before the bridge.

The Fin, Fur and Feather Inn
424 Bayside Ave
Rock Hall
639-7454

For hunting a fishing enthusiasts, the Fin, Fur and Feather Inn is a must. Located in Rock Hall, its informal setting is relaxing and enjoyable. However, Ballgoers are strongly suggested to leave the formal wear behind. The entrees are priced slightly less than at the Old Wharf Inn.

Helpful hints in shopping for Birthday Ball

Yes, it's that time of year again when romance fills the air! All of the shop windows are filled with tacky heart-shaped boxes, plastic red and pink roses and, of course, Valentine greetings for all of your true loves.

But to all of us in Chestertown, February means much more than just Valentine's day. It also means Birthday Ball. Which consequently means looking in your closet and freaking out because you realize that in that tiny overstuffed dorm room closet you have absolutely nothing to wear.

Well, relax. Here are some quick solutions for every budget.

If you glance through any fashion magazine today you will see all of the big designers pushing short, sassy and sixties for the nineties. Basic black is out, but accent it with a snazzy cape or decorate it with a variety of colorful sequins and beads, and you've got yourself a winner!

It's always wonderful to think of the Birthday Ball as a Cinderella type of affair, but in reality most of us can't afford a new Bill Blass with matching accessories and a limo ride to the gym, nor do we have a fairy godmother who will turn our left-over Halloween pumpkins into horse-drawn carriages. But being realistic doesn't have to mean being boring. Let's divide ourselves into four realistic financial categories and take it from there.

1. You have decided to treat yourself to a new look for the ball this year but have little to no money no spend. For practical purposes, you have budgeted $25.00 for the occasion.

2. You also have a budget, but have been thinking about this year's ball ever since last year's ended, and have decided that you really want to make it special without going into debt. Your budget is $100.

3. It is either your or your date's senior year and you know this will be your last Birthday Ball. You talked to your parents over break and they said they would help you make it the best ever. You not only need a new dress and accessories, but a manicure and makeover to match. Your budget is $500.00

4. You won the lottery last week and money is no object! The Dynasty Look.

For those of you in category number one, you really can give yourself a brand new look for very little money. Go to your closet and get out that basic black cocktail dress that you have worn every year. Come on, I know you have one. Don't forget the black hose and heels.

Okay, so you've got your basic sophisticated look. And it's fine, right? Well, maybe for a mortician's wife, but this is a party we're getting ready for, not a funeral. What you need is a splash of color, a few accessories and you'll have the hottest look around. Why not try a black and red cape with large polka dots or a brocade pattern? Capes are the latest fashion must and will prove much more practical than a traditional winter coat over your dress if this warm weather keeps up; especially when made out of an evening fabric such as moire, taffeta or satin and jazzed up with a few sequins and bugle beads. These fabrics at the yardstick run $4-$7 per yard and a cape requires three yards, which fits perfectly into your budget. If you don't sew or don't have the time you can have your cape custom made by someone. With the spare change you have left over, treat yourself to two new pairs of plain metal or wooden clip-on earrings and cover them in the same fabric that you used for the cape. Use one pair as earrings and clip the other on the toes of your shoes to tie the whole outfit together. You can also use the same principle to make a hairpiece that coordinates perfectly.

Now for category number two. You have a somewhat extended budget over those in group number one so you have several options. First of all, you can revamp an already existing outfit with a new cape, jacket or scarf, but don't forget to add the beads and a full array of matching accessories; earrings, necklace, hairpiece, evening bags and shoe accents for the perfectly complete evening look.

Another choice may be to stroll through a second hand store. The styles of the sixties are making a comeback and thrift stores are full of them. If it's short and shiny, it's IN!

Don't forget the accessories. You can expect to spend between $40-$60 on a dress, even second hand. Don't forget to have it professionally cleaned and pressed before the big night—you don't want to look great and smell musty!

You might want to check into a period hat to top off the whole ensemble. If you decide to take this route, remember to keep it small but smart. Always select evening fabric which either matches or coordinates with your dress. Matching hose and evening shoes are also a must.

Your third choice is to buy a new dress at a fashion outlet or discount store. One of my per-

The Birthday Ball: a ball or a bore?

by Amy R. Caddle

The Birthday Ball season is upon us, bringing thoughts of exaggerated tafetta gowns, tuxedos with chromatically correct cumberbunds and ties. Visions of dollar signs dance in students' heads. Is all of the time, money, and mental anguish that goes into preparing for an appearance at the Birthday Ball actually worth it?

Gordy Scherer, Freshman class president, assures the student body that this year's Birthday Ball is going to be like none before it. Scherer and the other Freshman class officers have been collaborating with the alumni directors and administration since December to ensure a unique experience for all who attend. "The theme of this year's Birthday Ball is 'A Step Back in Time.' We have made a realistic re-creation of Mount Vernon—we're even using live cherry trees, and specialized lighting, " says Scherer. "We have had a lot of help from classmates. Many think the Freshman class is too inexperienced to be in charge of the Ball. But I feel as though the freshmen bring a lot of new ideas with them, and are capable of producing a unique Birthday Ball." The Birthday Ball is traditionally a time for faculty, students and alumni to come together and enjoy themselves. While many attend the Birthday Ball and have a wonderful time, many students think going to the Ball is a waste of time and energy.

Greg Boone, a senior and Birthday Ball alumnus, feels as though "the Birthday Ball is no different than a high school prom." Most high schools hold their proms in restaurants or hotels, not in a gymnasium, where the Birthday Ball is held. "I can hang out in the gym in a formal dress any time I want to without having to pay $25," says senior Elizabeth Rollins.

Sophomore Brian Gimelson suggests holding the Ball in a more formal setting. "I feel as though the Birthday Ball Committee does an excellent job, but making it into a true formal event would be more beneficial for the Alumni Association, and more fun for everyone." Junior Sarah Hamlin agrees, and thinks "it would be nice if dinner were included in the admission price. A lot of the glamour wears off after freshmen year."

Heeding Gimelson's suggestions would make for a more spectacular event, but would undoubtedly raise the price of admission. "$25 for students is not exactly cheap, but charging $100 for alumni is ridiculous," says Clay Eichelberger, a junior. Sophmore Shan Driscoll thinks "it is unfair that non-Washington College students are forced to pay an additional entrance fee, even when accompanied by a Washington College student. They also didn't make the students aware of the extra charge until they arrived that evening." Kevin Knox thinks "paying $25 for admission and then having a cash bar is unfair. All together, it costs about $300 and it's just not worth the money." Sophomore Kristin Lewis, who had never attended a formal event before last year, was looking forward to a fun evening at last year's Birthday Ball, but was "disappointed with the music and the atmosphere in general." Left with bad memories of last year's Birthday Ball, quite a few students are not planning to attend this year.

There are students who thoroughly enjoyed themselves at past Birthday Balls. Sophomore Patty Hawthorne recalls at last year's Ball when Mrs. Libby Cater's dress accidentally ripped. Mrs. Cater continued to tear up the dance floor until someone notified her of the rip. She and President Cater proceeded to make a quick exit.

"Last year the band was really good, and the atmosphere was very relaxed," says sophomore Jen Hannum, who is planning to attend this year also. Recent Washington College alumni Anne Lindenbaum and J.P. Albert had their first date at the Birthday Ball. They were married last September.

Alumnus Bridget McElroy, who presently works in the Development Office, attended the Birthday Ball each of her four years at Washington College. "Everyone really looked forward to the Birthday Ball. Many alumni, parents, professors and people from the community went." McElroy is looking forward to this year's Birthday Ball, despite a disappointing Ball last year. "Last year it was a completely different atmosphere than past Balls. The music wasn't big band, which was disappointing. It seemed more like a fraternity party than a formal Ball," says Mc Elroy.

Erika Del Priori, who graduated Washington College in 1989, also an employee of the Development office feels as though "without the big band music, the Ball is definitely less formal. It seems ridiculous to bop around the gym in formal attire to blues music." Many students and alumni will be relieved to know that big band music will return to the Birthday Ball this year.

Both the lacrosse team and the basketball team will be out of town the weekend of the Birthday Ball. Sophomore India Henson, who is also a manager of the basketball team, feels as though "it takes away from the Birthday Ball when sporting events are scheduled the weekend of the event, but it's very difficult to change the schedules." Mike Johnson, a member of the lacrosse team, has never gone to the Birthday Ball. "Honestly, I'm not disappointed I can't go," says Johnson.

So, the question still remains: should we heed the words of Scherer and prepare ourselves for the best Birthday Ball yet, or take into consideration the faults of past Balls? Whatever the decision Birthday Ball is an established tradition at W.C. and will continue to be so.

Will Birthday Ball 1990 be a success, or is the ball a time honored tradition, growing more like a spruced up prom every year? (photo from the Elm files)

A big band and cherry trees...makings for a wonderful evening

Brett Lankford

Hooray, boys and girls! It's once again time for the annual Birthday Ball, this college's version of a high-school prom. There are two schools of thought related to this yearly WC gala. Some people believe that the Ball is the most important event of the year, even bigger than the Panhel Tea. These people also believe that they will suffer a fate worse than death if they are not seen in the gym in a tuxedo and/or gown, and they usually wind up asking the Numbers Lady™ for a date.

The other group takes an opposing view on the subject. These people are of the opinion that the Birthday Ball is just an excuse to get even more money out of the alumni and is a trick to make WC students appear dignified to patrons. This faction then refuses to spend their money or their time at this function, instead choosing to stay at home and play drinking games to The Golden Girls. For the sake of this article, however, I'm choosing to ignore this second faction, no matter how large a group it is. My theory is that they're all just upset because the Numbers Lady™ turned them down.

This particular article is addressed to those people who are completely in favor of the Birthday Ball, those people who would absolutely die if they weren't granted the opportunity to watch President Cater jitterbug on the gymnasium floor. I'm talking to those people who get weak at the knees at the mere thought of dressing up in formal wear and going to Buzz's with your date. This article is for you.

There have been some improvements in the Birthday Ball format this year. The most notable change comes with the arrival of Big Band music. This should add a substantial air of refinement to the gym. This new air of refinement will also cost each couple an extra five dollars, as the cost of crepe paper has apparently skyrocketed.

Despite the excitement caused by the Big Band and the additional crepe paper, there may be some moments during the night where there will be a lull in the activities. Please don't start tugging at Clint Baer's beard in an effort to cure your boredom. There are plenty of alternatives that should provide hours of entertainment.

-You could spend much of the night doing your impersonation of ol' George himself. You can travel uncharted territory if you try to go to the gym by following the directions that the construction workers have left you. Remember George crossing the Delaware? You can make an effort at crossing the vast oceans of mud that inhabit this campus. Watch out for the undertow.

-LOOK AT ALL THOSE CHERRY TREES!! My God, aren't they impressive? And they're alive!! And look!! There's an exact replica of Mount Vernon! These amazing additions should add a certain touch of class to the gymnasium, or at least until an alumnus has one too many bottles of wine and attempts to scale the tree.

-Watch Dr. Gillin dance. If you start to get bored, just watch this snappy professor go to town out on the dance floor. Dr. Gillin will dance for hours on end, so he'll be out there to entertain you throughout the evening. Don't worry, though, he'll soon be making the most of his amazing talent. He's been named the substitute for the pink rabbit on the Energizer commercials.

-Mix up all the jackets on the hangers outside the gymnasium. This should be good for a few laughs. Watch rich alumnis who are far more successful than you

PERSPECTIVES

News from around the world; budget goes to Congress

UNITED STATES:

President Bush sent his budget proposal to Congress on Monday. It includes 36.5 billion dollars in deficit reduction measures. These are cuts in spending programs. Roughly half of the proposed cuts will come out of domestic programs such as housing, transportation, and Medicare payments to doctors and hospitals. $6 billion will come out of cuts in defense spending, primarily from the army. The budget is likely to meet with considerable resistance from the Democrat-controlled Congress, who are in favor of a greater cut in defense spending.

The President is required by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget balancing act to cut the budget so that the deficit will be reduced. The size of the deficit in the coming fiscal year, which begins in October, will depend on how the economy performs. If this coming year is a good one for the economy, then revenues will be higher and the deficit lower. The administration is predicting a better year than either private or congressional economists.

Given the recent events in eastern Europe, the Congress is likely to press for much greater cuts in the defense budget. Since 1985, the Congress has cut the defense budget by 2% annually, despite the protests of both Presidents Reagan and Bush.

The budget does include increases for the Education Department. The money is targeted for Head Start programs. There are also increases in funding for veteran's hospitals, and for the modernization of the air traffic control system by the FAA. The budget includes research and developments allocations for NASA, the super collider (a giant atom smasher), and two billion dollars for an environmental effort including reforestation, hazardous waste clean up, and more land for national parks.

In his upcoming State of the Union Address, President Bush is expected to announce a plan to combat global warming by planting trees. The plan calls for planting a billion trees a year over the next ten years in national forests, privately owned rural property and urban areas. Aides to the president say he is genuinely fond of trees. They also say that the program is intended to enhance the beauty of the countryside and cities as well as help conserve energy, and protect soil and water quality.

The president is hoping to enlist the Boy Scouts and Garden Clubs of America and other groups in this largely volunteer effort. Scientists estimate that the average global temperatures will rise by 3.5 degrees Fahrenheit by the middle of the next century. Conservationists note that trees alone will not significantly reduce global warming; a reduction in the use of oil and gas is needed.

While Marion Barry undergoes alcohol treatment in Florida, the Federal grand jury investigation in Washington DC expands to examine corruption and drug use. The investigation is looking at how Barry obtained drugs and at the possibility that he exchanged official favors or government contracts for drugs.

Meanwhile Barry supporters continue to assert that he was targeted because he is black. The US attorney supervising the case, Jay Stephens, denies it. So far Barry has only been charged with possessing drugs. Aides said that decisions on seeking reelection have been postponed.

SOVIET UNION:

In Moscow, a new face. The first McDonald's restaurant in the Soviet Union will open on Wednesday. The restaurant, located in Pushkin Square will sell Big Macs and french fries to hungry muscovites. The staff are Soviet teenagers who have been trained to be unrelentingly cheerful.

McDonald's is one of the few foreign companies whose Soviet venture has progressed to opening. The largest obstacle is the ruble, the Soviet currency, which has little exchange value in the west. Companies such as Pepsi have solved this problem by purchasing scrap metal in the Soviet Union and selling it abroad. The Moscow McDonalds will be the largest in the world, and will be capable of serving up to 15000 customers a day. But the prices, in rubles, will be high. It is estimated that a Big Mac, fries and a Coke will cost roughly half a day's pay for the average worker. A second McDonald's on Gorky Street will sell to tourists for dollars only.

The two restaurants will be supplied with Portuguese tomato paste, Bulgarian apples, and Canadian mustard since the Soviets were unable to supply these. The potatoes needed for the french fries will, however, be grown locally. McDonald's has imported special seed potatoes from the Netherlands, and taught the Soviets how to grow them.

ROMANIA:

The former deputy prime minister Ion Dunca admitted during his trial that he was afraid to challenge former dictator Nicolae Ceausescu. According to testimony released on Monday, the former dictator threatened to execute two of his top ministers because the army would not fire on demonstrators. He apparently threatened to resign, but did not make it to the door before he was begged to return.

Dunca and three other defendants are charged with genocide. This trial, unlike that of the Ceausescus, is taking place in public, in an auditorium and in front of roughly 100 foreign journalists.

The four defendants, if convicted, could face 20 years to life imprisonment. The death penalty was abolished following the execution of the Ceausescus. All of the defendants are presumed guilty and must prove their innocence.

SPAIN:

Nationalists groups in Basque country and Catalonia are calling for regional self-determination. The nationalists are justifying their claims by using eastern Europe and the Soviet Union as an example.

But the government, suspecting the goal of the nationalists is independence from Spain, reaffirmed that "Spain is an indivisible and indissoluble union."

The largest problem is posed by the ETA, a Basque separatist guerrilla group which has been fighting for independence since Franco. But support for the ETA has waned since a high level of autonomy is guaranteed by the new Constitution. The Constitution allows Basque country to raise its won taxes, create its own police force, have its own language and elect its own parliament.

MYANMER:

(formerly Burma)

In an effort to raise scarce foreign currency, the Myanmese government has sold part of its Tokyo embassy. The sale gave the government 234 million dollars, roughly 3 times the country's current reserve of foreign currency.

There is speculation that the money is needed to pay for weapons, but with elections coming up, the money is also needed for rebuilding the infrastructure (roads, bridges, railroads).

The government has been in shaky financial shape since foreign aid was cut off following a military crackdown in 1988 that killed thousands.

Sales of embassy land in Japan are becoming increasingly common. Australia sold its garden for 400 million dollars and other embassies have sold smaller parcels.

POLAND:

1600 delegates at the Communist Party congress in Warsaw are meeting to decide to dissolve the Polish Communist Party. Party leaders are acknowledging that the party is too weak to run in a free election. The Communist party would be replaced by a left-of-center group that would not be a continuation of the Communist party.

The Party won only one seat in the June legislative elections and received less than 5% of the vote in many districts.

The delegates are scheduled to meet again on Sunday to create a new party along the lines of the French, Spanish, and Italian Socialist parties. But ideological differences between delegates could lead to the formation of several parties.

compiled from the New York Times

From Annapolis:

On January 10th, the Maryland General Assembly began its 1990 session.

The first order of business was to elect the leaders of both houses. The President of the Senate is Thomas "Mike" Miller, Jr. from the 27th district and the President Pro-Tem is Frederick Malkus from the 37th district. The leadership in the House of Delegates is Clayton Mitchell, Jr. from the 36th district and the Speaker Pro Tem is Dennis Donaldson of the 25th district.

On the following day, Governor William Donald Schaeffer gave the State of the State Address to a joint session of the General Assembly. He then outlined his agenda including the controversial "Snack Tax" designed to raise revenue for the state by taxing snack foods as merchandise instead of considering them food items. This bill appears to have already been killed in committee. At the beginning of this week, Governor Schaeffer introduced his budget to the Assembly for its review and approval.

The main issues for this semester seem to be cleaning up the environment, moving the date of Presidential Primaries from "Super Tuesday" to a date in May, and of course, abortion.

Two bills were introduced into both houses on abortion in an attempt to compromise pro-life and pro-choice groups who have been petitioning the legislators during their Monday night sessions. These bills will be dealt with by Joint Legislative Committees who will hopefully give it special consideration and to ease its course through both houses. Committee hearings on these bills will probably be held much later in the session because this is an election year and legislators fear this topic because of its potential political repercussions. Also, by waiting to bring this topic up in committee, the Senate and House can get other, less emotional and controversial issues out of the way and give these bills the consideration that they deserve.

Things will definitely begin to heat-up as soon as bills begin to leave committee and go to the floors of both houses for approval.

Sports in the 1980's: a decade in review

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The 1980's brought the sports world a wide assortment of headlines, ranging from the U.S. hockey team's "Miracle on Ice" to the tragic cocaine-induced death of Maryland basketball star Len Bias. The world of sports has rarely been shaken by such drastic ups and downs in a span of ten years. Pete Rose lived a life of extremes during the decade. Rose was on top of the baseball world after breaking Ty Cobb's hit record, then gambled his way out of the sport he loved just five years later. Rose's rise and fall typified the decade in sports.

The eighties were prosperous for most sports. The National Basketball Association was at an all-time low at the beginning of the decade as Larry O'Brien ended a disappointing reign as commissioner. David Stern replaced O'Brien, and the league's prospects quickly turned around. The arrival of Bird, Magic and Jordan also helped, and the league is presently setting all-time attendance records. The NCAA has reaped the benefits of college basketball's "March Madness", as well as the hundreds of bowls that are held on New Year's Day. Major league baseball has been able to survive two strikes and an earthquake-ridden World Series, and they recently signed a billion-dollar television contract with CBS that solidified baseball as the #! sport in America.

Most of these sports also fell victim to many hard times. Drugs dominated the sports scene in the eighties. The NBA, reacting to the death of Len Bias and the ever-increasing substance abuse around the league, took a tough stand on the drug problem. Baseball was destroyed during the mid-eighties at the drug trials in Pittsburgh, where star player after star player entered the courtroom and shocked the nation with tales of rampant substance abuse in the sport. Football fell victim to a sharp increase in steroid abuse, and Cleveland defensive back Don Rogers also died of a cocaine overdose. College athletics also fell victim to a variety of drug problems. The most notable fall from grace came from Gary McLean. The Villanova point guard admitted to taking drugs before a Final Four game and prior to their victory visit with President Reagan.

The Olympics also followed this pattern of ups and downs. The US hockey team captured everyone's heart in the '80 Winter Olympics, but the United States boycotted that year's Summer Olympics. The United States dominated the medal count at the '84 Summer Olympics in Los Angeles, but mostly because most of the dominant Communist countries were boycotting the games. The '88 Olympics were predominantly boycott-free, but the Summer Games will always be remembered for Ben Johnson's positive steroids test. Poor behavior by American athletes and Korean spectators also marred the Summer Games.

The eighties was a decade of contrast in the sports world. For every uplifting success story there was a story of dismal failure to contradict it. For every fairytale about one-handed pitcher Jim Abbott there was the story of a Bias or Chris Washburn, who let drugs destroy their lives. Classy individuals like Julius Erving and Walter Payton played on the same field as people like Dennis Rodman and Jim McMahon. Just when the '89 Orioles suggest that money isn't everything to these athletes, pitcher Mark Langston calls a contract offer worth two million dollars a year "an insult". This decade proved to be a roller-coaster ride for sports fans. Sports always claimed to include the thrill of victory and the agony of defeat, and this was never more evident than in the 1980's.

Gewer, Read prepare for Rolex tourney

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Next week is a big week for two members of the Washington College tennis team. Coach Fred Wyman, Larry Gewer and Scott Read leave on an all-expense paid trip to Minneapolis next Monday to play in the Rolex National Small College Collegiate Tennis Championships. The duo are the #2 ranked team in the Division III rankings, and they qualified for the tournament in a regional meet last semester.

The Rolex tournament is made up of teams sent from NAIA, Division II, Division III and Junior College Schools. The tournament has events in both singles and doubles, and it is considered one of the most prestigious tournaments in the country. This year, over 3000 students from over 500 colleges competed in this huge event.

Wyman was impressed last year by the quality of the tournament. "This is a very big tourney, and it was very well-done when we went last year," Wyman noted. The coach was also quick to mention the difficulty of the field in this tournament. "The doubles bracket is very challenging. It's especially tough playing against doubles teams from junior colleges. The guys from JuCos are guys who will go on to play Division I tennis."

This is the second trip to Minnesota that Gewer and Read have made together, as well as their second regional victory in three years. The doubles team won the eastern regional two years ago, but they did not play in the Rolex nationals. Gewer and Read were runners-up in last year's regionals, but they received an at-large invitation from the tournament committee. They lost both of their matches last year, but they did play competitive tennis in both matches.

Wyman realizes the difficulty of the field, and he is not expecting miracles from his prize tandem. "I'd really like to get one win," Wyman said. Gewer and Read play Amine Kadiri and Mohammad Ridaoui from Midland Junior College in the first round. Kadiri and Ridaoui have stepped in to replace a duo from Tyler Junior College that withdrew from the tournament. Gewer and Read suffered a defeat to Midland Junior College at last year's tourney, making revenge an added incentive for this year's play.

The Rolex tournament is the first match of the spring semester for men's or women's tennis. Both teams will compete in a couple of tournaments in the month of February, preparing for their spring season. The men officially begin their spring regular season on March 10 in an away match against The Citadel, while the women open the season the following day at the University of North Carolina-Wilmington.

Basketball ready to claim MAC championship

by Matt Giller

When the season began, so-called experts predicted a mediocre season for the Shoremen basketball team. On paper it would have appeared that way. It is rare that a team rebuilding a program that lost six players to graduation is able to have the season the WAC(15-3) basketball is having. The much touted class of 1990 that has grown and developed together for four years has now seized the day.

Their leadership has made overachievers out of the rest of the team and directed this team with as much confidence as any Shoremen team in recent history. After shaking off a couple of early season heartbreakers, the Shoremen have won 8 straight, including all six Middle Atlantic Conference games. The WAC won at Swarthmore 88-76 in 2 overtimes, notched an 85-66 victory over Haverford, and scored an impressive 87-81 overtime win at St. Mary's.

In the true spirit of MAC basketball, the Swarthmore game was a battle. The much improved Swarthmore squad played the WAC equal for two halves and one overtime period. The Shoremen were led by Charles "Tank" Duckett, playing his best collegiate game ever. Tank took over in the second overtime, pouring in 3 3-pointers to help the Shoremen pull away. WC outscored Swarthmore 20-8 in the second overtime to gain the "W". Duckett finished the game with 25 points, 7 assists, 6 rebounds, and 3 steals. Other leaders for the team were Jamke(20 pts, 11 rebs), Keehan (19 pts, 9 rebs), and Brandt, who added 15 points.

Last Saturday the Shoremen netters took to the road again to play at Haverford. In the past they might be better called the Havenots, but this year proved different. Washington went into the locker room at halftime with a precarious 39-34 lead. The Shoremen managed to hold Haverford to 24% shooting from the field in the second half (31% for the game) to rout the home team 85-66. Brandt had 23 to lead the WAC, while Keehan and Jamke scored 23 and 16 points respectively. Sharpshooters Duckett and C.J. Johnson added 14 apiece.

The road trip continued as WC went to play a talented St. Mary's team that previously handed the #4 team in the country their first defeat. Playing one of their best games of the year, the WAC took the game into OT, where they scored eight of the last nine points to win 87-82. Brandt again led all scorers with 25 points, while Jamke received the Windex award for a game-high 17 rebounds to go along with his 18 points. Duckett added 11 and Johnson scored a key 8 points that were needed in important parts of the game.

Congratulations go out to Duckett, who received player of the week honors for his 50 points, 16 assists, and 8 steals in his last three games. Chris Brandt has also played spectacular basketball lately, and he recently joined two team members in the WC 1000 point club. Squirrel scored his 1000th point in the game against St. Mary's, joining teammates Keehan and Brandt in the select club.

The team is presently in the driver's seat for the MAC championship with their undefeated conference record. After a road contest against York this Saturday, the WAC could capture the conference title with a home victory over Haverford on Wednesday, February 7th. A conference championship would be an amazing accomplishment for a WC team that was supposed to spend this season rebuilding for their future.

Dr. Jock and the joys of skating

Dear Dr. Jock: My boyfriend is really into ice-skating. I'm not very good at it but I'm willing to try. What can you tell me about the sport? Is it good for fitness? What sort of a warm-up do I do?

Dear Readers: Ice-skating is a fun and challenging sport. Watching the pros on Tv makes it look fantastically easy but, actually, active ice-skating (as opposed to just gliding around in circles) requires a good deal of strength, agility and balance. That's not to discourage you, just to let you know it takes time and dedication to be a really fine skater. That's why it's so important to enjoy the process as you go. And skating is easy to love, once you get the hang of it.

To help you get started, here are some things to think about:

Skating is not a fitness sport. Ice skating may relax you and give you hours of joy and satisfaction, but it won't make you fit. Indeed, you should be doing some other aerobic activity – walking, running, swimming, cycling, etc. – to get you in shape for skating. Naturally, if you skate often enough and hard enough, it can improve your cardiovascular condition but for most of us, skating is a sometime thing. If you come to it strong and flexible with plenty of endurance built up from other sports you'll enjoy it much more.

Stretch and strengthen your ankles. Newcomers to skating frequently complain about sore ankles. That's because skating correctly requires you to keep each foot balanced over the blade. And that means you're asking the muscles and tendons of your lower legs and ankles to do more work than they're used to doing. That extra strain can cause problems and pain but you can help prevent that by taking time, every day, to fully flex and rotate your ankles. We're not talking anything fancy here. Simply extend your leg straight out and down so your ankle is about a foot off the ground. Then, gently rotate your ankle clockwise, then counterclockwise, 10-25 times or more. While you're rotating, flex your foot upward and downward as far as you can, so you can really feel the pull. Relax and enjoy the stretch.

Be sure your skates fit correctly. Good skates that fit properly will give your ankle the support it needs. Try not to borrow skates. Instead, find a pair (even a used pair) that fit, not color. Wear the socks you'll skate in. The experts advise you lace skates tightly at the instep and a little looser at the top. There should be room to give, but not enough that you wobble.

Strengthen you quadriceps. Skaters need strong quadriceps, those big muscles on the front of your thigh. They help you control your skates and stay in balance. The stronger they are, the more skating you'll be able to do without getting tired and losing control. There are many good quad strengtheners you can do.

Warm-ups are important. By all means, take a few minutes to stretch your major muscle groups before you start skating. Stretch your quads and calves, do some torso twisting, release tension with some gentle toe-touching, move your arms and shoulders through their full range of motion. Be sure and stretch gently; no bouncing. Breathe deeply and naturally throughout. And when you're done skating, don't suddenly quit and come in. Slow down gradually. A proper cool-down period can help keep your muscles from feeling sore the next day.

Dress properly. Dress in layers so you can peel down as you build up your body heat. Make the bottom layer polypropylene or an equivalent synthetic material that wicks away the moisture. Cotton long underwear isn't a good idea because it holds water when it's wet, so you feel cold and miserable. Wear or carry a hat. Mittens are warmer than gloves.

Drink plenty of water. Every time you see your breath in cold weather, it's a reminder that you're losing water. So be sure to drink a few glasses of water before, during and after you skate. It'll help keep you warm and energetic. Don't wait until you're thirsty to drink. Also, don't think that hot liquids will warm you up. They may make you feel better but they don't do much for your body temperature. If you think a hot toddy is the answer to staying warm, think again. Alcohol causes blood vessels near the skin surface to open, so it only increases heat loss.

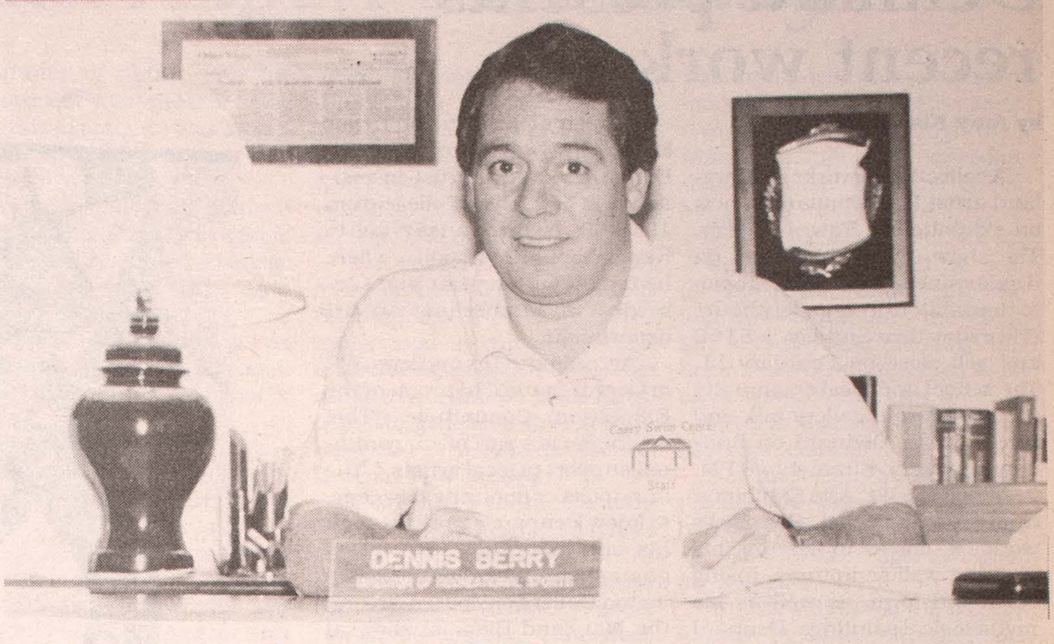
Dennis Berry brings the best to WC athletics

by Matt Giller



As both coach of the women's swim team and REC Sports organizer, Dennis Berry is one of the keys to the resounding success of Washington College athletics. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

When you walk into Dennis Berry's office in the swim center you instantly get the feeling this is not your typical "coach/former jock" office. It has the look of an office for a PhD or V.P. of a Fortune 500 company (minus, of course, a beautiful secretary named Inga). One is struck by his organization and the numerous plaques and memorabilia that decorate his walls as would mooseheads a hunter's den.

Those are just symbols of his success as a motivator and coach, as well as a human being with a keen business sense. His confident gait matched with his ability to make one feel comfortable with his slick and honest approach has made him into a real live Midas. Good fortune has followed this man wherever he has gone, and he brought his touch with him to W.C. in 1984. Since his arrival, Berry has formed a dominant swim team as well as the REC league, both of which seem to be growing every year. His aquatic experience, though, is what brought him to Washington College.

Berry began his sports career when he wrestled for 4 years at Division I power Loch Haven St. This led him to his first job as head wrestling coach and head aquatics director for Northwest Pennsylvania High School in Bradford ("the coldest spot in PA"). In his four years there, his teams compiled a 72% winning percentage in one of the best wrestling areas in the country.

From there, Berry's focus centered solely on aquatics and brought him to nearby Felton, DE and Lake Forest H.S. At Lake Forest he helped open the first indoor pool in Delaware south of Newark. He built the tremendously successful community access program from scratch, and he initiated swim teams for age groups as well as for the high school that were enthusiastically welcomed by the community.

In 1984 Dennis came to WC and watched the final bricks laid on the natatorium and envisioned a competitive women's swim team. Despite lacking many experienced swimmers, the inaugural season produced a respectable 2 wins and 3 losses. The swim team has seen incredible progress, and in the last two years the women have compiled an 18-3 record. This impressive record includes nine wins without a defeat this year against formidable Division III opponents, and in the process WC has become a feared team itself.

He modestly attributes the swim team's success to good assistants, being blessed by quality students who have athletic potential, and the fun environment created by team spirit. He feels the environment of the swim center represents the relaxed yet competitive attitude Division III swimming wants to express. Dennis supports the idea that goes along with this level of competition that one can compete without jeopardizing academics. This Division III attitude "maximizes the experience for the student athlete". Dennis doesn't deny that the aesthetically appealing swim center (98 Rock likened it to a country club) aids a great deal in recruiting.

At this moment he is working at organizing a men's varsity swim team. A men's club team was formed this year and he feels the "natural progression" would be for a varsity next year. Dennis maximizes the capabilities of the swim center by adding community and campus recreational facilities to the pool. While Dennis is juggling the fine line between community and campus activities at the pool, he seems to be equally proud of his duties and accomplishments as REC sports organizer(no, it's not Tim Keehan).

Due to a revealing survey administered by the athletic department two years ago, Dennis set up the REC league, which he calls a much needed "student service". At the time of the survey the intramurals had dropped to 6 events and the general interest was lost. The survey revealed that only 6% of the women participated because of a lack of events geared toward the female. The students also desired a "whole wide range" of activities; hence, the REC league was born. Created during August 1988, REC is built upon "3 tier leisure activities": Recreation - access for self-structured activities; Education - non-credit courses offered to all (i.e. aerobic dancing, sailing, scuba diving); and Competition - the intramurals, leagues and tournaments.

Dennis feels as a student service the REC league would be most successful if run by students with an enthusiasm similar to his. Students Deeann Pinczok, Charles "Tank" Duckett, Kristen Hilgartner, Chris Jamke and Tim Keehan take time away from their busy student/athletic duties to help make REC sports excel. Students responded with lively interest to the service perspective - as many as 1121 students participated in all of the events combined. This total is an incredible 500% increase from the year before.

The popularity of the REC league, Dennis feels, may be attributed to his marketing of the product. Dennis felt he was just a couple of "clicks on a combination lock" away from a successful program. His student staff in charge of publicity formed stat sheets and basketball programs that fueled an added competitiveness to the intramural league. This contributed to one of those "lock clicks" Berry wanted. There are now 36 events (up from 6 two years ago) and on any given Tuesday or Thursday night during the basketball season 25% of the student body will participate in intramurals.

Berry's influence has been spread abroad and overseas as well, playing the role as ambassador to Washington College. He was recently involved in a combined effort with the OAS and the Trinidad, Tobago Ministry of Youth Sport. Dennis worked with teachers and taught them basketball skill, as well as how to successfully operate a physical education class and pool facilities. Furthermore, Dennis spoke of his REC league accomplishments, among other things, at a conference in South Carolina that showcased speakers such as Pete Rozelle.

What generates Dennis Berry is not the rewards of plaques and commendations from governors and invitations to lectures and foreign countries. Instead it is the constant challenge of taking a new idea or "product" and making it as successful as it possibly can be. His spirit has seemingly disseminated to those around him and to much of the campus.

Sportswriter defends controversial remark

Matt Giller

One of my literary idols, Art Buchwald, once remarked that a writer has a unique occupation; a writer's raison d'etre oddly enough is criticism, good or bad, constructive or not. I am no Art Buchwald, of course, but I too welcome criticism. Therefore, in the wake of recent excoriation of my latest article on the basketball team and on some specific comments I made, I have been prompted to pen this article.

My comment regarding the lack of interest in the Wild Goose Classic this past December was chastised by team members and some concerned fans. For those who aren't aware of this, I titled the yearly tourney the "Lame Duck". I do not misuse The Elm as a device to blow flip comments at the basketball team like poison darts - this was not a flip comment. On the contrary, it was evidence based on the small turnout by the fans to all tournament games. The fans were expecting blowouts and seemed disinterested in the teams scheduled to play. Hence, I am not the only one who regarded last December's gala less than that.

I am a fan of Shoremen basketball and I also have friends on the team. My intention was not to sandblast my peers but to enlighten them and their coaches about the school's apparent view of the tournament. In the larger scope of things it is fine and dandy that we win our own tournament with as much ease as possible, especially when looking forward to a tough MAC schedule looming on the horizon. But to the fans and the alumni, who sometimes come cross country to see the tournament that left so many fond memories, let the trip be worthwhile. That is my point.

My meanings are not always as clear as I would like them to be. But writing for the school paper I must report as a reporter, a fan, and sometimes as a voice for the school community if I feel need for it. While I don't think the school paper's duty is to unduly praise a team's performance, I do think mention should be made about this year's team's outstanding progress that has them atop the division.

Dennard presents recent works

by Amy Klamberg

A collection of works by Maryland artist Eric Dennard is now on exhibition in Tawes Gallery. The show, which has been on display since January 17, is open to the public during gallery hours (Thursday thru Sunday, 1-5 PM) and will close on February 11. The school and local community are invited to a gallery talk and reception for Dennard on Sunday, February 4 from 4 to 6 PM.

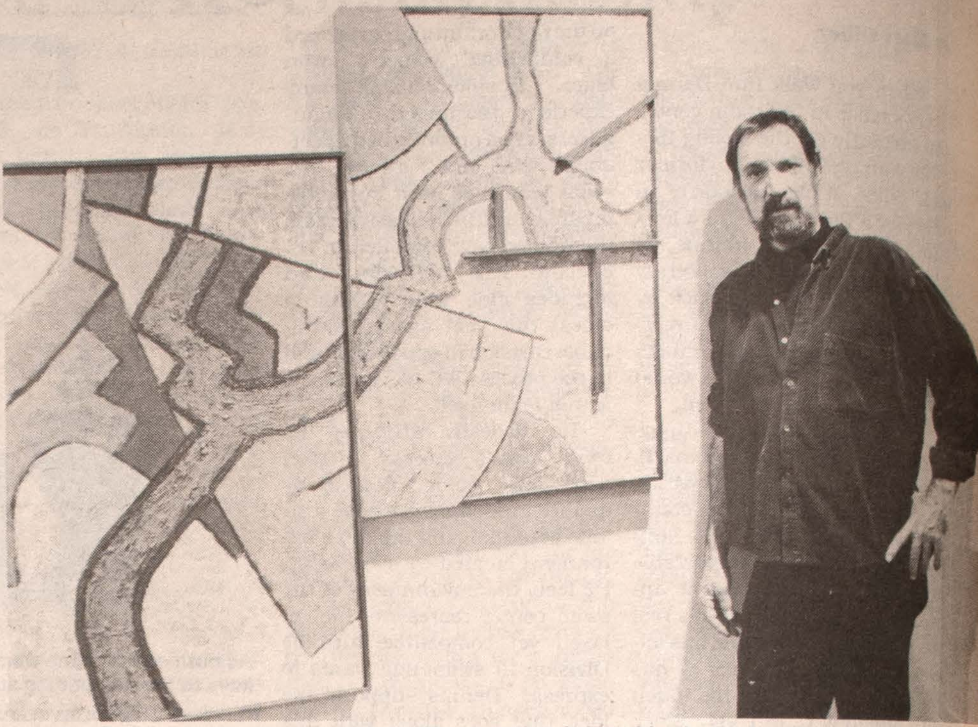
When the WC Arts Exhibition Committee selected Dennard's work, it chose to feature his abstract wall sculptures, fusing color and form, as well as his mythological paintings. Dennard utilizes vivid colors and patterns in his creations and explores innovative mediums, such as a combination of flat painting with three-dimensional wooden and canvas constructions.

Dennard explains that his paintings " deal with reassessment, change and growth," and describes the psychology of this " transition" theme in the context of his native Bayou country in East Texas. The 47 year-old artist began painting as a child and continued his art studies in

A current resident of Taylor Island in Dorchester County, Dennard served as artist-in-residence at St. Johns College from 1968-69, before transferring to Key School in Annapolis, where he taught for ten years and succeeded in establishing an art department.

According to Tex Andrews, WC art lecturer and Chairman of the Exhibition Committee, "This exhibition is a part of our continual support of local artists." The Annapolis community has come to know Dennard's work through his one man show as well as group shows, including the Washington Gallery of Modern Art and the Maryland Biennial show at the Baltimore Museum of Art.

Recent Works by Eric Dennard kicks off a busy semester for the Washington College Exhibition Committee. With the close of Dennard's show, the gallery, in celebration of Afro-American History Month, will present an exhibit of Eric Hammond's photography, commemorating the 1964 Civil Rights Movement. The show will include photographs of such prominent civil rights leaders as Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Ralph Abernathy.



Eric Dennard, a Dorchester County resident and Texas native, brings his abstract wall sculptures and mythological paintings to Tawes Lobby of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Dennard will hold a gallery talk in Tawes on Sunday, February 4, at 4 PM , with a reception to follow. The show, on display through February 14, is sponsored by the WC Arts Exhibit Committee. (photo by Bob Willis)

The Exhibition Committee, comprised of students and faculty, is planning to keep the exhibit on campus as a permanent part of a civil rights archive.

February's presentation will be followed by the Chestertown Arts League show, a World War II photography show by Constance Stuart Larrabee in April and the annual Student Art Show, which will be held in the recently completed Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center. Planning is also in the works for an exhibit in commemoration of the quincentennial of Columbus' discovery of America.

The Committee plans to meet later this semester to begin scheduling shows for next year.

Musician Shawn Colvin: diamond in the rough

by Bruce Hamilton

Shawn Colvin—has anyone heard of her? Every once in a while, an artist comes along that no one seems to have heard of before. Usually this is because he or she is relatively new and has just released a debut album. The record companies put forth little effort towards its promotion, and therefore the artist gets very little exposure. Because of this, critically acclaimed performers often record several albums without expanding their audience or receiving any real recognition. I enjoy listening to music that either no one has heard of or no one likes because this gives the music a certain novelty; it makes it unique.

I first heard Shawn Colvin on WHFS (99.1 FM) as I was driving. Weasel was interviewing her and playing songs from her album Steady On, which had just been released on Columbia Records. She was asked to play a song and performed the sixth track on the album Cry Like an Angel. There are few musicians who can perform a song live and give it the same intensity and concentration as when they were in the recording studio. With only an acoustic guitar and her voice, Shawn Colvin was not only impressive, she was excellent.

In the middle and late eighties there were many female vocalists appearing on the charts and on the radio. While Shawn Colvin belongs to the same genre the includes Suzanne Vega, Tracy Chapman, the Indigo Girls and even Edie Brickell, she is quite original and any comparisons made certainly fall short of her unique style. There is nothing political in her album—most of the songs revolve around the theme of individual experience. It could be considered part of a neo-folk movement that has been part of the progressive scene recently, with bands like Innocence Mission or Poi-Dog Pondering. Shawn Colvin is in this sense, reminiscent of a tradition that began in the sixties with singers like Judy Collins or Joan Baez.

The album opens with the title track "Steady On." It explores the aspects of a failed relationship and exemplifies the beautiful, melodic and dynamic qualities of Colvin's voice. The lyrics on the album range from fantastic to average. Colvin illustrates her ability to write lyrics that are brilliant and insightful. "Now I'm pulling out splinters/ And I'm off to hibernate somewhere/ For the nuclear winter/ Of another love affair." The production creates an ethereal atmosphere that emphasizes the mellow nature of the music.

Colvin is supported by several musicians on the album, including Bruce Hornsby and Suzanne Vega, who sings on the second track, "Diamond in the Rough." This and the third track, "Shotgun Down the Avalanche," are both memorable and haunting efforts, while "Stranded" is almost boring. "Another Long One" is a kinetic dance tune that might well be the best track on the album. Lyrically and musically, the track makes the listener sit up and take notice. It has the energy and fire that makes the whole album worthwhile.

The second half of the album is much like the first. Songs like "Ricochet in Time" and "The Story" are very poetic, but fall just short of being really good. Lyrics like "Sometimes I feel like a motherless child/ I gave nobody life, I am nobody's wife/ And I seem to be nobody's daughter" echo the somber mood of the second half and further define Colvin stylistically.

I found that while at first a few of the songs may seem only average, they have a tendency to grow on you. I recommend this album highly.

While it may only be found under "Developing Artist" in record stores, it is worth looking for. I predict great things from this singer/songwriter. While most music today is highly polished and overproduced with too many instruments and too much hype, it is refreshing to hear a solo artist like Shawn Colvin. She is definitely a diamond in the rough. You may not remember her name, but you will remember her voice.

Morgan gambles with Rupert's Birthday

by Stephanie Hess

A career in theater demands, among many qualities, the guts to take chances with one's creativity. Drama major Jennifer Morgan admits that her senior project is a bit weird, but it is Morgan's bravery that has the potential to make Rupert's Birthday a creative success.

Morgan has taken a five page monologue by Ken Jenkins and, by adding five performers, music, choreography and a womb, has turned the narrative into a dramatic representation.

The original script called for a single character, Louisa May, played by Jeanette Smith, to sit on stage and tell how her life has become "a constant regurgitation of a childhood event," says cast member Cynthia Croot. Croot continues to explain that though the woman has given up a normal life in preservation of the memory, the mood of the production is celebratory.

Summarizing the plot, Croot says Louisa May celebrates only one holiday, Rupert's Birthday. Rupert is a cow, born on a significant day in Louisa May's life. She helps birth Rupert, and she sees life enter his body. Later, she accompanies her father to the slaughter house where Rupert is killed, and she sees his life end. The play, Croot adds, is about the universality of life and death.

Morgan agrees with Croot's analysis, and says the universality is one reason she liked the play. She believes all people have events in their lives that have changed them, and all people have dealt with life and death on some level.

She thinks it is interesting that Louisa May's experience was a peaceful event that reflects the importance of nature and the environment, and yet at the same time, this experience was as significant as any other she could have had.

Originally, Morgan planned to produce her show in a night of one-acts with Ryder Daniels. With that in mind, she began searching for a one-act play that she liked. Rupert's Birthday was her favorite of the plays she read. She felt she "could bring a lot of myself to the play."

By designing the set, adding her own choreography and pulling Kate Bennet in to write original music for the production, Morgan makes the production very much her own. She adds that although playwright Ken Jenkins would not disagree with her production, he would perhaps wonder for a moment if it were his play.

The changes first came about when Morgan imagined, with difficulty, the staging of the calf's birth. She tells of consistently imagining the scene with music. Enter, Kate Bennet and three vocalists: Cynthia Croot, Kyndra Ponder, and John McDanolds.

She saw religious undertones in the play, in Louisa May's daily celebration of Rupert's birth. The music aids in conveying these undertones, as does the choreography in celebration of the birthday. Morgan views the choreography as a physical expression of Louisa May's change.

Morgan feels the music, additional movement and actresses Carey Smith and Emily Lott as the two cows, are necessary for the audience to truly remember Louisa May's story. Otherwise, she says, "if [Louisa May] just sat there, [the story] would pass over them too quickly."

In designing the set, Morgan was reminded of a statement made by Georgia O'Keefe's lover: "Women feel first through their womb." Laughingly conceding that her cast hates the quote, Morgan admits she likes it, and it seems to have inspired her set design. The play will be performed in the round, with the audience surrounding the stage. The audience and the stage will be enclosed in nine feet high walls of a "womb" that can only be entered through a "birthing canal" that leads off stage.

On the technical side of the production, Morgan is assisted by Deidre Reigle as Stage Manager and Alistair Paget as Lighting Designer.

Rupert's Birthday will be performed in Tawes Theater on February 8, 9, 10. Seating is limited; reservations can be made by calling extension 268 or 269.

Newell argues in support of active euthanasia

WC Philosophy Department Chairman J. David Newell, who is currently a visiting professor at West Point Academy, lectures on the right of the incurable, terminally ill to end their lives with the aid of a professional in his lecture, "An Argument for Active Euthanasia." The Wednesday talk will begin at 3:30 in the Sophie Kerr Room and is sponsored by Phi Sigma Tau, the national philosophy honor society. (photo courtesy of Kent County News)

J. David Newell, WC's philosophy department chairman who is currently a visiting professor at West Point Academy in New York, returns to campus Wednesday to present "An Argument for Active Euthanasia" in the Sophie Kerr Room.

The lecture is sponsored by Phi Sigma Tau, the national philosophy honor society. Says society president and junior Erika Dickson, "Everyone in the club is excited to have him come back."

Dr. Newell's talk will focus on the thesis he is presently working on for publication this summer: "If one has an incurable, terminal illness and does not want to experience a painful and/or undignified dying, one ought to have a legal right to a professionally assisted suicide."

Explains Newell, "I'm going to develop a concept of rational suicide acts." The argument is comprised of 12 steps in three parts: the morality of some rational suicides, the obligation to provide assistance, and the legal right to active euthanasia.

Passive euthanasia is legal in the US, but active euthanasia is still prohibited. [An act such as removing life support would be considered passive euthanasia whereas a physician or family member administering a lethal dose of drugs would be active euthanasia.] There have been attempts to pass assisted suicide legislation, particularly in California.

Two proposals are currently under discussion among California legislators, including one initiated by the state bar association which would legalize active euthanasia for those under the supervision of two physicians. Such proposals to the state government have been partly in a response to meet the AIDS crisis in California, according to Dr. Newell.

Teaching such courses as Medical Ethics and leading seminars on justice, Newell has been a integral part of Washington College's philosophy department since 1968, becoming department chairman in 1987.

As a visiting professor at West Point, Dr. Newell teaches one class, Medical Ethics. It is the first time the material has ever been presented at the academy, and West Point has offered him to stay on for a second year. It is the first time such an extension has ever been made to a visiting professor.

"An Argument for Active Euthanasia" will begin Wednesday afternoon at 3:30 in the Sophie Kerr Room.

ammendment was discussed and will be voted on at the next SGA meeting.

WC Coffee House Manager, Ryder Daniels, appeared before the SGA to request funds for two upcoming performances at the C-House. Daniels stated that he has tried to offer live entertainment every weekend but because of the lack of student support, the Coffee House lost a lot of money last semester. In fact, Daniels said, the C-House has no more money to fund entertainment for this semester. For this reason, the SGA approved $950 to pay for the two bands Daniels has already booked to play the Coffee House.

Gordy Scherer also announced his attempts to start a radio station on campus. He stated that a local station which goes off the air at 11 PM may be willing to rent air time to the College. If this works, then Scherer stated that the school may look into reserving a place for a radio station in one of the buildings on campus. If students are interested in starting a radio station on campus, they should contact Scherer at 778-0997.

Finally, sophomore Stuart Neiman announced his intentions to run for Student Government President 1990-91.

Said Neiman, "Given the fact that this legislative body in which I have done most of my work, I would like to officially declare my intention to seek out the SGA presidency for the 90-91 academic year. I do this in hopes that I will be able to continue and exceede the precedents set by past administrations."

Attias noted that SGA elections will be held on February 26 and that class elections will be held in late April.

Property vandalized

by Tracey Connell

What Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, called a "small disturbance" this week, many students are calling major damage.

Several pieces of furniture were broken, personal property destroyed and the main lounge of the Cecil dorm trashed this weekend by unidentified students.

According to Roderick, an assessment of the damage is currently being conducted and "certain people involved have come forth with their stories."

Names have been turned over to Student Affairs and the Student Conduct Council, but are as yet unavailable to the college community due to the Buckley Amendment, which restricts information contained in students' personal records. Both Roderick and Dean McIntire, of Student Affairs, thus refused to release their identities.

Hopefully you won't need to resort to these tactics to enjoy the Birthday Ball. The freshman class has spent a great deal of time and effort on this shindig, and it would be a shame if you didn't enjoy yourself. Try and get a date soon, though, because time is running out. And don't bother to ask the Numbers Lady™ - she's already got a date. I think I'm taking her to the Kitty Knight House.

sonal favorites is called C-Mart located in Bel Air, MD. If you don't see what you want on the floor ask one of the sales people to take you in the back. They have hundreds of overstocked designer gowns at drastically reduced prices, as well as a great selection of unique evening shoes, a necessary accent to the perfect dress.

For everyone in category three you have already decided to go all out for this evening so you want to do it right. Start with the basics. Treat yourself to some new silk lingerie. Even if you're only one who sees it, it will make you feel really special!

The perfect way to pick the wrong dress is to buy the first thing in the first store you see without even trying it on. Think of this dress as an investment. You want to do a little research. Go to several stores and JUST LOOK. Write down the styles you like, and talk to the sales people about what styles will best flatter your figure, not their's or your best friend's. You may even want to check out pattern books in fabric stores. This is an especially good idea if you want a custom made gown. But don't rule it out just because you are buying off-the-rack.

Often times bridal and dress shops will have extra styles or colors in the back, but not on display.

It is no secret that Chestertown is not a shopping metropolis. It only takes a walk down HIgh Street to find everything available.

A road trip to Baltimore, Annapolis, or Christiana may be in order, but DON'T GO UNPREPARED.

Get phone books from the area where you plan to shop, and call all of the shops. Tell them exactly what you want and ask if they have it or something similar. If they don't, there is no need to waste your time going there.

Don't limit yourself to department stores and bridal shops. It is not a crime to check out the bargain places, too.

Once you have the perfect dress, it is time to work on the rest of your appearance. How about treating yourself to a manicure, a facial, and a makeover? By the time February 17th rolls around there will be a brand new, beautiful you!

And last, but not least, our Dynasty Look! Bob Mackie's most recent show in Las Vegas highlighted the fashions and glitz of the city. To be the belle of the ball you can show up in nothing less than a solid sequin, bead, and rhinestone "Wheel of Fortune" cape lined with ostrich feather marabue with a silver rhinestone studded hood to match. But there is a catch. This particular gown is sold with a health warning.

Due to the excessive weight of its jewels this Mackie masterpiece left large welts on the model's shoulder at his Vegas show. So if you're into pain and just happen to have several thousand dollars, you can bring this Las Vegas sensation to Chestertown.

Whichever category you fall into with a few dollars set aside and a little creative thinking you can make this the best Birthday Ball ever!

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Hope those of you who attended dinner Wednesday enjoyed the J.P. Brokerage Food Show. The keylime pie and the pretzels were two very popular items as were the health muffins.

On behalf of the Wellness Council, I would like to express my thanks and appreciation to all those who helped with all the programs, this past week, and hope those of you who attended all the special functions enjoyed them. Don't forget, you still have time to enter the Logo contest. Deadline for entries is March 1, 1990.

Sunday, the WCDS will feature an 'EYE OPENER' BRUNCH BUFFET from 11:00am to 12:30pm. The menu will include fresh fruit bar, cheese blintzes with toppings, deep dish cheese omlet, bacon, French toast strips, assorted Danishes and apple turnovers. With offerings like that, who could resist?

The WCDS is again taking orders for Valentine cakes. The cakes are heart shaped, come in your choice of devils food or yellow cake, festively decorated. The cost is $9.50 plus tax for each cake. Orders will be accepted through February 12th and can be placed by calling the Dining Hall at ext. 252. You may pick up you cake on either Tuesday, February 13th, of Wednesday, February 14th, from 1:00 - 4:00p.m. only.

Next Wednesday's dinner will celebrate Chinese New Year's - The Year of the Horse. Don't miss it.

Until next week.................................MOM.

This breakthrough Soviet work (there are scenes of almost explicit sex and much drunken unhappiness), is a protrait of a boozing working-class family in which the daughter, Vera, a coarse girl just out of high school, streaks her hair and sleeps around; a Russian rebel without a cause. When she falls in love with a hamdsome student, she brings him into the apartment, and the movie becomes a vodka-soaked All in the Family. Shot in the exotic port city of Zhdanov, the movie seems to be saying that there is no way out, not even for the young and sensually arrogant. It is, finally, the first "realistic" look at contemporary Soviet life and that alone makes the film a fascinating document of our times. (In Russian with English subtitles)

Security faces concerns from officer assault to fire alarm

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

On Tuesday evening at approximately 8:00 PM, Washington College Security received a call from a concerned student concerning a "suspicious individual in the crosswalk area," said Director Jerry Roderick.

The individual in the crosswalk had apparently fallen and was "lying halfway in the road."

According to Roderick, Seargent Lenny Thompson responded to the call. When he approached the suspect "he was eventually assaulted."

Seargent Thompson was struck about the head before the suspect escaped, but was not seriously injured.

A chase ensued, which lead off campus.

According to Roderick, the Chestertown police intervened and the suspect was subsequently apprehended. He is a resident of the nearby town of Saint Michaels and has several warrants issued on him by the state of Maryland.

He has been charged in this incident with assault and resisting arrest and is currently incarcerated.

Security truck windows smashed

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Windows of a Washington College Security truck parked behind Hodson Hall were smashed in Sunday morning, January 28.

According to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security, the truck was parked behind the building at approximately 12:50 AM. Security officer Jake Williams, upon returning to the vehicle, discovered that the windshield was severely damaged, and both the passenger window and rear window were broken out.

Two bricks were used in the crime. They are currently in the Security office.

Roderick dispelled rumors that the perpetrators were actually disgruntled students who were kicked out of the Coffee House on Saturday night during the performance of the band Plaid Rabbit. According to Roderick, "Security made frequent checks and no students were asked to leave by officers or Coffee House personnel." He added that they discovered "no problems that required any response."

The incident is still under investigation and there were no suspects at the time of this writing.

Students cited for fire extinguisher incident

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Three students have been "apprehended" for spraying fire extinguishers which set off fire alarms in three dorms this Tuesday, February 6, according to Jerry Roderick, Director of Security. The unidentified students also caused damage to students' possessions in one dorm room.

On Tuesday, February 6, at 2:50 AM Washington College Security was notified that building alarms were activated in the Caroline and Queen Anne dormitories. The alarms were acti-

Computer survey results revealed

By Ryder Daniels

The preliminary results of the Student Computing Survey administered on January 15 at Registration have been compiled. Members of the Student Survey Sub-Committee of the ACC, Dr. Emily Amt, John Kelly and Ryder Daniels, compiled the results of nine questions that are relevant to potential improvements that can be made to campus computing this semester.

Those questions include: What workshop formats would students like? When should workshops be given and on what topics? Are more hours needed at the Computing Center? Would students be in favor of a $5/semester computing fee to allow free laser printing and what should be Washington College's top priority in the area of computing in the immediate future?

The additional 79 questions will be compiled by computer and will be available to the committee for review later in the semester when the ACC will develop long-range planning.

As a result of the survey, the Academic Computing Committee responded to overwhelming student interest in the placement of a Computer Lab Assistant in Miller library, similar to the Lab Assistant position in the Computing Center. Over ninety-one percent of students who answered the question thought that a Lab Assistant in the library would be a good idea.

Freshman Tom Shepherd and Sophomore Brian Gimelson will fill the new library position which will be operational early next week. The new Lab Assistant will work from 8-11 pm, Sundays through Thursdays to assist students with the Macintosh.

Committee member Bill Tubbs, Director of Miller Library, has worked with the library staff in developing a workstation for the Lab Assistant in the fish bowl. The library Lab Assistant will check out computer disks and help students with problems they may encounter while using the machines. In addition to answering questions, the Lab Assistant will be able to show students how to use new software, for example how to convert their MacWrite files and use Microsoft Word 4.0, the new campus word processor that eliminates all the problems of the old MacWrite as well as offering many new features such as automatic footnoting and a built-in spell checker. Word 4.0 is the word processor recommended by the ACC as the best one to use, and also the safest and least likely to produce a "system error." Seniors writing a thesis are advised to convert to Word 4.0 if they have not done so.

The Lab Assistant will also help with showing students how to back up their work so that it is not lost in the event of a disk failure.

In addition to the computer and record keeping facilities, the new Lab Assistant's desk will have a "Hotline" phone that automatically dials the Lab Assistant at the Computing Center. This will be particularly useful to easily call for help during the hours when the Library Lab Assistant is not there. There is a Lab Assistant in the Computing Center during all their hours of operation.

Finally, the committee is considering implementing a $5/semester computing fee beginning in the Fall of 1990 to allow laser printing at no charge, and possibly extending the hours that computers are available for student use. Sixty-four percent of

by Karen Iacangelo

On January 22, 1990, one member of the Washington College Newman Club attended the 16th annual pro-life rally in Washington, DC. The annual rally marked the anniversary of the Supreme Court decision of Roe vs. Wade. This decision made the right to have an abortion a federal law. Although the Newman Club sponsored a culture van ride to the rally, no Washington College students signed up for the trip, possibly due to the fact that little notice was given prior to the event, which was held on a Monday.

Also attending the rally were many religious and political leaders including President Bush, who was not there in person, but

Fire extinguishers and personal responsibility

Although the perpetrators of the incident involving a fire extinguisher gone out of control are no doubt repentant, the occurrence raises some disturbing questions about students' responsibility for their actions; not just in terms of the SCC, but also in terms of responsibility to the College community, and to themselves.

When we arrive at Washington College, we're presumed to be well on our way to achieving the maturity that accompanies adulthood. Childish pranks such as this one don't fit into that mold. What's more, this wasn't than just a "childish prank"; this prank frightened dorm residents, and damaged the possessions of a couple of students. It can't be dismissed, no matter how well-intentioned the spree was, nor how drunk the perpetrators supposedly were.

Unfortunately, incidents such as this always affect the community negatively. There shouldn't be much noise about lowering the drinking age for awhile—and rightly so, because of a couple of lugheads who couldn't think clearly enough to know that spraying a fire extinguisher and setting fire alarms inside dorms isn't funny!

The proposed addition of a social code to the Honor Code is almost—almost—beginning to look like a good idea in the face of occurrences like this one. After all, it may be effective on students who can't make up their own minds to act responsibly.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Klein challenges Williams' criticism of philosophy

To the Editor:

In a recent letter Mr. Williams "challenged" students to "put Washington College on the political map with a student fund-raising drive to help the students of Czechoslovakia." This is a worthy "challenge."

Unfortunately, Williams also chose to criticize a group of philosophy students who requested (and were denied) funds for a conference. Because of this, the strength of his "challenge" was lost. The connection between general student apathy and specific philosophy students' interest in attending an academic conference was left unclear, and the reader may have missed the main point of his article.

The reader may have been led to believe that requesting monies for academic conferences, specifically philosophy conferences, is politically irresponsible and therefore immoral.

Such an implication, though, presupposes that fund-raising is the only important contribution someone committed to a political cause can make. This is not true. Almost every day, academics (from all disciplines) make important contributions— in their classrooms, through publications and by attending academic conferences.

Furthermore, one is naive not to recognize that underlying every great political movement is ideology. and ideology, if it is to be more than empty jargon, must be supported by sound argument. Developing such arguments requires philosophical skill. and, tuning one's philosophical skills requires, among other things, attending conferences where experts concerned with supporting such ideologies are attendance.

Parenthetically, the philosophy conference in question was such a conference. the students who attended (unfunded) learned a great deal about philosophy in general and about arguments against oppression in particular.

The importance of Williams' plea for political responsibility may have been undermined by his criticism of some very committed students. I know the students will survive this attack unscathed (for they are philosophers); I do not know that the college will. It is important to note that societies have always viewed philosophy and philosophers as worthless, dangerous or evil. Plato discusses this in The Republic. He cautions us that this misguided view is ultimately harmful to the society (or institution) which holds it. Surely George Washington would have understood this as well.

Nonsmokers speak out against smoking in public

To the Editor:

We would like to bring up a matter of obvious injustice which is occurring here at the college. The world around us is moving into the 21st century, but here at Washington College we are still living in the Middle Ages. We are referring to the barbarous, backward, uncivilized, offensive, foul, and rude habit of smoking in public places. More specifically we are referring to the halls of Bill Smith prior to, and after classes. Why is it that the minority, who wishes to slowly commit suicide, must force the majority, who does not smoke, to enter a dense toxic cloud of noxious smoke while walking to class? Why is it that the majority must be dragged along by the minority in the mindless pursuit of death? Why is it that while the world progresses, Washington College remains firmly entrenched by unattractive and foolish ways of the past? An educated and truly concerned administration should not allow the senseless minority to jeopardize the health of the nonsmoker. If the College Administration does not have a minimal amount of concern to suggest that students smoke outside, the smokers themselves should have enough moral rectitude to go outside and let the rest of us breath. We understand that this letter is a bit harsh, but its pretty harsh to be forced to breathe the stuff. Inhale . . . exhale.

OPINION

ISSUE: WC has begun to show environmental conscientiousness with its aluminum recycling program. What other measures might the College take in order to expand the recycling program?

Recycling effort needs active support from WC

Kyndra Ponder

Recently, a lot of attention has been paid to recycling on the Washington College Campus. In my humble opinion, that is very good.

Now, when you say that Washington College is participating in the recycling effort, most people will think of the plastic bins that are put in many of the dorms on campus for aluminum cans. I wonder, however, if very many students (and faculty alike) would consider the bin that has been in the Coffee House for eons that is marked "clear glass," "brown glass," "green glass," etc. Yes, you guessed it, that bin is for recyclable glass! Unfortunately, until this week, I have NEVER seen anything in that wooden crate and I have never seen anyone PUT ANYTHING into it! Yet that lonely box sat there for week after week just waiting for someone to want to recycle.

Not only does the Coffee House participate in the recycling effort, but so do the Computing Center and many of the Academic Departments on campus. Have you ever noticed the box of paper sitting in front of the Computing Center lab assistant's desk that is usually full of paper? That paper, along with the waste paper from the departments is recycled.

Now that students and faculty are aware of the recycling efforts, the next natural question would be, "Is Washington College doing all that it can to recycle?" I would say, NO! It is fairly easy to see where the school could improve.

Take for example, the glass bin in the Coffee House. Students should be made more aware of its existence and be encouraged to use it. Not only did that big bin in the C-house go virtually unnoticed by students, but so has a smaller, much less noticeable box in the mailroom. When students get mail that they don't read (and gee, how many times a week does that happen?) that mail goes either into the garbage can or it goes onto the floor, leaving that poor little "I'm a Recycler" box empty. Part of the problem could be the "little" part. The box sits on the table and it is about 8 inches by 11 inches and is less deep than an average book. It certainly doesn't attract much student attention—obviously!

In order to alleviate the problems of the lonely recycling bins, I challenge the administration of Washington College to take action. Because the SGA could not afford to place bins for cans in all of the dorms, administration should pitch-in for the rest of the money. Secondly, paper recycling bins should be made larger and more available to students and to faculty— after all, this is a college and a lot of waste paper is produced daily. Thirdly, bins for bottles should be added to the can bins in many dorms. (After all, beer— and soda— does come in both cans and bottles)

Finally, I would like to see the Dining Hall staff become as conscious about our environment as they are about making money. By that I mean when the dining services feels that it is necessary to serve us meals on paper plates, I would like to know that those plates are being recycled. The napkins and refuse form the kitchen are perfect candidates for the recycling bins and above all, I would like to see the styrofoam carry-out trays changed to recyclable paper trays.

I know that I am probably just an overly-concerned student who cares about recycling. Maybe that is true! I just don't want to come back to Washington College to find that the school has buried itself in its own garbage!

Many students have many more boxes than they need. Since it is hard and costly to provide a storage room for these, WC should get these boxes recycled.

...what my high school did...was have a compost heap for kitchen refuse. It saved space, money,...and it gave the earth helpful nutrients. With recycling newspapers and aluminum cans WC can help students [become] aware that we are an environmentally conscious campus.

Maybe if the school sponsored some kind of recycling program where students could volunteer for a recycling drive, and a person like Bob Svec could be in charge.

Carolin Leibig

They should make it easier for people to recycle. Perhaps put bins for paper, cans, glass bottles in every dorm. As long as it is still more convenient to throw things in trash cans, that will continue.

Anne Bottorf

Freshman

They should make plastic containers available to all dorm floors in order to make it easier for students to recycle cans, tabs, and boxes.

WC should also consider other measures of recycling such as the recycling of glass and paper in the dorms (not just aluminum).

Despite the inconvenience factor, recycling is worth the effort

Stuart Neiman

One of the greatest problems associated with declaring one's intent to seek out political office, is that once you have done it, everyone you meet is convinced that everything that you do and say is going to be politically motivated. So, not wanting to disappoint anyone, let me tell you that my interest in recycling is most definitely politically motivated. In real life, I do not want to be bothered any more than the next guy by having to make sure that I choose the right garbage (oh excuse me,"recycling") can in which to place my empty coke can. This is about as political as you can get, recognizing convenience as being more important than the long term gains that can be achieved by recycling.

The real world though, dictates that we must take under consideration the fact that a majority of what is typically disregarded as trash, has a very real value. This value is not perhaps realized when looking at it from the prospective of the per unit gain (5 cents per can).

If you want to get a better idea of just how much of a valuable commodity used beer and soda cans can be, just visualize every can used in a seven day period on campus sitting in Clint Baer's office. As I am sure that you can see, even an office of that magnitude would scarcely hold even a quarter of the cans which could be collected in that period of time. My God, if we were to only collect aluminum cans from the area around the quad dorms (for those of you who do not get out much like myself I am referring to Dorchester, Talbot and the ever-popular Cecil House), we should be able to decrease the per student tuition by at least $5,000.00.

In spite of this seemingly sarcastic tone, it should be clear to all that there is a real source of money to be obtained through a properly organized recycling effort. Student government has dedicated time and energy to seeing that the implementation of this program will run smoothly.

The involvement of Clint Baer's office, though a nice gesture on his part, was a mistake. Through his involvement, the responsibility for the maintenance of these cans has fallen into the hands of the dorms' cleaning ladies. As a resident of Kent House, I can say that Ethel has enough to do without having to worry about making sure that there are no aluminum cans in the trash receptacles before she takes them out. This is something that I do not expect Mr. Baer to agree with since having read his mindless attack (in writing on February 1st) on the way the eight cleanest dorms on campus are maintained.

All in all, the recycling effort is something which can benefit all the students of Washington College. Students, such as Jim Finlay and his SGA recycling committee, have put a lot of work into the implementation of this program and their efforts should be applauded. The concept of this program is just fine, it is within the plan of execution that the problems begin to arise.

Regardless of these problems, I would urge every student to at least give this program a chance. Take the extra few steps; it is all of us who will benefit in the end.

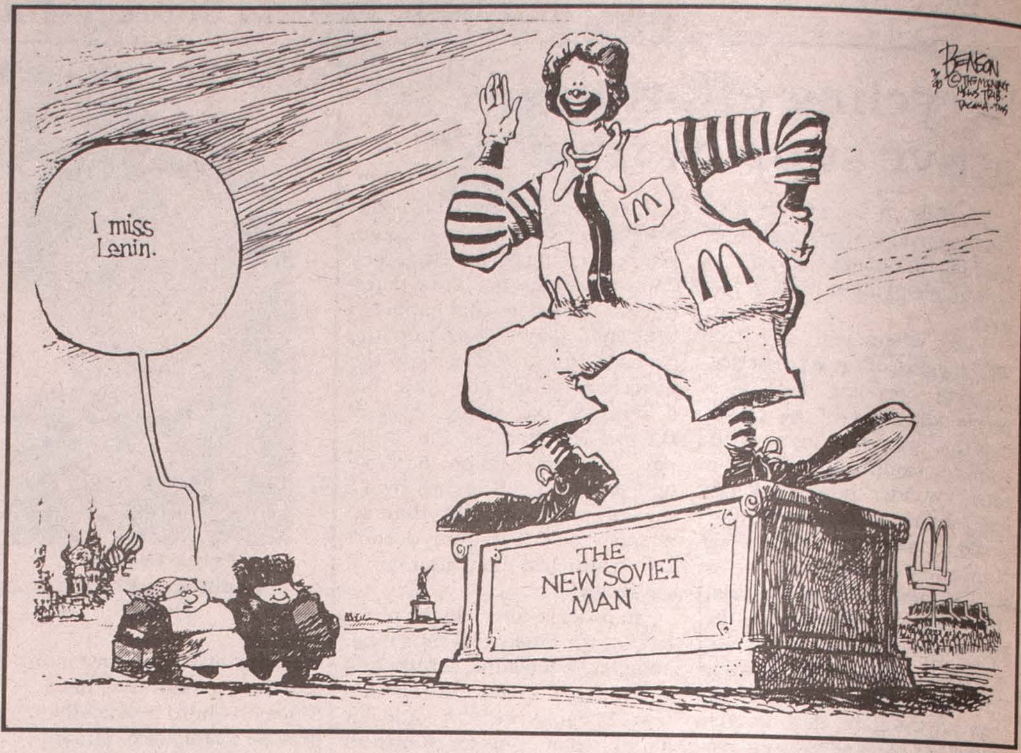
News from around the world: ANC legalized



UNITED STATES:

US District Judge Harold H. Greene ordered former president Ronald Reagan to give videotaped testimony in the trial of his former national security advisor John Poindexter. This follows an order by given by Judge Greene for Reagan to turn over his personal diaries to Poindexter's lawyers. In a 54 page opinion, Judge Greene stated he felt that Poindexter had shown that the former president's testimony was needed to ensure a fair trial for Poindexter.

Lawyers for the former president have suggested that the privacy of the diaries is protected by the Constitution. But Judge Greene has rejected a request by the Justice Department that reproduction of excerpts from the diaries be postponed. Greene feels there is no reasonable cause.

The former president was asked to testify because a large part of Poindexter's defense is that the president authorized some of the activities he was involved in. Poindexter is charged with five felony counts of conspiracy, lying to Congress, and obstructing the Iran-Contra inquiry.

In the opening statements in his defense of Exxon Valdez Captain Joseph J. Hazelwood, attorney Dick Madson told jurors that it is not uncommon for oil tankers to be guided through the straits in Prince William Sound by junior officers.

Hazelwood faces up to seven years in prison and $61,000 in fines if convicted. Madson hopes to prove, using a computer mode,l that if Hazelwood's commands that night had been carried out the tanker would not have hit Bligh Reef. The prosecution hopes to show how Hazelwood's supposed drinking and his absence from the bridge caused the accident.

In the budget war, the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee warned Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney that the Pentagon budget for 1991 is a minimum of 10 billion dollars too high. The Senate wants bigger cuts in weapon programs and fewer American troops in Europe.

Republicans on the committee said they were ready to fight for defense programs, citing the growing instability in the Soviet Union as a reason not to cut too heavily into the defense budget.

SOVIET UNION:

Mikhail Gorbachev told the leaders of the Communist party that they should end the constitutional monopoly the party holds on power. In a speech to the Central Committee, he said that while the party would continue to strive to be the ruling party, it would do so only in within a democratic framework. Such a change would not immediately affect Gorbachev's position, since he is both the leader of the Communist party and Head of Government. It would, however, hopefully lessen some of the tension between the party and the nationalist groups that have been formed in some of the republics.

A multi-party system has been illegal since 1917 when the Bolsheviks lost a legislative election shortly after the revolution. Gorbachev is breaking with 70 years of tradition. But in some of the non-Russian Soviet republics, the Communist party is already on the defensive.

At a meeting of the central committee, two of the speakers urged greater discipline and a return to a more authoritarian rule. Yet, the feeling among Gorbachev's supporters was that while the conservatives may not like the changes he has proposed, they would have no real alternative to them. The Central Committee voted late Tuesday to end the Communist Party's monopoly on power.

SOUTH AFRICA:

Last Friday, South African President F.W. de Klerk announced he was lifting the ban on the African National Congress (ANC) and other black political movements. Black nationalist leaders see this as a chance to begin to mobilize the black community, while white leaders and businessmen are focusing on improved foreign relations and sanctions being lifted.

de Klerk is urging black nationalists to give up violence and try obtain their goals through negotiation.

President Bush announced he would invite President de Klerk and Nelson Mandela separately to the United States. Mandela is a member of the formerly outlawed ANC, and is currently still in prison. As one of the terms of his release, he wants the government of South Africa to lift the state of emergency in the country.

COSTA RICA:

Voters in Costa Rica elected Rafael Calderón Jr president. Calderón, a member of the Socialist Christian Unity Party, won 51% of the vote, defeating Carlos Manuel Castillo of the National Liberation Party.

Calderón will succeed President Oscar Arias Sanchez. Calderón has been a critic of Arias' Central American peace plan, which called for the dismantling of the US backed Contras in Nicaragua. Calderón's father was once President of Costa Rica. He fled to Nicaragua after a bid for reelection caused a civil war. (In many Latin American countries, a president is constitutionally barred from reelection.) His son, the president-elect, was born in Nicaragua. This was Calderón's third bid for the presidency.

As the Maryland General Assembly closes its first month in session, the issue of abortion is now officially a topic before the legislature. House Bill 432 and Senate Bill 356, both titled Abortion-Omnibus Bill, have been introduced in their respective houses. The following is a synopsis of the bill:

Revising statutory abortion provisions; authorizing licensed physicians to perform abortions on minors without parental notice if the minor is mature and capable of informed consent or parental notice may lead to physical or emotional abuse; requiring counseling and informed consent of minors prior to abortion; prohibiting State interference with the decision of a woman and her physician to perform an abortion if specified conditions exist; setting penalties; making provisions severable; and relating thereto.

In its present form, Maryland law requires parental notification in the case of minors and the meeting of at least one of the following conditions: 1) the pregnancy could bring about the death of the mother; 2) the pregnancy could impair the mother's physical/mental health; 3) there exists a considerable danger of the child being unhealthy; 4) the pregnancy is the result of a rape. All abortions must also be passed by a hospital abortion review authority, which will keep a record of all abortions.

If these bills can make their way into law, then the existing laws will be loosened considerably which will give women a greater right to privacy.

On a more general scale, bills have been coming out of committee at a steady pace and things in Annapolis are moving faster. The budget is still in the Senate's Budget and Taxation Committee. This year's budget is proposed at $11.8 billion dollars, an increase of about $600 million over last year's budget.

Another fun-filled Chestertown weekend

Another fabulous weekend has shown up at Washington College's doorstep. A time for relaxation and recreation, but among all the cries of "T.G.I.F." I hear the dreadful echo of, "there's nothing to do." Contrary to popular belief, Chestertown is not the bellweather of major societal activity as the school's admission brochures claim. The social life available to the students at this "fine institution" is rather limited both on and off campus.

Students have one or two possibilities for fun when they venture off campus in search of quality entertainment. There is, on the one hand, Chestertown's state-of-the-art movie theater. This modern cinematic showcase gives students the glorious option of seeing one movie. Although this "option" does not appeal to too many people, one must admit that it cuts down on arguments over which movie to see.

For the truly daring, bold enough to journey over the bridge, Chestertown presents its indispensable "Bowl-A-Rama." Yes, nestled in the fertile lowlands of Maryland's Eastern Shore, the bowling alley is an underrated source for student amusement. In all honesty, I have gone to the bowling alley once—during my trip here for my freshman interview I stopped in to use the bathroom.

However, there does seem to be some future hope for off campus thrill seekers. A report from a "secret" source claims that Chestertown is about to construct a brand new combination restaurant and car wash, appropriately titled: "The Stuff 'n' Buff."

Students desiring to remain on campus do not fare much better in their quests for juvenile fun. C-House parties are used as a very last resort and fraternity parties are few and far between. In the face of such boredom students tend to hang out in small groups in their dorm rooms.

This "hanging out" implies that students will be drinking the "eternal roommate for all lonely collegians," alcohol. The worthy activities pursued by these small groups, to a large degree, revolve around beer and playing drinking games. Some play an engaging game of "Caps," some play a rousing game of "Mexican," and others play a meaningful game of "Quarters."

Obviously, it would be wrong to stereotype all college students as work-avoiding, sleep-hungry booze hounds. There are a few, a very few, who actually drink responsibly. Yet the activities these students choose to engage in are a little "strange." I have heard undocumented rumors that small groups of sober people stay up very late trying to memorize all the lyrics to the "Morton Downey Jr. Sings" album. As an alternative, these very same people play Menudo records backwards in search of satanic messages. These activities, while appearing a bit "out of the mainstream," do promote healthy, responsible drinking patterns. Furthermore, these types of activities should be encouraged in the future and its present participants, you know who you are, should be commended.

In conclusion, there is no doubt that the social life at this school revolves around alcohol. However, if the present activities of the students continue into the future, they will die of boredom before they die of alcohol poisoning. In the future I will be revealing my findings on a new underground movement at the school: people who do not wear underwear to class, and are damn proud of it.

Basketball continues win streak

by Matt Giller

After playing in several overtime games and other close wars of attrition, the Shoremen took an out of conference blow to catch their breath. By beating Western Maryland 85-65 and York 85-73, the WAC bring the winning streak to a superlative nine games and appear primed for the tough conference final stretch.

Road warriors for two weeks, the Shoremen came home to face Western Maryland and showed these Jethros how to put the pumpkin through the peach basket. Things looked bright for the Shoremen going into the game, as they had defeated the Green Terrors for five straight years. This statistic coupled with WC's momentum to make things promising before the opening tipoff. Senior guard Chris Brandt was cold on the night and scored only five points, but Tank Duckett took the leadership role once again. Duckett poured in a career-high 27 points, including 4 3-pointers. The Shoremen controlled the flow of the game throughout the first half and went into the locker room with a commanding 41-29 padding.

The less than mean Green Terrors never got any closer while sending the Shoremen to the foul line 27 times in the second half (the WAC hit 20). The Shoremen's tenacious defense dazed and confused the opposing juggernauts into a 43% shooting night. Sophomore Tim Liddy had the hot hand in the paint with 12 points, matching Tim Keehan's 12. Freshman Peter "Razzle-dazzle" Basel followed with 10 points, while C.J. Johnson and Chris "Bull" Jamke tallied 6 and 5 points respectively. Senior Jerry "Hoosiers" Peden was also in the scoring column for the Shoremen.

The WAC's next challenge was up in Pennsylvania against a tough York squad that had plagued them in the past. Brandt came back from his poor shooting night to lead the men of shore with 25 points. 15 of Squirrel's points came in the first half of the game, but the game remained tight at the midway point. The second half, however, the Shoremen took over. Keehan scored 15 of his 20 points in the last twenty minutes, and Duckett scored all 15 of his points in the second half. Windex man of the year Chris Jamke tore down 15 rebounds and added 19 points from the floor. Liddy added 6 points as the WAC kept their winning streak alive.

WC returns home this weekend for a conference game against Ursinus this Saturday. The WAC may have already clinched their MAC title in their February 7 game against Haverford.

Spring lockout: strike three?

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

In the 1980's, the sports world was frequently marred by substance abuse problems as well as greed from both owners and players. All professional sports were overwhelmed by drug and alcohol problems during the decade. Both football and baseball had to deal with constant power struggles between the players and management. The baseball disputes caused two strikes, while football gave us the less than memorable "scab games".

Sports fans hoped that these problems would disappear with the end of the decade. Unfortunately, substance abuse and labor disputes are already dominating the sports scene in 1990.

Darryl Strawberry became the first sports figure to admit to substance abuse this year. The Mets outfielder admitted his problems with alcohol last weekend, and he admitted himself to the same clinic visited by Dwight Gooden a few years ago. One can only hope that Strawberry's thirty-day treatment will be able to help him, but his problem is just another case of a star athlete succumbing to the pressure put on him by media and fans.

Still, there is the distinct possibility that Darryl's stay in the rehab clinic won't cause him to miss any of spring training. This is because the Major League Players Association and the owners are in the middle of another labor dispute. This year's battle is different from the past problems. The owners are scheduling a lockout to delay the beginning of spring training. With a lockout, the owners avoid having to pay the players any part of their salary before the season starts and the dispute is settled.

The disputes are also slightly different this time around. The owners are attempting to institute the controversial Pay-For-Performance salary structure, a system that would base a player's income on their offensive and defensive statistics. The owners say that this system would benefit both the players and the management, while the union prefers the pay structure they presently have.

This year's lockout may be one of the most blatant displays of greed in recent memory. Bad blood still exists between the groups as a result of the collusion hearings that took place a few years ago. Those hearings proved that the owners had conspired to avoid signing free agents in an effort to control salaries.

The players can't complain about collusion this season. Pascual Perez, a man who once missed a game because he couldn't get off the Atlanta Freeway, was signed to a 3-year, 4.6 million dollar contract by the Yankees. John Shelby batted .150 for the Dodgers last season, but this winter they team gave him a 200,000 dollar pay raise. A numbers of players have recently signed contracts that will give them over 3 million dollars a year. Why should they want to change the pay structure?

This brings us to the owners. What made them think the players would want to change from a salary structure that has brought them monstrous salaries throughout the offseason? As far as the players are concerned, there is no problem with the present system. If the owners ever had any hopes of instituting a new salary system, they did an extremely poor job of setting the players up for the changes. The owners seem to have defeated themselves. While earlier disputes have been caused by player demands, this year's lockout is the fault of the management.

This brings us to the main problem with the lockout. Management is making money hand over foot, and the players' salaries are at an all-time high. The fact that the season may still be delayed is further evidence to the greed that currently exists in pro sports. Darryl Strawberry may control his drinking in thirty days, but it seems there are bigger problems in baseball this winter.

Two male and two female intramural basketball teams from Washington College will compete with up to 50 other area colleges and universities during the Schick Super Hoops Regional Tournament. The tournament takes place at George Washington University this Saturday.

The on campus preliminary round crowned the Young Guns as the champs and the Racqueteers as the runners-up. Leather and Lace captured the championship in the women's league with the BSers coming in as the runners-up. All of these teams have advanced to the intercollegiate tournament which is being held this weekend.

From the regional tournament, the top two teams will advance to play the championship game at the NBA arena during half-time of an NBA game. In addition to participating in the double-elimination regional tournament, each player will also participate in the "K-Swiss Shootout". Prizes include K-Swiss basketball shoes, T-shirts, sweatshirts, Schick Slim Twin Disposable Razors and plaques.

Schick Super Hoops is the country's largest college recreational sports program in the country with more than 800 participating schools and 200,000 students. Regional tournaments are conducted in 22 regions across the country.

Hollander documents Civil Rights Movement

by Amy Klamberg

As part of Washington College's semester-long celebration of African- American history and culture, the WC Art Exhibits Committee presents an exhibit of photographs by Ed Hollander. The show, entitled "The Civil Rights Movement: Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama 1964-1966," includes over 50 photographs documenting various aspects of the Civil Rights Movement, and will be on display from February 14 to March 4.

Ed Hollander, born and raised in Baltimore, left college early, choosing instead to travel around the South and participate in the growing movement for civil rights.

According to Special Events Coordinator and exhibit curator Marshall Williams, Hollander was "an amateur photographer who found himself recruited to take pictures as documentation of rallies and speeches."

The artist continued to travel throughout the South, passing through Louisiana, Alabama, North Carolina and Florida for the next three years, practicing his newfound love of photography and aiding the cause of civil rights activists. He firmly held that the main barriers to racial equality could be broken down through education and work.

During this time, between 1964-1966, Hollander became the Field Secretary for the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and took on an even more active role in the drive for civil rights.

The photographs in this exhibit document such facets of the Civil Rights Movement as, marches and protests, such as the famous 1965 march to Montgomery from Selma, Alabama, led by Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr, voter registration drives, and especially the 1964 slaying of three civil rights workers in Mississippi.

The dark side of the era is particularly captured in pictures of the Klu Klux Klan burning effigies and holding rallies. Even so, Hollander also captures the sense of selflessness and volunteerism that was growing during this time in his pictures of CORE activities and civil rights rallies.

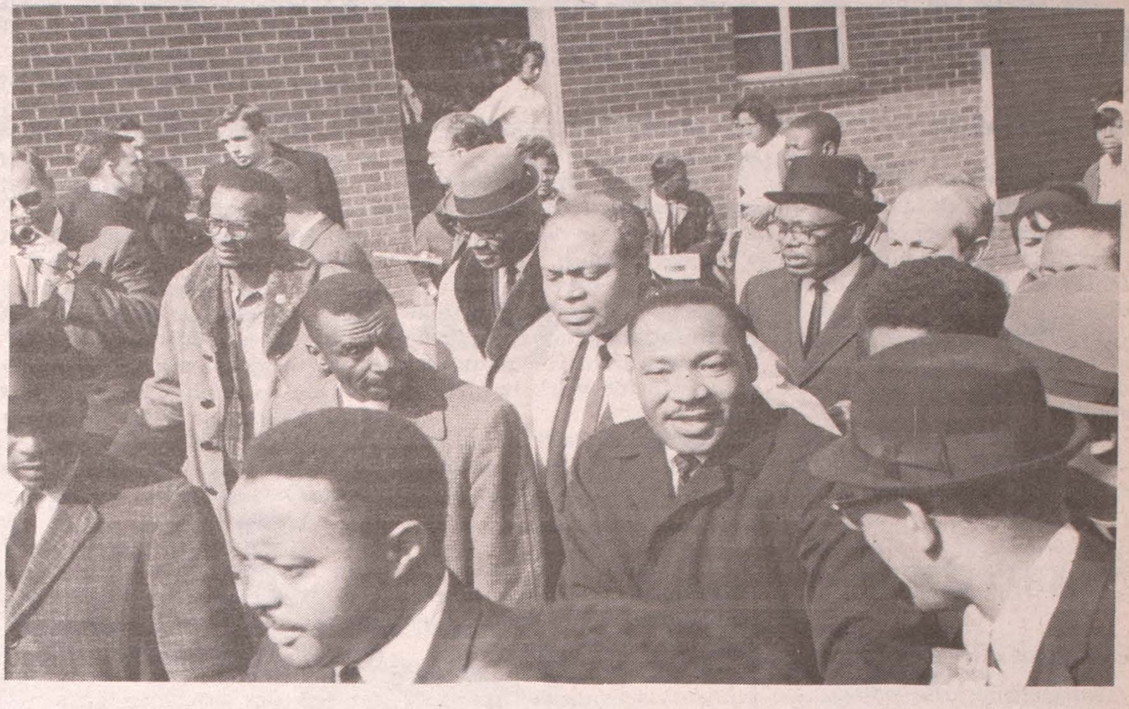
In addition, the show covers CORE's volunteer work, from forming groups during the Civil Rights Movement, to encouraging small farmers to earn more money through share-cropping, to capturing the spirit of movement activists during the 1964 Democratic Convention.

All of the works, illustrating Hollander's deep commitment to his cause, have been researched and summarized in brief historical narratives by a group of WC students. These written histories of the era will be included with the photographs as part of the exhibit.

After the exhibit has finished its run on March 4, the collection of pictures will stay on campus as part of what exhibit committee chairman and art lecturer Tex Andrews called "an important archive to the Civil Rights Movement and Afro-American culture." The photos, which belong to the Art Department, will be displayed again sometime after the exhibit's initial showing.

As part of WC's semester long tribute, lectures, exhibits and various other presentations are scheduled for students and the local community later in the spring. Reflects Williams, "It is wonderful to learn more about all this and see the major breakthroughs that were made"

Hollander's documentary photographs will be on display in Tawes Gallery of Gibson Fine Arts Center from Wednesday, February 14 until March 4. An opening reception and talk will be held early Wednesday evening at 5 PM in the Gallery.



As part of its semester-long series of events celebrating African-American history and culture, WC will present the photography exhibit "The Civil Rights Movement: Mississippi, Louisiana & Alabama, 1964-1966." There will be an opening reception for the exhibit Wednesday, February 14 at 5PM in Tawes Lobby of the Gibson Fine Arts Center, and the exhibit will be on display through March 4.

Ensemble to perform chamber music

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

The WC Concert Series, in its 38th season, presents Bowdoin Trio, an ensemble of accomplished solo artists, Tuesday evening in Tawes Theater as the first performance of the series' spring semester.

The New York-based Bowdoin Trio, whose members include pianist Jon Klibonoff, cellist Semyon Fridman and violinist Alexander Simionescu, were award-winning soloists before organizing as a trio six years ago at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine.

Brahms, Schubert, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schoenberg and Shostakovich ["brought to life with terrifying vividness"– New York Times] are included in the ensemble's repertoire of chamber music.

Writes one Baltimore Evening Sun critic of the musicians, "This young chamber group has definitely go it– personality, warmth, power, ensemble, and startling maturity."

Bowdoin Trio made its New York debut at Carnegie Recital Hall in 1983 after claiming First Prize in the Concert Artists Guild International Competition.

Special recognitions among trio members include Klibonoff's silver medal at the 7th Gina Bachauer International Piano Competition and his Maurice Hinson Award at the 1988 William Kepell Piano Competition, Simionescu's silver medal at the 1987 Montreal Competition and Fridman's winning the 1987 Concert Artists Guild Competition.

Sherman Spencer, critic for The Stockton Record, praised Klibonoff as a "pianist of rare technique and musicianship. His runs were seamless, and every phrase he played was as finely wrought as a golden artifact by Cellini." In the review Spencer also cited Fridman's "glowing cello tone and immaculate phrasing."

Performing in such major US cities as San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, Bowdoin Trio was also invited to participate in the 1988 Library of Congress Chamber Series, premiering American composer Robert Starer's work commissioned for the ensemble by the Library.

During the summer, the trio is in residence at the Bowdoin Summer Music Festival at Bowdoin College and is available for various workshops and residencies.

The concert begins at 8 PM Tuesday, February 13 in Tawes Theater. Students and faculty are reminded that they may use the tickets issued by the Concert Series last semester for free admission.

Tickets for adults are $8 at the box office on performance night; children will be admitted free. No reservations will be taken, and early arrival is recommended.

Newell to return in '91-'92

Westpoint leave extended

by Susie Mazzullo

Dr. David Newell, Chairman of Philosophy, who is currently on a leave of absence, will not return to Washington College as scheduled for the 1990 fall semester.

Dr. Newell has been teaching at Westpoint for the past year and was offered the position for another year.

Although his leave was originally intended for the 1989-90 spring and fall academic terms, the extension has just recently been approved.

Provost and Dean of the College Elizabeth Baer stated that this extension in no way reflects a change in policy.

"There has never been a strict formal policy on the length of leave of absences and the offer to Dr. Newell from Westpoint is a tribute to the work he's doing there."

During his leave, Newell will teach and will help in the shaping of their new curriculum.

vated by chemical fire extinguishers which had been removed from fourth floor Minta Martin and sprayed in the hallways.

When Security responded they also discovered that the Reid Hall first floor alarm had been set off.

According to Roderick, the fire extinguisher chemicals appeared to be actual smoke and a Resident Assistant therefore phoned the Chestertown Volunteer Fire Department. The firemen quickly responded, only to find that the alarm was a false one.

By approximately 3:45 AM students were allowed to reenter their dorms after waiting almost an hour in the cold.

Upon returning to their room, two residents of Reid Hall, freshmen Jane Kennedy and Rachel Kuzmeskus, discovered that virtually all of their possessions were covered with chemicals from the extinguisher. Though the two were in the room when the unidentified students sprayed it, both were asleep and in the rush to exit the building during the alarm, they did not realize that any real harm was done.

According to Kuzmeskus, so far the cost of cleanup is approximately $150 "from dry cleaning down to throwing out cotton balls...Everything in the room had to be cleaned or thrown out."

Kuzmeskus also suffered minor irritation due to the chemicals, but stressed that she was not seriously harmed. She stated, "It's a shame that a silly joke turned into an accident...."

The three students involved in the incident have been cited and are currently dealing with college officials and the Student Conduct Council. They readily agreed to pay Kennedy and Kuzmeskus for all the damages they caused.

Both students mentioned the help they received from the College. "Thank you to Security and the Health Services. Also Betty and the cleaning people were awesome."

Said Kennedy, "I want to say that Security did their job."

the students said they would be in favor of such a charge.

The ACC will be asking for additional input, criticisms and questions from the SGA at their next meeting. Students who have questions should contact their dorm Senator.

The Academic Computing Committee would again like to thank all the students who took the time to fill out a survey. Anyone still interested in expressing their opinion should contact their dorm Senator or Ryder Daniels.

With the additional student input provided on the surveys, the ACC will be setting up workshops and demonstrations on many aspects of computing in the next several weeks on a wide variety of topics. Students should look for notices of when and where these workshops will be given or check the latest issue of Compute!.

Anyone interested in a copy of the Preliminary responses should contact Ryder Daniels through student mail or ext. 343.

Rally

did speak by way of telephone. Another predominant group that attended the rally were high school and college students, which made the crowd one of the biggest ever.

"When I call myself a pro-lifer, I don't just mean that I am against abortion. I also mean that I support increased federal funding for medical care for low income women and I support increased state funding for adoption agencies," said Cathy Smithmyer, senior English major and Newman Club member here at Washington College.

The rally was a chance for people to voice their views to Capitol Hill through lobbying. Following the rally, many people took advantage of the opportunity to march for the "right to life." The main focus of the rally was to listen to talks given by influential and political leaders. There were talks on the "Unity on the 'Life Principles'," "The Profile Job is Still Ours," and talks on the recent Webster decision passed by the Supreme Court.

"I feel that every human being that is conceived has a right to live, and that that right should never be denied," said Smithmyer.

The Newman Club of Washington College sponsored the trip to Washington. A fairly new organization, the Newman Club is a group of Catholic students on campus whose main concern is to give Catholics a chance to practice their religion away from home.

Students Cathy Smithmyer and Karyn Iacangelo share the job of Peer Minister, a job entailing making contact with the Catholic student body as well as contact with the local Diocese.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

For those of you who missed dinner Wednesday night, you missed a really delicious meal. Representatives from Hunt-Wesson assisted our kitchen staff in the preparation of the entire meal. Thanks to Bill and Frank for all their assistance.

One question posed at Wednesday's dinner, that I'd like to address was "What is the difference in having a dinner featuring a certain brand or brands and having a food show?" The biggest difference is that a food show features samplings of new products the WCDS and/or the food broker want to acquaint the board students with, in the hope of incorporating them into our menu cycle. The items featured at food shows are not alternatives to the served meal, that is why only small portions are served. At a meal like Wednesday evening's, all of the items were a part of the menu and were paid for by the WCDS. The items served at a food show are paid for, primarily, by the sponsoring broker.

Many items from food shows have found their way into our menus because of board students input (through surveys, the napkin board and the SGA Food Service Committee recommendations). Examples are: Abuelito Tortilla Chips, Abuelito Flour Tortillas, LaChoy Mini Egg Rolls and Pace Territorial Salsa.

Don't forget, Monday, February 12th, is the last day to order you Valentine cake for the WCDS. The cost is $9.50, plus tax. To place an order or to obtain more information call ext. 252.

Here is a handy "food for thought", Confucius would most likely have said: "He who eats breakfast stays awake in class and thereby gets better grades."

That's it for this week. Until later..MOM

A hilarious romp over the cliches of Spanish romantic fatalism, written and directed by Pedro Almodovar, who has inherited the kinky humor and audacity of Luis Bunuel and adapted it to post-Franco Spain. The movie is a sensual and glittering celebration of women. Pepa (the great Carmen Maura) is abandoned by her boyfriend Ivan (they both do voice-overs for TV commercials; his voice is enough to make women swoon). Pepa doesn't want the lout back; she merely wants to say goodby in person, without being dominated by his crooning tones on the telephone. Magic, madness and romantic obsession come together as people of all shapes and sizes gather in her apartment. (In Spanish with English Subtitles)

Student input sought on Hodson renovation

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College students will have a valuable opportunity to voice their opinions while making a positive difference in campus life this February 21 and 27.

Both nights at 7 PM in Hynson Lounge, any interested individuals may attend the Hodson Hall Student Center Project Open Campus Meeting.

According to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, members of the Hodson Hall Planning Committee will attend the meetings. Architects of Brawer & Hauptman Associates, the company which will actually form final plans for the building, will be at the February 21 meeting.

Members of the Hodson Hall Planning Committee are students Steve Attias, Jen Del Nero, Suzanne Hewes, Kevin Kelly, Doug Ross and Gordy Scherer, administrator Dean Ed Maxcy (Chairperson), David Knowles, and Jeff DeMoss of the Dining Hall and staffperson Sharon Herd.

Maxcy encouraged students to approach committee members with ideas as well as to attend the meetings.

Said Baer, "I am really interested in getting student input. I hope the students will turn out for this. It's a real opportunity to voice what students want."

Dean Maureen McIntyre announced intentions to renovate Hodson at the last faculty meeting Monday, February 12. She reiterated Baer's point by saying that it will be a once in a lifetime chance to really affect a change by creating a new Student Center.

Cable vs. Satellite

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

The Washington College Executive Council of the Board of Directors is currently considering a proposal from Simmon's Cable which may bring cable hook up to all dorms on campus.

According to Gene Hessey , Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, preliminary reviews of the proposal will be conducted within the next two or three weeks.

"We also developed the alternative of the satellite," said Hessey, referring to a proposal made last year by Paul Bishop, Director of Computing, and Jay Meranchik, Audio Visual Director.

The satellite station plans resurfaced in September, 1989 in an effort to please students who wanted cable especially after it was cut off some time before with some still paying bills for a nonexistent service.

A dish would provide WC with educational stations, financial networks, international programming, teleconferences at various universities, and entertainment channels.

In September it was also proposed that students may also obtain other entertainment and educational channels from Simmons cable in addition to satellite stations.

Some problems were envisioned with this, primarily that the College would have no control over how much students would be charged. With only satellite channels, the College can negotiate with Simmons for channels requested by residents. No additional adapter box would be necessary.

According to Hessey, a meeting with students to review possibilities will occur before any final decision will be made and decisions should be made quickly.

"We certainly owe the cable company a fairly prompt response."

Jackson to pay back college

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College recently settled its case against alleged SGA embezzler Phil Tom Jackson, according to Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance.

Jackson will pay restitution as part of his plea bargaining agreement. He will make payments to the College on a monthly basis in amounts as yet unknown, which will eventually total

SGA allocates funds at meeting

by Kyndra Ponder

At Tuesday's SGA meeting, President Steven Attias noted that it would be the last time that this year's officers met. The next time the SGA meets, the new officers for the 1990-1991 school year will have been elected.

The meeting started with remarks by Sean Murphy. He noted that the changes to the transcript for the senior obligation have been approved and that they will go into effect for this year's seniors. He also noted that next school year, the format of the transcript will be changed and that all honors that a student receives while at WC will be noted, not just academic honors like cum laude.

Kevin Kelly then reported that two bands will be appearing here in March. The first band, a reggae group called Black Sheep, will appear in the cafeteria on March 3 as part of African Week. Admission to Black Sheep will be $2. The second group will play here on March 30. More information will be available as the dates for both events near.

Kelly went on to report that the Hodson Hall Committee has met with Dean Maxcy, Clint Baer and the architects who have designed the changes to Hodson Hall. The changes that Kelly reports that are being planned for now include putting a lounge where the Bookstore is now; combining the Coffee House and Mrs. D's into one Bar/Snack Bar and expanding the area that the C-House currently occupies and making it into a larger dance area with a terrace that will open and can be used for overflow crowds and even for a bar area when large parties are held there.

SGA Treasurer, Joe Van Name, presented the Club Funding Committee's recomendations for funding to the full SGA for approval. The committee's recomendations were all approved as follows:

Newman Club	$ 250
German Club	$ 400
Amnesty International	$ 350
French Club	$ 400
Campus Christian Fellowship	$ 150
Phi Sigma Tau (Philosophy Honor Society)	$ 900
Paychology Club	$ 200
Margaret Horsley Society	$ 400
Soapbox	$ 200
Washington College Republicans	$ 500

see FUNDS, page 12

EDITORIAL

This is club funding?

Perhaps, judging from the manner in which the funding meetings with clubs were conducted, next year's Student Government Association president should pay some mind to the criteria—or lack thereof—which determine how much money a club is awarded.

Certainly I can only speak of my own experience with the Club Funding Committee as a part of the Margaret Horsley Society, but there's no reason to assume that meetings with other organizations were conducted differently.

First of all, the walk from Reid to William Smith Hall took longer than the interview itself. Tracey Connell and I, having no experience with these meetings, were armed with ideas and cost estimates, neither of which the Committee seemed interested in. After outlining our plans for utilizing the funds, we were asked if we planned to advertise these events. We did.

End of interview. No questions about how we arrived at our budget estimate. No questions about how much each event would cost.

Unless I'm mistaken, the Club Funding Committee is supposed to be rather concerned about these monetary issues. Concerned enough to ask about them. How does this committee make its recommendations for club funding with anything but arbitrary means?

The Margaret Horsley Society took a one-third cut in funding this semester. I wouldn't be bitter about this if I thought that the committee had asked the right questions and researched the Society's spending records. From the accounts I received of the last SGA meeting, I know that the latter was not accomplished.

Apparently, the Club Funding Committee decided to cut the Society's budget because 1. the Society didn't advertise the planned events; 2. last semester's funds weren't used; 3. the Committee said that too few activities were planned to justify allocating the funds.

The Committee's reasoning is both flawed and untrue, because 1. advertisements—paid for by the SGA—were placed in The Elm and in campus mailboxes, and posters—also paid for by the SGA—were placed in William Smith and Hodson Hall alerting students to upcoming events; 2. the Society overspent last semester, bills which were covered by the SGA; 3. since the Committee never asked for cost estimates, nor did they research last semester's expenses, they had no idea how much money they could "justly" recommend the Society be awarded.

Unless the Club Funding Committee takes its responsibilities more seriously, the only message that comes across is that bands and beer are more important than human rights issues.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Some students need lessons in the art of civility

To the Editor:

Recently, two incidents have been shared with me, which I hope will be of concern to all of us in the college community; however, I fear that they may not. Therefore, I am taking the opportunity to share my personal concern with you through the ELM.

In order to advertise a party, one campus organization had someone of its members create posters which were placed in various residence halls and on other campus buildings. The ones I saw on the door of Hodson Hall were in questionable taste; however, the one brought to me from Minta Martin was, quite simply, offensive. To be offensive may not have been the intention of its creator; however, the poster was clearly promoting sexism, female exploitation and a level of bad taste that has no place within this community.

I received a telephone call from a member of the faculty informing me that a late night (early morning) party at a student's off campus residence had greatly disturbed the neighbors. Deciding not to call the police, one neighbor went to the front door of the property from which the offending noise emanated, and she was greeted with verbal abuse which left her devastated.

It is a sad fact that some members of the Washington College community have little comprehension of the elements of civility which allow us to live together in peace. However, it is equally sad that those who have some understanding do little or nothing to pressure these others to raise the level of civility or to keep them in check when they act out. Where are the other members of the community – the friends, the fraternity, the team, the residents of the floor? Must it always be a parent, an administrator or a policeman who tells the offenders that their abusive words or actions are unacceptable? What do the women of the campus think about the manner in which they are portrayed on such posters? Where are the responsible students whose welcome by the townspeople of Chestertown is being jeopardized by those who selfishly disturb the peace of our neighbors? You are there, I know, and some of you speak out against those who offend, but there need to be more of you. You need to be active rather than passive in establishing and maintaining the standards of civility which will allow us to live well together within our community.

Sincerely,
Edward E. Maxcy

Rebuttal against nonsmokers

To the Editor:

I was very upset to see two supposedly mature, educated people revert to the level of junior high school aged adolescents in last weeks attack on smokers!

While I, myself, am not a smoker, I cannot in fact, I refuse - to condemn others because they are!

I'm not saying that I enjoy walking through the hallowed halls of Bill Smith when they are smoke filled. I am very allergic to, cigarette smoke and I fully realize the discomfort that nonsmokers feel when they are exposed to too much of it.

However, I'm not upset about the letter because the two students were championing for the health of WC students. In fact, I respect them for their concern for my health!

What I cannot respect is the manner in which they presented their argument.

I presume that these students have come to college in the hopes of being educated. I realize that skills such as tact and respect cannot be taught, however, the education that they have receive would, I hope, help them to understand the fact that other people have rights. While those rights may not be ones that we agree with fully, we should still accept and respect them.

When Miss Michael and Mr. Davis attacked smokers in the manner that they did, they completely went against all of the liberating qualities which are supposedly intrinsic to education.

Perhaps it would be a good idea for the administration to designate smoking areas in buildings on campus. I know it would make a lot more students much more comfortable. But I certainly don't have all the answers!

The one answer that I do have (and it seems to work pretty well) is that politeness and respect of others will get you much further than will rudeness! Thank you and have a really nice day!

SGA Elections are Imminent!

If you're running for office, consider writing a 500-word essay explaining your campaign platform to be published in next week's Elm. Essays are due on Monday at 7 PM in the Elm office (Reid basement). At that time, your photo will be taken. Questions? Call 778-5028.

ISSUE: What issues should be of primary importance to next year's Student Government Association president?

President should set realistic goals

Colleen Moran

As the SGA presidential election draws closer, candidates for the position will soon be producing platforms full of promises, delivering speeches, and passing out campaign literature. However, the ideas expressed in the propaganda may in some cases be unrealistic, ridiculous, and irrelevant to the Washington College student. Issues that should be of primary importance to next year's SGA president are as follows:

Strengthening student unity, parking, alcohol policy, campus beautification and clean-up, and individual room phones.

Unity among the students on a college campus is very important. However, this past year more and more students moved off campus, and the scial life on campus died down to an all time low. Rumor has it that next year, all freshmen and sophomores are going to be required to live on campus. Something must be done to bring the students back on campus by choice, not just because it is a requirement. In order to do so, certain issues will have to be addressed.

A major concern of students is the alcohol policy in the Coffee House and elsewhere. It is a given that college students are going to party whether or not the policy allows them to do so. Therefore, it would be more beneficial to have a policy allows them to do so; it would be more beneficial to have a policy that reasonably restricts alcohol use, and at the same time encourages students to remain on campus rather than attend off-campus parties. Not only would this make social life at WC, more exciting, it would also lessen the chance of students driving drunk.

Another problem that must be dealt with is the inadequate parking facilities. The College permits all students, regardless of class, to have a registered vehicle on campus. It is understood that a new parking lot will soon replace where Foxwell once stood. However, it does not provide enoug parking in reasonable distance from the dorms. Maybe it is time to do as other school do, and prohibit freshmen to have vehicles?

One of the most recent problems stirring is phone hook-ups. Students in the hill dorms have the option to hook up into the school system. However, those not living on the hill must resort to C&P. The installation prices are high, and on a college student's budget, it is more economical to share phones. Unfortunately, both the school and C&P are trying to put an end to this. Perhaps it is time the school invests in an individual room phone jack system.

Last but not least, the presidential candidates might take into consideration the appearance of our campus. Beautification and clean-up would not hurt. The appearance of the campus to a perspecitve student could make or break his decision. Keep in mind, first impressions are the most important. A day dedicated to beautifying campus, with each organization participating, could make a difference. Also, a stronger recycling program is definitely needed.

When the time comes to cast your vote, keep these issues in mind! Some of you may still have three more years to go here!

News from around the world: California oil spill

UNITED STATES:

Daniel P. Kearney, top administrator of the agency in charge of government's Savings and Loan bailout, resigned, claiming he had not been given enough authority to carry out his duties effectively.

Congress passed the 159 billion dollar bailout program last August. It is designed to clean up the Savings and Loans industry by selling or shutting down more than 500 insolvent Savings and Loans. Congress also changed the regulation of the industry and created the Oversight Board and the Resolution Trust Corporation to oversee the bailout.

According to regulators and banking specialists, the program has many problems; including fighting between the Treasury and the agency in charge of the bailout, a lack of buyers, and a weak real estate market in the Northeast. Kearney's resignation is seen as a sign the bailout might not work.

In the meantime, these Savings and Loans are still operating at estimated losses of 6 million dollars per day. Many had granted risky loans to Latin American countries.

Clean up efforts are underway in southern California. Workers picked up globs of oil on beaches using paper towels. At sea, two miles off the coast, barges emptied the ruptured tank of the damaged American Trader.

Admiral J. William Kline, the regional Coast Guard commander, said the tanker apparently struck her own anchor while maneuvering towards an offshore pipeline. An investigation into this and other possible causes of the accident is underway. So far 300,000 gallons of light Alaskan crude oil have spilled, compared to the nearly 11 million gallons of oil spilled from the Exxon Valdez.

Officials of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OHSA) have been declining many offers of help from concerned residents. OHSA is concerned about the effect benzene in the oil might have on the health of untrained volunteers.

In the trial of the captain of the Exxon Valdez, Judge Karl Johnstone decided to allow the cross-examination by the defense of two Coast Guard traffic monitors. The defense hopes to prove Coast Guard negligence by showing that one of the monitors was drinking on the job the night of the accident. The monitor, Bruce Blandford, had a blood alcohol level of .203 a few hours after the accident. That is twice the legal limit for driving in Alaska. The judge has not yet decided whether to admit the results of the breathalizer test as evidence. The other monitor was arrested for possesion of marajuana two days after the accident, but the judge refused to allow that as evidence for the defense.

SOVIET UNION:

A shortage of feed grain for cattle will cause a cutback in beef production within the Soviet Union. According to Vladilen V. Nikitin, chairman of the State Commission for Food and Procurement, the country has run out of grain to feed the cattle. The state has reduced feed allocations to the Republics and the country cannot afford to purchase grain from abroad. An official in Latvia reported that the grain allocation had been cut by 40%. He felt the cut was so big because the government is trying to curb Latvia's pro-independence movement.

Meat producing regions are refusing to ship to the Central Government. Instead they are hoping to prevent consumer revolts locally by hoarding food.

Food shortages are causing friction between local government officials and consumers, as resentment of the special privileges granted to party officials rises. Many local officials have resigned.

SOUTH AFRICA:

Nelson Mandela, on his first day of freedom, praised the actions of President F W de Klerk who freed Mandela unconditionally and lifted the ban of the African National Congress (ANC). Mandela also called for blacks to intensify their struggle for equality, and did not denounce the use of violence to obtain it.

Mandela was freed on Sunday. He was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1964 for sabotage and attempting to overthrow the white government. The government had offered Mandela his freedom before in exchange for renouncing the use of violence.

In Washington, President Bush praised the actions of the South African government but made it clear that US sanctions against South Africa would not be lifted yet. Included among the conditions for lifting economic sanctions are an end to the 44 month old state of emergency, and the legalization of all political parties. Sanctions were imposed on South Africa by the Reagan Administration in 1986. Included in the sanctions is a ban on imports of South African gold coins, steel, and coal.

While Mandela has indicated he would be willing to negotiate an end to apartheid with de Klerk, the ANC has announced it will not enter into any formal negotiations with the government until the state of emergency s lifted. Both sides agree it could be years before all the racial segregation laws are abolished and a new constitution incorporating blacks into the political system is written.

WEST GERMANY:

A major obstacle to German reunification has been removed. Following talks with West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Secretary of State James Baker, Mikhail Gorbachev agreed to drop the Soviet demand that a united Germany be neutral and demilitarized.

The Soviet Union will now attempt to protect itself and the Warsaw Pact through a series of agreements with the US, Britain, France and the Germanys. In exchange, Kohl vaguely promised economic assistance and assurance that a unified German would not be a threat to the Soviets.

Gorbachev's decision will clear the way for a united Germany to be a member of NATO.

Antique press in lit house still cranks it out by Kathleen Fenney and Jennifer Griffin

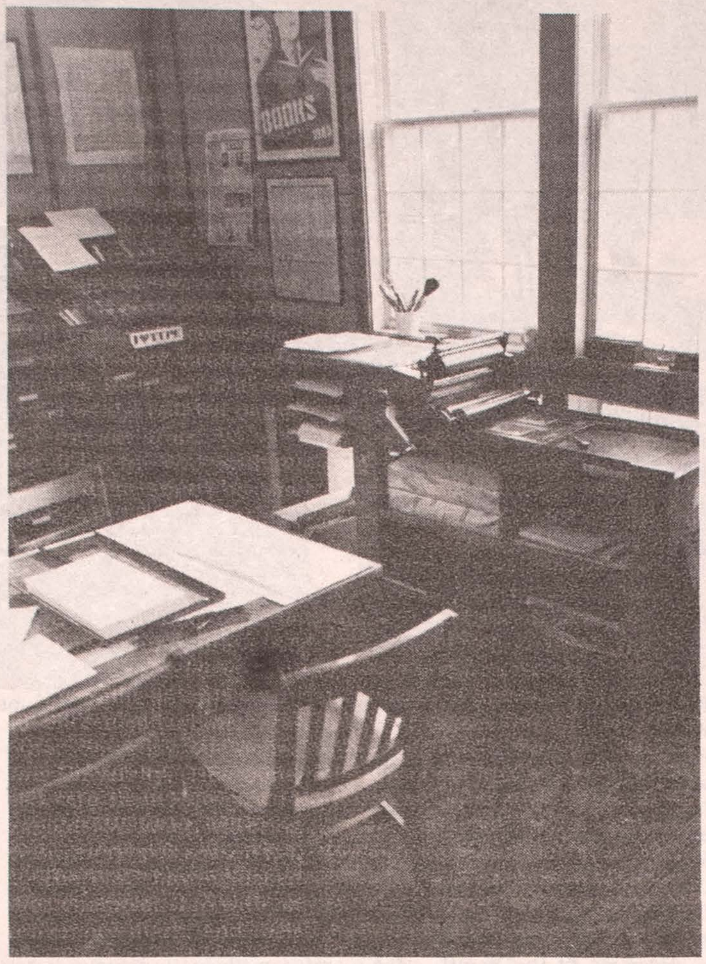
For the past four years a small group of Washington College students have met at the O'Neill Literary House learning to use the antique letterpress, and in the process have helped to preserve the heritage of books, writing, and literature.

In 1986, the college received a donation of letterpress equipment, leading to the construction of a one-room addition at the back of the house. The architects in charge of housing the equipment were acquainted with local printer, Mike Kaylor, one of the few people in the area familiar with antique letterpress operation. Kaylor was therefore consulted in the planning of the addition. Later, Robert Day and Kathy Wagner, Director and Assistant Director of the Literary House respectively, hired Kaylor to instruct them on the use of the equipment.

The original seminar for Day and Wagner grew into the present non-credit workshop for students on Monday evenings. Approximately twelve students have taken the workshop each semester since it opened to students. Kaylor begins each semester with a discussion of the history of books and printing. Following several lecture seminars, students begin hands-on experience with the presses and type.

Then, students are able to do independent work using their newly acquired skills. They begin with simple projects, such as producing stationery for themselves and friends, but most go on to sharpen their skills and create more ambitious projects. For example, writers have printed their own works, artists have created posters for various college events, and other students have printed bookmarks and postcards. Those who spend sufficient time working on both private and house projects receive a key to the press which allows them to work freely in the press room.



This room in the O'Neill Literary House is home to an antique letterpress used by students in relearning the fading art of printing.

Current students have been drawn to the workshop through different means, but all share a common interest in books. Raphael Koster has found the workshop a unique way to combine his interest in art and books, adding, "I like being able to work on my own projects and it is a challenge to work on new things." History professor Dr. Emilie Amt began attending the workshop after hearing a lecture Kaylor delivered on the history of printing, and her enjoyment of books has kept her coming back. The letterpress seminar allows Cynthia Fields-Bélanger to continue building her experience in book arts and typography which began when she was a high school student. Students this semester will work on house projects such as a chapbook of poetry by senior Erin Murphy, a literary house postcard, and a poetry postcard series.

In recent semesters, the workshop has expanded to include other aspects of book arts. Linoleum block printing, bookbinding and papermaking are techniques taught by Kaylor during Saturday seminars linked to the workshop. Also, students have recently taken field trips to Philadelphia's University of the Arts, meetings of the American Printing History Association and the site of the Rittenhouse paper mill on the outskirts of Philadelphia.

The letterpress workshop is expected to grow further with the addition of another room to provide space for recently acquired equipment. The new room will house antique and rare books collected by Mike Kaylor as well as his office.

Also, a small bookbindery will be constructed in the basement of the Literary House. These physical additions will allow Kaylor and his students to further the goals of the workshop. Future plans entail creating more projects for sale and further involvement in the production of books. The workshop has already received attention from the Folger Shakespeare Library, the Metropolitan Museum of Art and various companies which deal in fine books.

Kaylor, an native of Boston, was trained as a machinist, but returned to school to study philosophy and religion. He later spent several years as a professor of literature. Eventually, he purchased an offset printing business in Chestertown. This led to his involvement with Washington College.

Currently, Kaylor is enrolled in a University of the Arts MFA program in book arts. Kaylor says that he has been fascinated by books and printing since childhood. Through the workshop, he wishes to share with students the historical perspective and sense of critical judgment that comes from the preservation of a dying craft. Kaylor says that the history of printing is integral to the history of language and ideas, linking the present with tradition and the past.

Student Claudia Heimbach, who has participated in the workshop for three semesters, expresses a view common to many of Kaylor's students, "Mike's....ever expanding knowledge, true love for what he is doing , and eagerness to teach keep me intrigued and keep me coming back." Kaylor believes that a part of carrying on tradition is sharing his skills with others, stating that , "It is the duty of a craftsman to teach anyone who would learn".

Ethics of deer hunting on the Eastern Shore

Jennifer Grindle

I was very young the first time I saw a dead deer. The big, seven or eight point buck was strung up by his hind legs in a tree in my grandmother's backyard. I remember watching his glassy eyes stare at me, blood dripping from his protruding tongue and forming a small puddle on the ground below. It seemed as if any moment he would kick free of the rope and run into the cornfield. Yet, the sight of the stark signs of death failed to horrify my eight year old conscience. I accepted without question that this was the natural order of things.

Lately, many people have begun to argue in my Eastern Shore hometown that the annual deer season has become a blood fest perpetrated by cruel rednecks seeking revenge for crop damage. This year's harvest of over 34,000 deer was the largest in twenty-five years, and the total kill was 10,000 more than last year.

For the first time, I have begun to wonder if hunters are going too far. I had always held the opinion that the only real villains during deer season were the "weekend" hunters, suburbanites who think a trip to the backwoods on the Eastern Shore to don camouflage and get up before dawn might produce them a nice trophy to hang on their living room wall. They are the ones who hunt for the sport of it, luring a deer into their sights and killing it, only to discard the meat and save the head. While hunters I know insist that "city folk" are probably most often guilty of this, they pointed out that head hunters exist on both sides of the Chesapeake Bay.

There are many ways to look at this issue. You could argue the rightness of hunters' motives indefinitely. A particularly angry "vegetarian" contended in my local paper that hunters get an adrenaline high in killing wildlife and that hunting is an evil passed from generation to generation like prejudices and biases. That could be true, but isn't that missing the point? The ultimate concern should be the welfare of the deer, forget why a hunter hunts. Anybody's gun can kill.

The fact is that the deer on the Eastern Shore are thriving, not suffering. Human population has taken away their habitat and forced them to coexist with man, but they feed very well in farmers' fields, causing thousands of dollars in crop damage each year.

Their environment, for now at least, contains an abundance of trees and unpolluted water. Eastern Shore deer are also uniquely blessed, or perhaps cursed, with no natural predators. Mild winters have also contributed to the forty percent increase in the deer population within the last five years.

Once I was driving down a back road during hunting season and saw a deer running headlong across an empty field, fleeing from a man with a shotgun, fleeing for its life. I admired its amazing speed and grace, its beauty even as it was about to die. As it crossed a ditch the deer lost its footing and fell to the ground, its legs scrambling wildly as it tried to get up.

There was no beauty in its desperate struggle. I felt a sense of horror for the first time. The fall disrupted the hunter's aim though. In a moment, the deer was up again and it disappeared into the woods on the other side of the road, safe.

I am not a hunter. I am not an animal rights activist. I am an animal lover. And I still believe in the necessity of the annual deer season. When I think of the deer that I saw running for its life, I mostly remember its dignity. But just as there was no dignity as the animal fell and seemed sure to die, there is no dignity in a slow, agonizing death by starvation.

I am not suggesting that the ordinary hunter kills for the sake of the deer, but I do argue that the deer hunting season is the most humane way to prevent nature form thinning out an overgrown herd through starvation. Unfortunately many noble, beautiful creatures will die to prevent the decline of the herd, but death, whether we like it or not, is part of the natural order of things.

Are steroids a problem at Washington?

by Katherine Absher
Staff writer

Anorexia nervosa has littered the headlines as one of the main diseases affecting young women in the last decade. There are many factors causing anorexia, but one of the main reasons given for its predominance in first world countries is the preoccupation of the media with the image of the perfect body. Competing with the latest cover of Cosmopolitan, women mentally and physically destroy themselves.

Anorexia nervosa in men, however, is rare. Yet, there is a male equivalent to anorexia. It is the use of and addiction to anabolic steroids. Anabolic steroids are synthetic variants of the strongest male hormone, testosterone. One of the primary reasons for using these drugs is to create the media's concept of the perfect body as well as increasing athletic ability. Jon Ferber, Washington College athletic trainer, says,"It is the ability to have control over your body just like anorexia. It is a way to control your weight."

And like anorexia, steroids are mentally and physically harmful. The list of side effects of steroids is never ending. The most obvious mental side effect of steroid use is increased aggression. In fact, steroids were first developed for that sole purpose. During World War II German commanders gave their troops steroids to make them more hostile toward the enemy.

Dr. Steven Horwitz, lecturing on steroids for Wellness Awareness week, commented that, "the scariest effects are, I think, the psychological effects."

As an example of mental effects from "'roids," he addressed the 60 Minutes program about police officers who took steroids: "I would rather get caught by a police officer doing cocaine than an officer doing steroids."

Disturbingly, many steroid addicts want to increase their aggression. Steroids stimulate competitiveness, giving users an extra edge in sports.

Anabolic steroids increase muscle mass, and they allow the steroid user to recover quickly from exercise, thereby letting him do more repetitions of weights. Furthermore, they increase the efficiency of the neuromuscular system, making it possible for the steroid user to lift heavier weights. These are all the benefits of anabolic steroids, but the long range side effects negate all the possible pluses of steroid use.

In the June 9 issue of the Medical Tribune, US Olympic Committee sports medicine and science director Dr. Robert Voy described steroid use as "a very complicated attack on a normal hormonal balance...When we take in a lot of hormone from the outside, the body becomes confused. It turns off its own system, so a lot of peculiar side effects occur...There have been instances of liver malfunction, because the liver is responsible for detoxifying those particular drugs."

Other side effects of steroids are acne, growth of breasts, prostate cancer, and sterility in men. "In females irreversible masculine traits can develop along with menstrual irregularities...Some side effects may not show up for years, such as heart attacks and strokes, and some might not even be recognized as side effects, such as failure to achieve full height potential because of arrested bone development during adolescence," according to an National Collegiate Athletic Association poster.

In addition, as the steroid user increases in size, the strength of his tendons and ligaments stays the same. This disproportion may result in long lasting injuries. The NCAA has recorded seventy side effects from steroid use, but further information on side effects is lacking, since there is no ethical way to test the side effects on human beings, and the long term effects are hard to determine because of other factors that may have caused those same medical problems.

Because of the health risks linked with steroids, the NCAA is cracking down on steroid abuse in college athletics. They are now randomly testing in Division Three championship games "twenty minutes after the game is over so you can't cycle off," explains Ferber.

Therefore, Division three schools like Washington College who have never been subjected to drug testing are now being exposed to it. But does the athletic department need to worry? Are there steroids on this campus?

Geoffrey Miller, Director of Athletics, responds, "I don't think we have a problem. The fact that we don't have a football team minimizes the problem."

Ferber backs up this statement: "I don't think we have a problem here. We have more fitness and endurance athletes than weight and strength ones...I haven't seen those secondary characteristics: the oily skin, the acne, the aggression."

The most aggressive, strength sport WC has is lacrosse. Is there steroid use in lacrosse? Coach Terry Corcoran says no: "If you said steroids to the athletes here, they would laugh. It's another world...I don't think there is any steroid use in lacrosse, even on the whole national level. Strength conditioning in lacrosse is relatively new. Weight lifting hasn't been pushed in lacrosse. A lot of kids are not into strength conditioning until they get here."

Crew coach Mickey Dulin, however, did have a rower several years ago on anabolic steroids: "He got a little obsessed with weight lifting and began taking steroids. [He suffered from] cramps, severe mood swings, was very short tempered, very erratic." Dulin suspected that the crew team member was on steroids, but "I didn't confirm it until much later." This, however, was Dulin's only direct contact with steroid use on his team.

Although rampant nationwide, steroids are so far not prevalent on this campus. Physical size is not a major factor in athletics here, and the temptation of doing whatever it takes to make it to the pros is not there. Yet once an athlete has taken steroids, he usually becomes psychologically addicted to them. Therefore, the NCAA and the Athletic Department are educating the student body on the effects of steroids so its use will never become a problem at WC.

Indicators of Steroid Use

- Growth in breast in males.
- Large gains in lean mass over a short period of time.
- Increased time in the gym.
- Increased acne on back, chest and face.
- Abnormally aggressive behavior or moodiness.
- Facial puffiness, water retention.
- Needle marks in the thighs or buttocks.
- Increased body consciousness.
- Increased discussion about a need to gain weight or strength.
- Sudden increases in training capacity.

Swimming streak stopped at ten

by Greg Coss

The Washington College Shorewomen put their 10-0 mark on the line in a tri-meet at Ursinus last Saturday. Despite suffering their first defeat of this season, the women should have been very pleased with their performance. Several team and personal records were shattered in the Shorewomen's 51-44 defeat at the hands of Ursinus and their 60-35 loss to Franklin & Marshall. It was easily the most difficult challenge of Washington College's season. Franklin & Marshall was ranked as high as 14th in Division III polls. Ursinus was swimming in their home pool, and they had more strength at the top of their lineup.

WC didn't lose from lack of effort, however, as everyone seemed to be in top form. Kasey Carroll posted season-best times in the 1650 and 500 freestyles as well as the 200 butterfly. Vicky Vahos swam her best time of the year in the 100 backstroke. Brigid Ferris notched her best performances in the 200 freestyle and backstroke events, and Leslie Newcombe competed in the 1000 freestyle for the first time this season.

The Shorewomen's best event of the tri-meet was the 200 breaststroke, where Amy Capone and Leslie Newcombe finished 1-2. Coach Kim Lessard was very impressed with Newcombe's performance in the 1000 freestyle, saying she performed "exceptionally well". Captain Vicky Carroll, Karen Brady and Eliza Cohen were key role players in the WC relay performances. Samantha Streamer pulled off a major feat, posting the team record in the 100 freestyle event. This put Streamer in a position to earn a high seeding in the event when the MAC's roll around later this month at Franklin & Marshall.

The undefeated mark WC brought into the Ursinus tri-meet was made possible by victories over York and Lebanon Valley 118-85 on February 3. In the Lebanon Valley meet, Karen Brady won the 200 individual relay and Brigid Ferris took the 100 butterfly. Samantha Streamer took the 200 and 400 freestyle events, and Deeann Pinczok posted her first collegiate triumph. Pinczok captured the 200 breaststroke with Joan Colton also performing well. Amy Capone finished second in the 50 freestyle to a swimmer who will be seeded in the top six in that event at the MAC's. Washington College was 10-0 and flying high going into the tri-meet, where they performed extremely well and concluded the best season in Shorewomen swimming history.

Coach Dennis Berry mentioned he was "tickled with this season" and was very proud of this strong team. Still, according to Berry, the regular season was not as difficult as the MAC's will be for the swimmers. "We're through phase one, now it's on to the next phase," Berry said. "We will condense three dual meets into three days. It will take another level of concentration from our girls." After their meet against Western Maryland, the team will start preparing for the MAC's that begin next week. The Western Maryland meet should result in a Shorewomen victory, ending their season at 11-2. With the arrival of the MAC's, Washington College swimming will be ready to prove that their 11-2 record-breaking season was no fluke.

Are these people left over from Hands Across America? No, it's the women's lacrosse team getting ready for their season opener in early March.

Dr. Jock and the Tale of the Killer Avalanche

If you're a back-country skier – downhill or cross country – or a winter wilderness hiker or snowshoe enthusiast, then you better stop a moment and consider the White Death.

That's what Killer Avalanches will do to you if you're not careful, and sometimes, even if you are careful. Avalanches are fast and are deadly. You can't outrun them and you cannot stand up to them. Avalanches have been clocked at speeds of 50-170 miles an hour, or more. The forces generated by a running avalanche are enough to take your breath away. Permanently. The impact pressure ranges between five and fifty tons per square meter. To bring that home, an impact of just three tons per square meter will totally demolish a wood frame building.

As deep powder areas have opened up more and more to thrill-seeking enthusiasts, the number of people killed by avalanches has climbed steadily. Your chances of being swept up are still pretty slim (especially if you never ski out of bounds or back country), but the more you know, the better your chances of survival. For instance:

Survival rates are grim. It isn't pretty but it's true and you might as well know it: For victims of avalanches buried 30 minutes, the survival rate is only 50 percent. Burial for 3 hours reduces the chances to 10 percent or less. Victims buried in unfavorable positions – head down, with snow packed around face, mouth and nose – can't survive more than 15 minutes.

Read the slope. Avalanches occur most frequently on slopes between 30 and 45 degrees. Avoid north-facing slopes in the winter and south-facing slopes in the spring. Leeward slopes are more dangerous than windward slopes because snow on the lee sides has been deep-seated by wind, making snow depths greater and less stable. Rocks, trees and large bushes help anchor snow on slopes. Open slopes where the skiing is easier will be less stable.

Read the weather. About 80 percent to 90 percent of all avalanches occur just before, during or soon after major winter storms occur. Snowfalls of an inch or more per hour increase danger of an avalanche dramatically. Sustained winds of fifteen miles an hour or more can increase avalanche danger even during clear weather.

Select routes with care. The smartest way to ski the back country is with someone who knows the area and knows the dangers of avalanches. If you're ignorant of both, stick to the groomed slopes. If you go, pick routes that allow you to ski on the windward side of ridges or across valleys well out from dangerous slopes. Avoid open slopes (though they look most seductive)! The reason they have no trees or shrubs is very likely because prior slides have cleared the area. If you're out skiing and sense danger, listen to that feeling. Stop and observe.

One at a time. If you must cross an open slope, do so only one skier at a time. Watch the one crossing carefully. If a slide buries him, you'll know where to look.

If you're caught, swim for your life. If you're unlucky enough to get caught up in an avalanche, discard all equipment – poles, packs, etc. – and swim for your life, keeping your arms and legs in constant motion. The idea is to keep your body as close to the surface as possible. If there's a tree nearby, grab it and hold on for dear life. The tree probably will stand the assault, and if you do, you have a chance to work your way up the tree, through the snow. Once you feel yourself stopping, get one hand in front of your face to create an air pocket. Try and stick your other hand up. If you're lucky it'll stick out of the snow and you can signal your rescuers.

Stay calm once you've stopped. Take a few breaths and try to calm yourself. Look for signs that you might be near the surface. Trying to scream and flailing about will waste energy and oxygen. Wait until you hear the rescue party, and then begin to yell.

Wear a beeper. Don't go out without wearing an avalanche beeper – a device that emits a signal that can be picked up on a universal frequency by a rescue squad. It could cost $150 or more but it very well could save your life.

Help others right away. If your ski buddy is swept under, you must help. If you go for help, chances are slim your friend will be alive when you return. Start from the last point you saw your friend and search down the slope. Look for discarded equipment and clothing. The victim will be under it or below that point. Search around objects like trees or rocks that can stop a body. If there are no clues, look in the tail of the avalanche. That's where most victims are found. It's grim work, but someone has to do it.

Remember: Back-country skiing is thrilling but it can be dangerous. Go with a qualified guide, in a group. The more you know about avalanches and how to avoid them, the better your chance of survival.

Correction by writer

I recently wrote an article on the women's swim team, and in it I made a reference to the cancelled meet against York. In it I quoted Amy Capone as saying "I didn't feel like going that far for a meet anyway." She did not say this; I misunderstood what she said. Amy simply said that this cancelled meet could be beneficial for resting purposes, and for the error I am deeply sorry.

Shoremen capture MAC championship

by Matt Giller

Last weekend, the Shoremen sent out a message to the rest of the MAC and certainly loud enough for those dips in Lancaster, PA to hear - "we're for real."

You mean you haven't heard? What have you been doing - hiding under a rock, dog-sledding in the International Trans-Antarctica Expedition, hangin' out in the coffee house? Did you think the multitude of automobiles in the parking lot last Saturday night were there because of the lecture series's "Frieden, Steinem - babes: a discussion"? No, it was the WAC nailing themselves into first place of the MAC and sealing their second straight NCAA tournament appearence, as well as stretch their conference record to 8 wins without a defeat.

Last Saturday night the Shoremen clinched first place with a 90-88 victory over Ursinus. This victory followed an 87-63 thrashing of the hapless Haverford netters. After losing to the Shoremen earlier this season Haverford entered the Cain Gymnasium last Wednesday night hoping to stage a roundball version of "Revenge of the Nerds". Before the Ogre could bellow "Nerds!", the Shoremen had the game well in hand and took a commanding 54-33 halftime lead. Chris Jamke led all scorers with 18 points and 12 rebounds. Chris Brandt and Tim Keehan followed with 15 and 14 points respectively. Charles "Tank" Duckett matched Keehan's 14 points and added a team-high 5 assists. The bench, which has improved tremendously and has peaked at the right time of the year, added 22 points to seal the victory.

Last Saturday night's game was important to a few people for several different reasons. For one it was a chance to sweep the season from the school that had snatched 3 from the Shoremen last year. In addition, a win for the WAC would also clinch first place in the MAC conference. Furthermore, sentimentally speaking, the game against Ursinus meant the last regular season home game for the highly touted class of '91. Fired up for the occasion, Chris "Bull" Jamke played the first half like a, uh, bull possessed. The senior center scored 17 of his points in the opening 20 minutes to keep the game close. The WAC was still trailing 41-39 going into the locker room.

The Ursinus Bears came out into the second half and shot out to a 10 point lead. Coach Finnegan regrouped his team, who retaliated with 9 straight points. For the next 5 minutes it was neck and neck, until the Shoremen stretched the lead to 12 aided by 7 3-point bombs. Inspired senior C.J. Johnson, bomb squad leader, had 3 tres in his 15 points. This was matched by Keehan's three bombs(18 points) and Tank Duckett's 2(11 points, 7 assists). But the Bears came back via the 3-point stripe as well, slicing into the Shoremen's lead. Still, clutch free throws at the end of the game enabled the WAC to keep the Bears at arm's length. Ursinus, however, kept it close and had possession of the ball with under 10 seconds left and down by only two points. Fortunately, their last ditch effort failed as the ball fell off the rim into friendly arms.

Brandt led the WAC with 22 points and dished out 7 assists. Jamke ended the game with 19 points and 12 rebounds and freshman Peter Basel added 5 points from the bench. The team shot a scorching 62% from the field in the second half to push them over the top and keep their 11 game winning streak alive.

The Shoremen end their season this Saturday at Johns Hopkins University. This game, coupled with their February 14 game against Widener, will bring the team's storybook season to a close. The WAC have clinched the MAC championship with an 8-0 conference mark, and their regular season record stands at 19-3. The team should return home on Thursday, February 22 for an important MAC playoff game.

Read and Gewer give strong showing in Rolex

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The Washington College tennis duo of Scott Read and Larry Gewer returned from the Rolex National Indoor Small College Tennis Championships this weekend with a fifth place finish under their belt. The tournament, held on February 6 and 7, is possibly the top national competition for small college tennis programs. This was the second year the tandem of Read and Gewer had advanced to the Rolex tournament, and this year the duo produced their first win in this prestigious event.

Read and Gewer were one of eight doubles teams in the competition. The field was made up of the best doubles teams from Division II, Division III and junior college programs. The WC duo had qualified for the tournament in the fall, and this was their first match of the spring semester.

Their first match came against the top seed in the doubles tournament and the #1 duo in the junior college rankings. Read and Gewer were playing a doubles team from Midland Junior College. Midland captured the first set 6-3, but Read and Gewer bounced back to take the next set 6-3 and even the match at one set apiece. The WC duo was down 2-1 in the third set, but the partners from Midland managed to break Gewer's serve. Midland went on to take the third set 6-2 and win the match.

Despite the loss, coach Fred Wyman was very pleased with the duo's performance. "I was really proud of the guys. I thought they did a great job, not only in the first match, but throughout the tournament."

Read and Gewer played their next match against Abraham Baldwin Agricultural College. The duo playing from ABAC were originally from New Zealand, and they were the #3 ranked doubles team in junior college. They were alsoJuCoall-Americans, and they played well in their match against WC. The match was very close, with Read and Gewer winning 7-5,7-5. "This was a really satisfying victory," Wyman said. "The win will add credibility to the school and our program."

WC then moved on to their third match of the tournament, playing a tandem from Southwestern Baptist. The duo finished last year ranked #14 in the country in the Division II rankings. WC went up a break in the first set, but Southwestern Baptist roared back to take four straight games. Read and Gewer then won two straight games to pull within 5-4, but then dropped the next game and the first set by a score of 6-4. Southwestern Baptist then captured the second set by the same score, and WC returned home with a 1-2 record and a fifth place finish.

Fred Wyman was still extremely pleased with the showing of Gewer and Read. "It was a nice experience, as usual," Wyman commented. "The people involved in the tournament were as nice as can be." He was especially satisfied with the banquet, where coach Allan Fox of Pepperdine was the speaker. "I was really glad to get a chance to hear him," the WC coach said.

The men's tennis team continued their tournament play last weekend in the Lee Short Memorial Tournament. WC made a very strong showing in this open tournament. Larry Gewer lost in the finals to the #1 seed from the University of Richmond. The match lasted three sets before Gewer bowed 2-6, 6-2, 6-4. Peter Maller lost in the quarterfinals to the eventual tournament champion, and Allon Rock played very well in his matches.

This weekend Scott Read and Scott Shepherd head north to play in the Trenton State Invitational Tournament. WC has a history of strong showings in this tournament. Two years ago Gewer beat Read in the finals, and last year Andy Bohutinsky was consolation champion. This year Read is the top seed in the tournament, and he should also combine with Shepherd for a strong showing in doubles. Shepherd will also compete for the singles championship.

Wyman is very happy with the way the fall season and this semester's tournaments have progressed. Their schedule is busy, and their spring trip begins in less than a month. The WC coach feels that Gewer and Read's showing in the Rolex tournament is a good indication of the team's chances for a successful spring semester. "We played great competition in the Rolex, and all three matches were tight," Wyman said. "Scott and Larry played a great tournament and represented the school very well."

Cousineau warns of pitfalls in interpretting Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot

WAITING FOR GODOT
IS NOT JUST ONE OF THE BEST PLAYS OF THE SEASON, IT IS ONE OF THE MASTERPIECES OF THE CENTURY."
SHERIDAN SQUARE THEATRE

WC Associate Professor of English Thomas Cousineau recently published a critical analysis of Beckett's famous play, Waiting for Godot. Cousineau spent two years completing research in Paris.

by Claire Capuzzi

Sometime during the first American production of Waiting for Godot, director Alan Schneider turned to author Samuel Beckett with the query that has stumped scholars and critics since the work's publication. "Who or what does Godot mean?" In response to this burning question, Beckett replied simply, "If I knew, I would have said so in the play."

So much for critical analysis, or so it would seem. Like his work, Beckett's comment has a air of mystery about it—a kind of intellectual Rubik's Cube for the literary minded.

In his recent publication Waiting for Godot: Form in Movement (A Reader Companion to the Play) from which the above anecdote is taken, WC Associate Professor of English Thomas Cousineau guides the reader away from the idea that Godot is a problem that must be solved. Instead he offers the reader a non-restrictive and highly accessible analysis of Beckett's play, stressing the relationship between the text and the action that takes place on stage.

Through his discussion of critical reception of Godot, Cousineau points out that the pitfalls of interpretation lie in believing that the play conveniently serves as an allegory for the critic's own system of beliefs. Too often, the end result of such interpretations is either facile or hopelessly complicated, and in most cases, fails to encompass the wholeness of the work. Cousineau avoids projecting meaning on to the text that doesn't belong there—he urges the reader to understand that Godot resists interpretation as strongly as the drama invites it.

In his own analysis of the play, Cousineau begins by examining Beckett's motivations for writing. He describes the author's fascination with Descartes and suggests that Beckett's work reflects an extension of that philosopher's theories—namely, that even thought becomes an uncertain foundation for existence in Godot. Other Western traditions of logic are also discarded, among them, the distinction between truth and falsehood, the law of causality, the demoting of language and the upgrading of physical action, as well as the role of family and friendship. Cousineau discusses all these at length, implicating that their loss clears the way for a new evaluation of the human condition. While Beckett takes away our intellectual foundations, by doing so he liberates us from the confines of a certain way of thinking. In his introduction to the play, Cousineau writes, ". . . we intuitively recognize that the beliefs and foundations undermined by Godot exact a heavy price in terms of instinctual renunciation for the stability that they provide; they are more a burden than a foundation."

Cousineau's sensitivity to the work is made clear by his carefully structured approach to analyzing the play. His discussions of the role of language versus the action that takes place on stage are particularly interesting. He emphasizes that action in Godot is not subordinate to the text, as in more traditional forms of theater, but a language entirely its own—a more prominent vehicle of expression than the text itself.

The final chapters of the book deal with the issues of Metaphor and Metonymy, and Repetition and Difference, two structural devices whose explanation reveals the reason behind the circular logic and often frustrating dialogue in Godot.

Cousineau never fails to bring out the humor in the play—humor that may have escaped first-time readers. Most importantly, he encourages the reader to evaluate Godot as he does—carefully and thoroughly, without forgetting the beauty and permanence of the whole work.

Historian Franklin addresses WC campus

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff Writer

As part of the celebration of George Washington's birthday, historian and educator Dr. John Hope Franklin will be the keynote speaker at the Birthday Convocation, scheduled for tomorrow afternoon in Tawes Theater.

Franklin, Professor Emeritus of History and Professor of Legal History in the Law School at Duke University, has authored over nine books, of which From Slavery to Freedom: A History of Negro Americans is probably best known.

An Oklahoma native, Franklin has taught at Fisk University, North Carolina Central University and Howard University, while also serving as History Department Chairman for both Brooklyn College and the University of Chicago.

Race and History: Selected Essays, 1938-1988 is this historian's most recent book, a collection of essays spanning a five decade teaching and writing career. Franklin's current research focuses on " Dissidents on the Plantation: Runaway Slaves."

Not only has Franklin served as a writer, but he has been active in such groups as the American Studies Association , the Southern Historical Association and the American Historical Association.

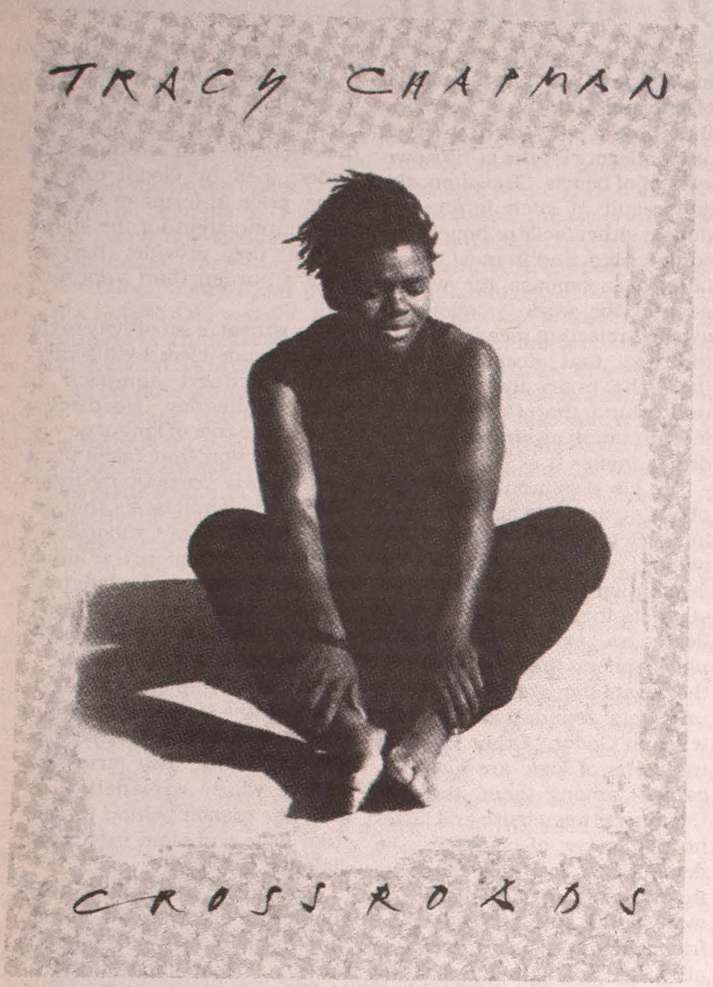
Female neo-folk generation on the rise

Chapman and Indigo Girls lead pack



Let's talk about neo-folk... Let's talk about women singer-songwriters... Doesn't it seem that every time you turn around a new one has popped up?

The floodgates were opened by Suzanne Vega's self-titled album a few years back, and since then several so-called "neo-folk" women artists have appeared, with Tracy Chapman, the most successful, among them. While not all neo-folk singers are actually from the folk tradition, they are being lumped together in what can be called a renaissance of the folk mentality.

The artists and their music do vary: Vega considers herself to have risen from the punk tradition, specifically Lou Reed while Natalie Merchant's lyrics for 10,000 Maniacs sometimes read like beat poetry, not like Peter, Paul and Mary, and Edie Brickell doesn't even sound like a folk singer at all.

But for every musical crossbreed, we get an Indigo Girls or a Chapman, singing her socially relevant tunes accompanied by her guitar. All these performers, and others as disparate as Michelle Shocked, Melissa Etheridge and Tanita Tikaram, seem to convey a feel of folk music, if not the actual substance. Some call it "neo-folk," others call it the women singer/songwriters' revenge. Whatever it is, everyone agrees that it is good.

So, what is going on, then? All these women are writing lyrics like "shooting up junk in the bathroom/ making it with punks on the floor/ ... you got a lot of living to do without life..." (Brickell) or "Here in Subcity life is hard/ We can't receive any government relief/ I'd like to give Mr. President my honest regards/ ... for disregarding me..." (Chapman). While bluntness is perhaps ruining some of the appeal that characterized the complex, poetic lyrics of Paul Simon and Bob Dylan, the social relevance is pervasive.

And the music is not all mournful guitar tunes. On the self-titled album Indigo Girls, Emily Saliers and Amy Ray recruited Paulinho DaCosta for percussion and Michael Stipe for vocals. Chapman has DaCosta and Neil Young's guitar and piano on her latest, and The New Bohemians, a fairly high-tech band, back up Brickell's lyrics with their own music. The music of the neo-folk women is active, engaging, frequently memorable and often haunting.

Two albums that have recently appeared on the market demonstrate the musical range found among these performers. Tracy Chapman's follow-up to her smash hit debut is entitled Crossroads; and the Indigo Girls have re-released their 1987 album Strange Fire in the wake of the success of the single "Closer to Fine" from Indigo Girls, perhaps hoping to remove their earlier work from its obscurity.

Strange Fire is not what one would expect as a follow-up to last year's album. For one thing, it's entirely acoustic. Gone is the electric twelve-string guitar, gone are the piano and the drums. Six-string guitars and a flute or two, and th-th-that's all, folks. Once you adjust to the different sound of the music, however, there is much to reward you.

For one thing, although the lyrics are clearly an earlier stage of development for Saliers and Ray, many of them are still as effective and poetic as on the later album. Ray is characterized by a more obscure, literary style, while Saliers is more direct and often more touching; on Strange Fire Saliers manages to write one of the best songs I have heard about a person's relationship with God, and she does so without sounding preachy or sentimental.

The track "Hey Jesus" is structured in three parts, each one from a different day as Saliers tries to ask Jesus for a favor, discovers that religion doesn't work that way and eventually recognizes that fact but chooses to abandon faith. The song is made even more interesting by the fact that both Ray and Saliers are obviously deeply religious; biblical (and literary) allusions pepper the lyrics of most of their songs. Thus the song seems inconclusive, leaving the individual listener to decide the fate of the issue.

The title track shows where the harmonies of later songs came from, and some songs, like "Crazy Game," are evidence that they enjoy experimenting with different musical styles. An acoustic version of "Land of Canaan" ends the album, and again, it is interesting to compare the treatment of the song at different times. The electric version is more energetic, although the elimination of the harmonica is probably a bad idea. The vocals are rougher, the harmonies not as clean.

In fact, the same holds true for most of the songs on the album— there are many that would have benefited from the more modern touches that run throughout Indigo Girls— at the very least, some variety of instrumentation would have been nice.

Wide appeal is one of the keys to the neo-folk movement, and in 1987 Saliers and Ray had not yet discovered that. In spite of the typical deficiencies of a first album, the promise is also there, and this album is worth buying for anyone who enjoys acoustic guitar music.

Tracy Chapman's new release is entitled Crossroads, and indeed the artist herself is at a crossroads of sorts; she has to follow up her enormously successful debut while maintaining her ideals.

Chapman chose to forego a tour in spite of her success in order to travel with Youssou N'Dour, Sting, Peter Gabriel and Bruce Springsteen on the Amnesty International Tour. Unlike Chapman, all the other stars were well-established artists, in no danger of losing their audiences because of a year-long hiatus.

During the tour, Chapman peeled down the polished performances from her album into their presumably original acoustic form, providing quiet interludes in between the musically complex sets of N'Dour and Sting and the raw and energetic ones of Springsteen and Gabriel.

This style carries over onto her new album; it is overall a quieter performance, perhaps more assured. It is rhythmically more complex, but the sounds are not as bright and clear as on Tracy Chapman. It is a more subdued album in all but one respect: the lyrics.

Strident is the word to describe songs like "Subcity" and "Material World"— perhaps too strident. Lyrics like "You've been sold down the river/ Just another form of slavery/ And the whole man-made white world/ Is your master..." are sure to alienate some. After all, the themes on her debut were mostly things that few could disagree with: Alcoholism, wife-beating, apartheid— usually simple black-and-white issues.

In several songs on Crossroads, Chapman addresses the fact that she is becoming more overtly political and uncompromising. "All you folks think you run my life/ Say I should be willing to compromise/ I say all you demons go back to hell/ I'll save my soul save myself," sings Chapman.

In spite of, or perhaps because of, the controversial nature of many of the songs, Crossroads has plenty of appealing qualities. The bluesy "Born to Fight" sticks out, as does her homage to Nelson Mandela, "Freedom Now."

However, the gem of the album is definitely "All That You Have is Your Soul," a touching story about innocence and conscience which seems to sum up all of Chapman's motives for writing and performing music.

This is not to say that the album is flawless. Far from it. The interesting vocal style that characterized the debut is carried a bit too far: enunciation suffers. For instance, the lyric "born to fight" sounds like "I'm mortified." Some of the songs do not seem memorable enough— such as "This Time"— although this is perhaps the result of the high expectations generated by the first album.

All in all, Crossroads strikes me, at least, like a typical second album: some of the promise of the first is carried through, but the performer needs to take a step back to re-assess what is going on and come back after regaining confidence to really blow us away with the third album.

So, what is the state of the neo-folk women songwriting world? Promising, to say the least. Given the wide range of topics tackled and the diversity of styles, there seems to be a strange sort of cohesiveness. While the male songwriters have had years to establish themselves and are now household names, women songwriters have had to rely essentially on artists like Joni Mitchell and Carole King for inspiration. What we can hope for in the nineties is some music from these "neo-folkies" that can equal the best of Dylan, Springsteen, Simon, Mellencamp, Young and all the others who arose from the original folk movement and went on to develop personal variations on the guitar-and-rusty-voice tradition of Woody Guthrie. And that's certainly not a bad goal to aspire to.

Raphael Koster is a sophomore who spends entirely too much time listening to music.

Hall inspections yield bad news

Recent dormitory inspections yielded negative reports for some dorm hallways. As a result in the next few weeks some students will be forced to remove wall decorations and dismantle phone cabling.

According to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, the inspections are conducted "from time to time" to examine "cleanliness and the overall conditions of the facilities."

One particular concern at this review was telephone cabling that some students use when sharing phone lines. In some cases the wiring is taped to the walls of the hallway. Baer's worry is that "when these wires come down we'll find damages to newly renovated dorms."

He added, "I don't like imposing dorm damage fees."

Reid Hall was cited as one dorm which now needs to be repainted ahead of schedule because of such infractions. According to Baer, dorms are usually repainted every three years, but Reid now requires it after only two.

Paul Bishop, Director of the Computing Center, outlined proper procedure for students who wish to share a phone line.

Students must contact Ian Gilellan of campus telecommunications. It is similar to when campus extensions are installed in dorm rooms. There is a $25 installation charge, which, Bishop stated, "is a lot less than the $60 the phone company will charge you."

"You also don't need to buy two thousand feet of phone line from Radio Shack."

Interested students also need the permission of the person with the C&P phone, before extensions can be installed from the phone number.

Said Bishop of damages caused by unauthorized lines, "Everywhere tape gets pulled down, paint comes off."

He also stated, "I think it would be to the students' advantage to live in a dorm without wires strung in every direction."

Phone lines are not the only thing under fire from the inspections. Some students who live in Wicomico, for example, are supposed to remove wall decorations, which, they are told, pose a fire hazard.

Baer stressed, "I'm not opposed to decorations, but the fire Marshall has regulations about what can and cannot be done."

According to Security's Life Safety Code Book there are only two regulations concerning decorations.

Section 31 - 1.2.2.1 states, "no decorations or other obstructions shall be placed as to obstruct exits, access thereto, egress therefrom, or visibility thereof."

Apparently none of the decorations targeted were in any way an obstruction.

Section 31 - 1.4.2. states that no decorations of "an explosive or highly flammable nature" are allowed. If strictly observed, one might posit that all of the paper decorations almost every student has on his door would have to be removed as well as hallway bulletin boards with any paper on them.

While Baer commended the "excellent custodial staff, a group of people who frequently get no thanks for what they do and they do a very difficult job" he also called attention to some "particular areas that aren't as clean as they ought to be."

Part of the problem is definitely related to campus construction. Baer conceded that much mud and dirt is tracked inside the dormitories. He also stated that construction should soon come to an end.

A list of "problem areas" which Baer has compiled will be relayed to Student Affairs, and any action which may be taken will be taken in conjunction with that office.

SGA fields criticisms

by Susie Mazzullo

Does the Student Government Association here at Washington College really represent the students? Do they have sufficient power to get the issues at hand passed by the administration? Freshman Curtis Campbell answers a definite no to both of these questions.

Curtis is the Senator for Kent House. He has recently been up for impeachment by the Student Government because of a number of missed meetings and rowdiness at the ones he attended.

He states however that he has missed the meetings for a number of reasons. The most important reason to him is that he feels that the Student Government only "serves, for the most part, as a rubber stamp and doesn't have a purpose except for as a figurehead."

He also stated that the Student Government and the administration, in his opinion, do not work together as a team and, most importantly, they don't respect each other.

Other reasons include the time and content of the meetings. The meetings are held at 9:45 on Tuesdays. Because they are started so late, Curtis says they are generally rushed. The issues themselves he feels are either unimportant or never get passed.

An example of this is that the SGA has been trying to change the transcript form for seniors. Curtis' point is that even though this isn't a very detailed or lengthy project, it has yet to be completed.

In his opinion, more initiative needs to be taken in order to push issues through the administration quickly and efficiently.

Because of all of this, Curtis feels that his homework and studying are definitely more important than attending the meeting. These feelings have resulted in his lack of attendance at SGA meetings.

Curtis gave a number of examples to back up his allegations that what the Student Government does accomplish is for the most part ineffectual and unimportant. The Recycling Program and the bands hired for the Coffee House providing weekend entertainment are two such examples.

The Recycling Program was recently started here at WC. Special bins and trash containers have been placed in many areas around the school so that trash and recyclable material can be separated.

The problem, Curtis feels, is in the execution of this program. Bins were first placed in areas such as the Coffee House and then the girls dorms; Reid Hall, Queen Anne, and Minta Martin. Only recently were containers placed in Kent House, Somerset, and Cecil. Curtis argues that males will undoubtedly drink more than females throughout the week and therefore the containers should have logically been placed in those areas first.

Now that all of the dorms have been equipped with containers the problem is emptying them. Curtis describes overflowing containers on many floors that are repeatedly ignored. "Whose responsibility is it?" he asks when it comes time to carry out the last part of this project.

The bands at the Coffee House on weekends and the lack of attendance by WC students is a problem that Curtis feels needs immediate attention.

"The Student Government loses money on every band. Why

WC graduate to work with super conductors at ORNL

April Baugher, who graduated from Washington College last fall with a degree in physics, is one of 30 participants in this spring's Oak Ridge Science and Engineering Research Semester (ORSERS) Program at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL).

ORNL, one of the nation's largest federal multipurpose production, research, and development centers, is among five major facilities managed by Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., for the Department of Energy.

Supported by DOE's Office of Energy Research through its Science Centers Program, ORSERS was initiated in the fall of 1987 to strengthen laboratory and academic research and training at the six participating national laboratories. The program enables college students to perform ongoing scientific research; to learn to operate sophisticated, state-of-the-art equipment; and to supplement their laboratory experiences with seminars, workshops, and courses.

The 18-week science semester provides opportunities for student research and advanced study in energy related areas of science and technology, including the biomedical, environmental, and physical sciences; nuclear and engineering technologies; applied mathematics; and advanced energy systems.

Baugher is assigned to ORNL's Solid State Division where she is conducting where she is conducting research on superconductors.

$3,990.

The payments will be based on a review of Jackson's ability to make them and, according to Hessey, they are reinforced by a mortgage on a piece of property which the College will claim if he fails to meet the agreement.

The former Student Government Treasurer was impeached this time last year, February 10, 1989 for allegedly embezzling SGA funds.

At that time the amount stolen was inestimable because unpaid bills were still surfacing, but some sources ventured to estimate that it was at least $10,000. In addition to missing funds, the SGA lost control over its bank account. While student officers could previously sign and cash checks, the SGA now runs on a "voucher system," with no absolute personal student access to funds.

While making monthly payments to the College, Jackson will also perform community service.

waste all of that money on bands that no one goes to see?"

He feels the solution lies in the Student Government's backing of the fraternities and sororities on campus. Since most of the weekend entertainment is centered around these organizations, he suggests that the SGA only get tow or three big bands a year, such as New Potato Caboose, and then give money to the fraternities and sororities to sponsor more weekend events.

Curtis says his complaints are in no way against the people holding office but more about the institution itself. He says that from what he's seen the Student Government can't do anything without administrative approval while the administration may pass policies regardless of the opinion of the SGA. This results in the Student Government having a lack of power when implementing and executing programs.

Steve Attias, the current President of the Student Government Association, disagrees with the opinions of Curtis Campbell.

"His claims are unfounded and the SGA this year has accomplished a number of very important programs." These programs include the Miss Dee Dollars or coupon books which "were only completed after a lot of very hard work and effort," says Steve and the recycling programs which the SGA developed with Clint Baer.

Other programs very important to the school include: getting a new location for the SGA office as well as a computer and a printer, improving student administration communication by way of open forums, and organizing the first student faculty dinner.

"The administrators sent two students from the SGA to a national leadership conference this year to show their appreciation. They have never done that in the history of the SGA."

Attias concluded, "Curtis has a number of good suggestions. I'm only sorry he didn't attend more meetings and participated instead of hindering the process. It was not an easy task but we have accomplished a lot and left the organization in good shape for the new officers."

Police Report

Washington College student Andrew Jay Walbert, appeared in court recently to face charges of driving while intoxicated under the influence of "alcohol, drugs, alcohol and drugs and a controlled dangerous substance," according to the Kent County News. He received supervised probation for 18 months and was ordered to undergo alcohol and drug therapy. He paid a $160 fine.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

From many of the comments I received, those of you who attended Wednesday's dinner, really enjoyed the menu. I was sorry that someone felt compelled to take the Valentine cake we had on display. The W.C.D.S. tries to do things for the board students, from time to time, and incidents such as this happen. Again, I find myself asking, "WHAT HAPPENED TO THE HONOR CODE?"

Next Wednesday, at dinner, the W.C.D.S. and J.P. Brokerage will sponsor a Stouffer's Night. On February 28th, there will be a Cross Culture Dinner.

I would like to pass a little pre-game meal tips onto our sports team members. The timing, size and composition of a pre-game meal can affect performance. Such meals should be eaten 3 to 4 hours before the event.

Avoid eating spicy, gas-producing, high-roughage or unfamiliar food. Eat a high starch lowfat meal, consisting of about 500 calories, and drink plain, cold water (no ice) or unsweetened fruit juices.

That is all for this week. Until the next time...................................MOM

In this beautifully made memory piece, first-time director Claire Denis demonstrates an art of understatement and suggestion. She builds a dramatic method based on what people don't say—or do—to one another. Many scenes lead toward an explosion but then stop before they detonate. Set in the former French colony of Cameroon, we are in a beautiful but sinister country, baking and still; the movie establishes the thin line between security and fear, contentment and unease. Forum meets, debates future plans for the Student Center

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Thirteen members of the Washington College community attended the Hodson Hall Student Center Project Open Campus Meeting this Wednesday evening to discuss renovations to the building's basement.

The architects, Brawer & Hauptman, were present at this meeting specifically to hear student input concerning the renovations.

The project currently involves a complete restoration of the Hodson Hall basement; combining the present snack bar and Coffee House facilities; creating a student study lounge; moving the Bookstore into the Academic Resources Center; and creating handicapped access to the basement, as well as a number of other improvements.

According to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, funding has come from state funding and the Hodson Trust Fund.

"Theoretically, we have $700,000 at this point, with only one third of the way to go in raising money."

The student study lounge will be an alternative study area to Miller Library, and will be open at times when the library is closed. It will also serve as an informal gathering place, possibly furnished with a television, a VCR, and a functioning fireplace.

The state should provide approximately $300,000 to $350,000, given the fact that the study room complies with funding guidelines, with the Hodson trust matching it.

However, Baer says that state funding is not yet confirmed, and higher education funding "is under fire right now."

Nevertheless, planning and the schematic stages are well under way: the primary focus of the Wednesday meeting was "ambiance."

The main concern of the evening was the proposed combination of Miss Dee's snack bar and the Coffee House facilities. The biggest proposed change is the removal of the wall between the two existing areas in order to create a new snack bar with tables and a large multi-purpose room, also with tables and a stage for bands who come to play at Washington College.

It was also posed at the meeting that a portable bar be stored to alleviate traffic at the snack facilities when big events are going on.

This new service would involve the cooperative efforts of the Miss Dee staff, College food services, and possibly other student employees. According to Baer, a Student Center director may also be hired to program the facility, supervise, make suggestions, and be actively involved with the student body.

One student who attended the meeting worried that the Miss Dee operation would be overpowered and absorbed by the new student center.

"To bring in the bureaucracy of the food service would only cause harm," he stated.

The student apparently approves of Miss Dee's as it exists. He said, "If the organization works well, why change it?"

Another student in attendance, sophomore Kevin Kelly, was concerned that quality of food would not be maintained. "When students go there will they get a Miss Dee's cheese-steak or a CYSCO cheese-steak? To students that's important."

Dave Knowles of the Dining Services assures students that quality will not be compromised, and they should be able to get anything they request He added that the Dining Hall will be able to get supplies more regularly.

Knowles also assured that the effort to combine would be handled in "the most ethical and morally upright way as possible."

The last time the Coffee House was renovated was nearly a decade ago, and the snack bar has not been renovated since approximately 1965.

Students may contribute their ideas on any issue from decor to menu and are invited to the next meeting, which will be held on Tuesday, February 27 at 7 PM in Hynson Lounge.

Any questions may be directed to Clint Baer.

Recycling effort extends from WC to community

Tracey Connell
Staff writer

While Washington College's Recycling program has "gotten off to a good start," according to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, it is not the only local effort to stem harmful accumulations of trash.

All of the public and private schools in Kent County recycle, and county commissioners recently allocated over $5,000 to research a county wide effort.

A plan has already been submitted to the state of Maryland which would require residents to purchase special bags for their recyclable waste. It is hoped that the personal cost of the bags will inspire individuals to avoid simply throwing items away with unrecyclable materials.

Washington College students did not seem to need this kind of prompting.

Said Baer, "The only problem we've had is that the containers are too small. They've been filling up rather quickly."

He added, "We anticipate obtaining larger containers and better facilities."

Baer also tried to allay concerns that the recycling effort has caused unnecessary work for the custodial staff. He stressed that "absolutely no custodian has ever been asked to recycle by going through the trash" and their only responsibility is "transporting the materials to the central recycling system."

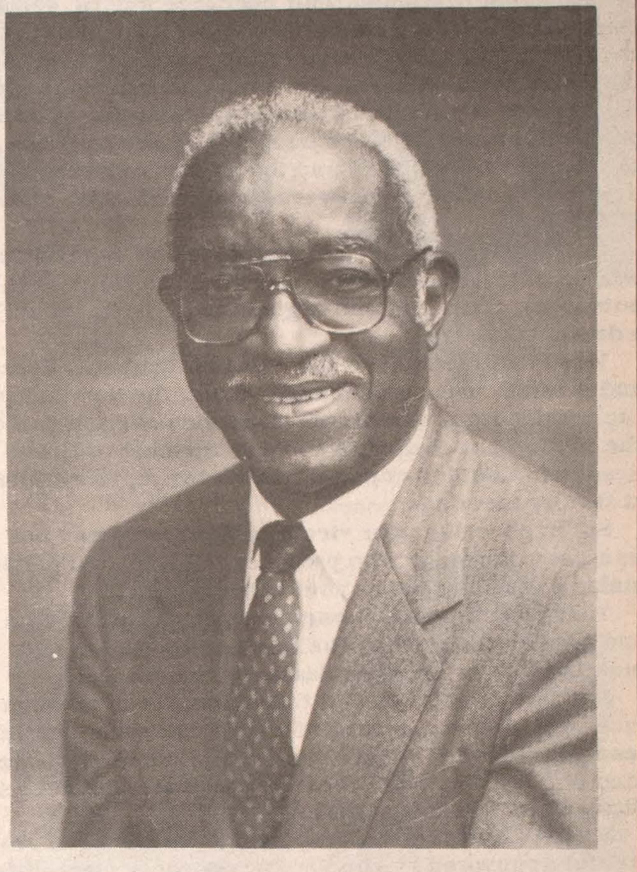
Franklin speaks at Convocation



John Hope Franklin, a James B. Duke Professor of History, Emeritus and Professor of Legal History at Duke University, spoke at Spring Convocation last Saturday. The subject of Franklin's talk was the always controversial topc of athletics versus academics. Franklin commended Washington College for avoiding the pitfalls placing importance on athletics over academics. "...that is why I think institutions such as Washington College mean more today to the future of higher education than they ever did."

SCC hears first cases of the academic year

by Kyndra Ponder

The Student Conduct Council (SCC) heard three cases at its first meeting of the 1989-1990 academic year.

The first case that the SCC heard concerned Tim Albinson, Security reported that on January 28 at about 3 AM, Officer Bryant was almost hit by a car that he attempted to flag down. The car was parked on the grass outside of the quad dorms. Security later determined that the car was driven by Albinson.

Albinson was charged with "Disturbance, Vandalism and Endangering the well-being of a member of the Washington College Community."

After deliberation, the SCC found Albinson responsible for "Endangering the well-being of a member of the Washington College community." He was given "disciplinary probation" and ordered to perform twenty-five hours of community service.

The SCC's second case of the evening involved students Adam Brown and Bridgette Ferris. They were charged with "Disturbance and Vandallism" against Michelle Sadtler. Security charged that on January 27 they responded to a call and found Ferris and Brown standing on top of a car yelling at each other. Both students agreed that there was "no malicious intent" involved in the incident and Ferris stated it was, on her part, "a whim because [I] was upset."

Brown and Ferris were held responsible for both charges and were given an "Official College Warning" which will stay on their records for the duration of the

EDITORIAL

A friendly guide to your local SGA

With SGA elections looming on the horizon, this is a perfect time to brush up on the duties of those we elect to office. What follows is (for the most part) straight out of your trusty student handbook. On Monday, be sure to match the best candidate with each job.

President: presides over Senate meetings; appoints Senate committees and their chairmen and fill vacancies in those Senate committees with the approval of the Senate; serves as a non-voting representative to the Board of Visitors and Governors, at faculty meetings, and to the Alumni Council; votes during Senate proceedings only to break ties; gives greetings from the student body at Fall and Spring Convocations; and oversees cooperation between the Senate, SAB, and SCC.

Obviously, an ideal president would be ingratiating, well-groomed, and well-spoken. Come to think of it, an outspoken president who is given to activism would be a dream-come-true.

Vice-President: chairs the Student Academic Board and presides over its meetings; chairs the Senate when the presidents is absent; serves as vice chairperson of the All-Campus Judiciary and as a member of the Academic Counicil and as a non-voting representative at faculty meetings.

So, in choosing your vice-president, you may not want, say, someone who preaches "BEER!" and parties making decisions about your academic life.

Treasurer: handles monetary business of the SGA and reports the state of the finances at each Senate meeting; chairs the Organizations Committee.

Secretary: calls roll and takes minutes of all Senate meetings; prepares a current agenda for each meeting; reads minutes for Senate approval at the start of each meeting; handles all SGA correspondence; maintains files; chairs Publicity Committee.

Social Chairpersons: responsible for all social activities sponsored by the Senate; coordinate activities on campus; chair the Social Committee.

Let's elect an SGA based on candidates' ideas, not popularity.

Happy voting!

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

Letters to the Editor

And now, here's the real Hewes op-ed

Editor's Note: In last week's Elm, the same op-ed was inadvertently printed twice. What follows is Suzanne Hewes' essay discussing which issues the next SGA president should place particular emphasis on:

Everyone has ideas as to what they want their President to be, but very few voice their opinions. So this is my chance to voice my views and to hopefully get the rest of the student body to start thinking of what they want their student body president to do for them.

In my opinion, the student government association is running the smoothest I have ever seen it run. Being here for now two and a half years I have had the experience of dealing with Richard McKnight and Perry Finney, (for the Freshman, the two previous S.G.A. Presidents).

Suzanne Hewes

Steve Attias has brought something to this job that the other two did not, and that is personability and concern for the student body. This is the way the president should be. The president should be well rounded, not only in academics and culture, but also in the college community.

The next president should have the feel for the diversity of this student community so that not only can he or she make important decisions concerning all of us, but also to convey this diversity to the administration.

Obviously the president should try to meet the student needs of today. But the upcoming president, whoever she or he might be, should also look to the needs of tomorrow.

This is another area in which Steve Attias has done an excellent job. He has made a strong appearance in the search for our upcoming president of the college and in the renovation of Hodson Hall. These are definitely two areas that not only benefit present students but also the future ones.

Additionally, the new S.G.A. President should also work in order to mold a good relationship with the incoming president of the college. This is crucial for the voices of the student body to be heard in Bunting Hall.

Other issue the upcoming president should be concerned with are adequate space for parking, the recycling of student waste, the continuation of student unity. Finally, the president should maintain good campus events. Especially those that bring the entire campus together such as the Tamara Alexander benefit did. There is a definite feeling of comradery among the students during such events.

There are closer relations not only between the clubs, but especially between the fraternities and sororities. It is good not to see men from different fraternities squabbling at parties. There is support for one another, and that is the way the campus should be. This campus is very personable, and not only does that make the student body look good, but also the president.

KAs & racism controversy: "one last stab" at the issue

To the Editor:

I'd like to take one last stab at the "All KA's are Racist" issue, and focus on the confederate flag as a symbol of the organization and the South in general.

I know the argument for the flag is centered around Southern Pride. Southern Pride is fine. The KA's have merely chose the wrong symbol to attach themselves to, and worship.

There's a photography show at Tawes which has photos from the civil rights movement of the 1960's. One of the photos is of a KKK rally; and alongside the burning cross and white hoods, there's a confederate flag. Images like this one are what stigmatize the flag, and influence people when they go to form an opinion of this symbol and those who flaunt it. Consequently, no matter what rationales you give, or how much community service you do, people have already formed an opinion of you.

DON'T FORGET TO VOTE!

Elections for Student Government officers 1990-1991 will be held this Monday, February 26.

DON'T FORGET TO VOTE!

ISSUE: What was the highlight or downfall of your Birthday Ball experience this year?

Leisure suits, studs, and cherry twigs

Stephanie Ward

Did this year's Birthday Ball live up to my expectations? Well, first of all, let me say that the high point of my evening was seeing Jim Sobczak at the Ball in his white leisure suit. After that anything else is anticlimactic, I assure you.

How could the evening be anything less than dazzling? I had the most coveted date on campus, Brett Maverick. (Little did I know that the Numbers LadyTM would come after me with a machete. Thank goodness Cletis set up a diversion, or I would have never gotten away.) We had a modest little cocktail party with forty or fifty of our closest friends, drank fluorescent punch and danced on the furniture. Then we decided it was time to move on.

The big band was good, when they stuck to their genre, but as soon as they started belting out "Proud Mary," I knew it was time to go off and socialize. The next thing I knew, the band was taking a break—a really, really long break. Without the express written consent of Major League Baseball.

I was better off, however, because the longer I stayed on the dance floor, the more I ran the risk of losing an eye to one of Charlie Brown's four Christmas trees. Oh wait, those were Gordy's four cherry trees—I almost didn't notice the difference. Both versions were of twig proportion, both were overridden with Christmas lights, both had really weird people dancing around them and shaking their big heads back and forth. Oh, never mind...

So I socialized and promised dances to just about everyone there until I had to excuse myself for the bathroom. Well, I realize that the line was long, but by the time I got back into that well-lit gymnasium, not only had the band finished their break, they had gone on another one. I spent this portion of the ball talking to my alumni friends who had paid $100 a couple and looking for a stick so I could get the women and autograph hounds away from my date (That was my own fault for going with Hot Stud #1 Brett Maverick).

By the time I had finally dragged my date away from all those wild women and onto the dance floor, the band had been playing for a whole fifteen to twenty minutes. Then, just when I was getting down to "In the Mood," the band announced that they were now playing the last two songs of the night. The last two songs! I had promised half the visiting alumni and maintenance men in attendance a dance! But I wasn't leaving Brett Maverick's side, for fear he'd go berserk with a fire extinguisher.

As I danced, I thought, "How nice it would be if there were some ornaments on those trees!" But, alas, I forgot that one ornament could make the whole tree fall over. I still wish I'd thought to bring a hatchet so I could keep with the theme of the occasion and get a really cool souvenir in the process.

And then, it was all over. The momentous occasion that I had so long anticipated was finished. I left thinking, "I bought new lingerie for this?" I could have gone to the Bowl-a-rama with Phil Macek.

Stephanie Ward is a senior who has since reconciled her differences with the Numbers Lady.

The Birthday Ball: a dual point of view

Mike Cannon & Laura Hopper

Hers:

Regardless of whether you went or not, the B-Ball was on many people's minds last week. I heard the usual "Are you going?" "Did you get your gown yet?" "Where do you get tickets from anyway?" "Where are you going to eat?" and a personal favorite, "Who are you going with?"

Now I myself am a three time Birthday Ball veteran, so I remembered most of the usual hoopla: Gown, shoes, date, ticket etc. But I also learned some interesting new things.

Three out of six diners at the Old Wharf Inn prefer the filet mignon, and those same three out of six were disappointed by the size of the filet mignon. There was no consensus on the vegetable of choice.

Last year, when my beloved date and I turned into the parking lot of the Fin, Fur, and Feather Inn in Rock Hall, all I could say was, "Oh, honey, look at all those pickup trucks." This year, I did not wear my full length gown to dinner, and was happily able to avoid the potential tragedy of a stewed tomato on the skirt.

And there was the Ball itself. I must admit the cherry trees were very cute, standing there on the dance floor wearing white lights. But did anyone else notice that the silhouette of George's profile was wearing Abe's nose? Maybe next year they should change the name to the Washington/Lincoln Birthday Ball, or just the President's Day ball to economize on printing costs.

The band was in their element playing "In the Mood" and other Glenn Miller favorites. I must have been out of the room when they attempted CCR, but I've heard the stories. It was also rather disappointing that they quit at 1 AM, when I'm sure I could have danced for another two or three hours.

It seemed to be over so quickly. After weeks of preparation: fittings, shopping trips, an aqua aerobics class and eating sick tray after sick tray of lettuce and cucumber slices so I wouldn't feel or look like a cow in blue taffeta, everything ended so fast. One moment I was getting dressed for the ball, the next I was dancing to one of the last songs while my partner tried to hum it in my ear.

But I love the Birthday Ball, and I had a wonderful time. Can hardly wait until next year.

His

I tell ya. I'm a cherry tree fanatic. Especially when there's little white lights all over them. The shimmering brilliance made me harken back to many a concussion and the blissful glee taken in frolicking about the playground after slamming into a basketball pole during a layup. The rapturous daze of my spritely youth made the filet mignon/spud/gin and tonic mix loll ever so gently in its digestive egress. In other words, when tipsy and happy, the Birthday Ball can be downright bitchen'.

Did it live up to my expectations? Heck it even exceeded 'em. I figured I would get dressed up, have a good meal, dance for a while with my date and hobnob with the bigwigs. Libby didn't split her skirt but Doug did touch me on the shoulder in a passing greeting. I mingled like all get out—a new experience for me.

News from around the world: Vaclav Havel visits US

UNITED STATES:

The head of Toxicology for the Food and Drug Administration, Dr. Robert J. Scheuplein revealed to a panel of the American Association for the Advancement of Science that the greater risk of cancer in food comes from natural elements contained in the food than from pesticide contamination or from additives.

Speaking in New Orleans, Scheuplein stressed the need for consumers to be concerned about their whole diet. Scheuplein stated that 35% of all cancers are caused by or related to the diet.

Some naturally occurring carcinogens are aflatoxin, found in cereals, corn and nuts, and N-methyl-N-fromyl hydrazine found in mushrooms. Scheuplein said the overall risk of diet related cancer is 7-8%.

SOVIET UNION:

In Moscow, 2000 Russian nationalists staged a demonstration near the transmission tower for Soviet television. The group was protesting the growth of nationalism in the non-Russian republics, Gorbachev's political and economic reforms, and the warming of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States.

In the republic of Latvia, the legislature passed a resolution to work towards independence from the Soviet Union. The legislatures of Estonia and Lithuania have already passed similar resolutions.

There are rumors around Moscow that the Kremlin and the KGB both had prior knowledge of the anti-Armenian attacks in Baku, Azerbaijan and did little to prevent them. There is also circumstantial evidence that Communist Party officials encouraged the growth of nationalist movements such as the Popular Front, and sanctioned the creation of an Azerbaijani paramilitary group in an unsuccessful effort to discredit the Popular Front.

NICARAGUA:

With free presidential elections approaching, neither Daniel Ortega nor his opponent Violeta Chamorro has a clear lead. Economic problems in Nicaragua, largely caused by US sanctions against the country, and the overthrow of Communist governments in eastern Europe have put Ortega's political future in doubt.

Chamorro is the candidate of the National Opposition Union, a collection of anti-Sandinista groups. She has little political experience, but great public appeal. It was the assassination of Chamorro's husband, a newspaper editor, that touched off the 1978 revolution and the overthrow of the Somoza government.

The Bush administration is considering establishing diplomatic contact with the Sandinista regime should they win in a fair and free election.

JAPAN:

Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic party won a comfortable majority in Sunday's elections for the lower chamber of the Japanese parliament, the Diet. The Liberal Democratic victory follows two years of scandals and upheaval within the party.

The Japanese Socialist party won 24.35% of the vote, and will have 136 seats in the lower chamber. The Socialists, led by Tokako Doi, one of the few female politicians, tried to unite with three other small parties to defeat the LDP.

The LDP suffered a major defeat in July's elections for the upper chamber, after their Prime Minister Sousuke Uno was involved in a sex scandal. The July defeat was the first time the LDP had lost its majority in the upper chamber. However, since political power is centered in the lower house, the defeat has no real meaning.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA:

Czechoslovakian President Vaclav Havel is in Washington to meet with President Bush. Havel will also address a joint session of Congress. He is the first of eastern Europe's new leaders to do so.

Next week, Havel will travel to Moscow to meet with Gorbachev. He is expected to request the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Czechoslovakia.

ROMANIA:

Over the weekend in Bucharest, angry protesters took control of the headquarters of the provisional government. The protesters were demanding the removal of President Ion Iliescu. The crowd waved banners proclaiming the current government is no more than a holdover from the now discredited Communist regime. There were chants of starting another revolution.

The provisional government has been the target of an increasing number of protests. Last week a four day protest by army officers resulted in the dismissal of General Nicolae Militaru from his post of Defense Minister.

News from Annapolis: Abortion bills in committee

Steven Bruchey

Five more bills have been introduced on that wonderfully hot topic: abortion. They are: House Bill 1004- Interference with Access to or Egress from a Medical Facility- Maximum Fine; Senate Bill 834- Abortion for Birth Control or Sex Selection- Prohibition; Senate Bill 835- Abortion- Parental Consent; Senate Bill 836- Elective Termination of Pregnancy- Reporting; Senate Bill 837- Physicians- Performing Abortions- Guidelines. A special joint committee will deal with all of the abortion bills on the 28th of this month in the Joint Hearing Room of the Legislative References Building. Testimony will be strictly monitored and heavily regulated. Some of the rules pertaining to testimony will be that no electronic devices, visual aides or reading written testimony verbatim will be allowed. Testimony will be limited to 5 minutes per witness.

Another important issue facing the Maryland General Assembly is giving local governments more power in enforcing and regulating the clean-up and other activities concerning the Chesapeake Bay. There are four bills concerning the bay that will be brought up in front of the Joint Committee on the Chesapeake Bay-Critical Areas on Thursday, the 22nd at 1 PM.

There will also be a special hearing of the Baltimore County Delegation which could affect many Washington College students. The topic of the hearing will be a "piggy-back" tax in Baltimore County which will lower property taxes and raise income tax by the percent decrease in property taxes. This is being introduced and supported on behalf of Baltimore County Executive Dennis Rasmussen in an attempt keep taxes low while generating more revenues for the government. The hearings on this bill will also be held on Thursday.

Last week, Senior Citizens stormed Annapolis to meet with their respective legislators on the MOM bill, which stands for Medicare Overcharge Measures. What the seniors want is a Medicare system in which they can go to any doctor in the state and have to pay nothing over the Medicare settlement; currently they must pay the difference of the bill and the settlement. If this legislation passes, Medicare costs will rise all over the state.

A bill was stopped in committee in the Senate which would have made colleges "Drug-Free School Zones." This bill would have increased fines and penalties for any drug violations on and in the vicinity of college campuses. Other bills coming up concerning college students are: changing scholarships awarded by Senators and Delegates; funding for renovations to William Smith Hall; and applying unused political campaign money toward scholarships.

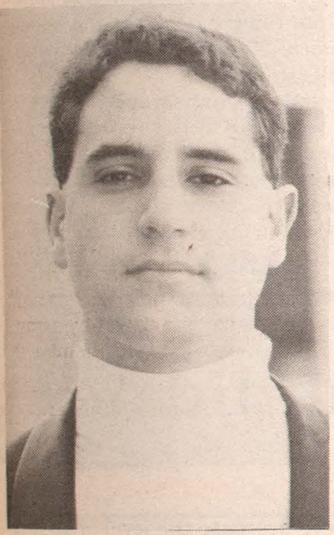
Student Government Association Election Supplement

Candidates for President of the SGA state their platforms



by Seth Engel
SGA Presidential Cadidate

I believe that the student population at Washington College, through the representative means of the SGA, must achieve greater independence from the Administration. It is time to go beyond the "rubber-stamping" of the current SGA; it is time to forge a new direction dictated by the demands and needs of the student body. We must have an open forum where dissatisfaction among students can be discussed and acted upon. We must form a body that is powerful enough to make our cries heard, and if need be, to make our presence felt.

A strong SGA should be able to fulfill both roles easily; the way to a strong SGA is to strengthen the bonds that hold us together as a community. These bonds include the desire to achieve the best possible education as well as the need for a comfortable, non-hostile environment in which to live. I believe that my platform contains programs that can help achieve these goals.

We must understand that a good education is more than a goal; it is a right. It is a right that most of us pay $14,500 for. Each student has the right to choose from a wide range of both classes and teachers, the diversity of which must be broad. Unfortunately, this is not possible at the present time. Our faculty contains hardly any diversity in terms of race, creed and color, and does not contain nearly enough variety in terms of viewpoint. We have only three Oriental professors and one part-time Black professor (who will be leaving after this semester). Yet his African Literature class is always among the first to closed out and overbooked. The desire for classes that reflect a minority viewpoint is high while the availability is low. I understand that segments of our population do not find the situation unreasonable, and some even like the idea of a faculty that has no minority members. However I believe that the majority of the student population are not brainless morons. I think that most people would agree with the student who said that "Homogeneity breeds Ignorance."

The issue of a diversified faculty (and consequently a wider variety of classes) is the most important educational challenge that faces WC today. A successful restructuring of the faculty will have many benefits, some immediate, and some more visible as time goes on. A more diverse faculty will help to attract a more diversified student body. Here again we are sadly suffering from homogeny.

Our student body is approximately 92% Caucasian, a situation that drastically reduces the opportunity for the "well-rounded" education that a liberal arts college is supposed to provide. A more diverse student body would provide this opportunity, offering a larger pool of opinions from which we draw our education.

I mentioned the need for a comfortable, non-hostile environment in which to live. The fact is that while the people of Chestertown tolerate college students, we are not a well-liked bunch. At the beginning of this year, the chief of police came right out and

"The Time to Listen, the Strength to Act." Above all else, this statement acts as my preeminent philosophy about politics here at Washington College. Above and beyond the political platforms, there must be an attitude and an understanding about how all levels of our community operate. The SGA presidency establishes the attitude on which the interrelations of students, faculty and administration will be based in the coming year. At no time in the last eight years has this factor been more keenly important. The coming of the new President, brings with it new challenges and responsibilities to the entire community. It is therefore essential that the person elected to the highest office a student can hold, be of a nature conducive to this understanding. Though considered a student leader, they must be ever mindful of the reality that they are nothing more than a representative of the student body and thus are responsible to the same.

My two terms as a class president have given me an opportunity to witness the function of this responsibility first hand. I have learned that while physical, observable accomplishments are good for ones political career, it is within the nature of the type of representation one gives to his class, that true success may be measured. As the parliamentarian of the SGA, I have seen and participated in the inner-workings of the system. Though a part of the current administration, I have been able to objectively view student government's strengths and weaknesses. We have made great strides over past administrations, yet there is still work to be done.

As WC's representative to the Maryland Higher Education Commission's Student advisory, I have seen how our community is viewed by other institutions and have participated in promoting us as being more than "the quaint school on the eastern shore." As the College's Student Ombudsman, I have tried to make sure that students are treated fairly by the student judiciary system when they transcend the limits of college rules and regulations. In all, I have tried to live up to high standards of representation regardless of who my audience has been. Whether it be the Student Conduct Counsel, the Presidents or deans office, fund raisers, IFC meetings or sessions of Student Government, I have represented the students of Washington College to the best of my ability.

I am now seeking out the Presidency of the Student Government Association. By now, if you've gotten this far, you are wondering where I stand on the issues. To this I reply; the issues are known to all of us. Whether we are discussing, minority student enrollment, the "master plan," mud, cable television, Hodson Hall or even the ever lovable alcohol policy, it should be clear to all that I will not make any promises in any of these areas. Why? Because no one person can do anything more than motivate change.

In short I make only two promises. Firstly, I will try my best to motivate all of us into organizing efforts aimed at correcting what we believe to be wrong with our

SGA Presidential Candidate

1990 is already here, and so are the new elections of the Student Government Association. As you may know I want to be your SGA president. This job entails massive responsibility which I will handle well if elected. You are not only electing a president, you are endorsing someone whose past experience will ensure successful years to come at Washington College. As a dorm senator for the 89-90 school year I worked with Steve Attias as a representative of West Hall. I was a representative to the facilities and on the honor code comitees. Working on the psychology newspaper has enabled me to get the hands-on experience and practical application to enhance my psychology major. I have a calling to be your president, and feel strongly about issues that I will change as president.

This school year the campus atmosphere has changed drastically, culminating in a mass exodus to off-campus housing, as well as inconvenience due to construction problems on campus. The spirit that has helped make Washington College the fine institution that it is must be

SGA Vice Presidential Candidates

Brooke Frank

In running for vice-president of the Student Government Association, my reasons fall into roughly two categories: continuing the success of the present administration, and implementing new programs.

First, I hope to carry on with the many policies that the SGA has implemented this year. I feel that programs like increased SGA activity utilizing the Coffee-House, the Miss Dee food coupons, and the recycling program have all contributed to create a more admired and influential association.

The Attias Administration has been the most prominent and resourceful government that I have witnessed in my two and a half years at Washington College, and I feel that carrying on the example that it has set is an objective in itself.

Second, I have my own personal goals that I would like to accomplish if elected. These include: getting the student body more input in WC's lone-range planning committee for construction (to get more parking, less mud, etc.), increasing SGA funding of student clubs (i.e.- Sailing, Writers' Union, Amnesty International), changing the trend of hiring numerous small bands to concentrating on more well known bands at SGA functions, providing a more accessible shuttle-bus service from local drinking establishments, utilizing the Waterfront Pavilion to a greater degree for social activities, making Washington's Birthday a holiday for this institution, have the SGA organize more benefits for needy people (such as the successful Tamara Alexander fund-raiser), promote activities that emphasize college unity, provide more opportunities to participate in cultural events, and creating an area that would remain open twenty-four hours a day for quiet study which would include computer facilities.

Frank hopes to maintain the example of the current SGA.

If elected I hope to work closely with the new president and his administration. Also, I will keep the student body opinion and interest foremost while I chair the Student Academic Board, and participate in the Senate and All-Campus Judiciary.

Kevin Kelly

In the fall of my freshman year I was elected to represent the students of Kent House in the SGA as a senator. I participated on the Social and Dining Hall Committees where I listened to and helped enact students' opinions and ideas. However the SGA I participated in my freshman year, while good, was filled with turmoil.

After I had been elected to the position of secretary on the SGA I found myself on an executive committee, headed by Steve Attias, that was solid, steady and worked hard to get things done. Miss Dee Dollars, recycling programs, open forums with administrators and better relations with the students and faculty have established that this year's SGA Executive Board and Senate are a success. I am very proud to a part of this SGA.

As a secretary I can tell you that I was not the best typist or note-taker in the world. However I worked to represent the student body in various ways. Back in November I accompanied President Steve Attias down to Florida for the National Leadership Conference where I learned of different ways in dealing with administration and faculty. This experienced will help me serve the student body better on the SAB, Academic Council and at faculty meetings as Vice-President. I am also a member of the Hodson Hall Planning Committee which is concerning itself with the renovations of Hodson Hall and the Planning of the new Student Center. I will continue to be on this committee and to represent students' ideas about the student center through the next year. I believe the new Student Activities Center will be important in bringing the student population back as as community.

As vice-president of the SGA I will have a large load of duties to perform. First I must chair the Senate in the event of the absence of the president. After having spent two years in the SGA, and one of those as an executive officer, I feel I will be able to rely on my experience to preside over these meetings fairly. My primary duty will be the Chairman of the Student Academic Board. As chairman I will act as a liaison between the student body, faculty and administration. I have well-established relationships with all three. I will be able to use these relationships to express and act on students' concerns about college policy. I will also make sure that all of Tracey Coleman's hard work on the new transcripts will be carried through. I believe that these transcripts are important because they represent the students' effort at Washington College.

As stated before I believe the new Student Activities Center will be instrumental in bringing the students back together. On a campus this small we cannot survive segregation of campus and off-campus groups. I hope that by working hard on the Hodson Hall Committee I will be able to institute plans to bring the campus back together again. As VP I hope to see this through.

I also want to start a program where the students can get together before the start of the spring semester and swap and sell books to each other. A Book Swap has been successful at many different schools. It will save students money and time from buying books at the bookstore. It will also promote campus unity.

With your help and your ideas I feel I can better represent the student body to the SGA, faculty and administration. So remember experience and representation during election time when you vote for Kevin "Sparky" Kelly.

William Hall

Hey there. My name is Will Hall and I want your vote and support for the office of SGA vice president. I feel that I can successfully execute the duties and responsibilities for the office of vice president. The only way I can do this is with your vote. Some background - right now I am the dorm senator of the Cecil House. This year I learned how this particular SGA is run and frankly I did not like what I saw.

It is no secret that student unity is at best pretty pathetic. There is a very screwed up alcohol policy and when it comes to dealing with the faculty for the most part we get ignored. And there is no excuse for the poor conditions on campus! Why in the hell do we pay 15,000+ to break our damn necks on the walkways? I feel that the main reason that there is poor student unity is the alcohol policy. It is a fact that college students are going to drink and the college should take full advantage of that situation rather than the Vern or Newts. A new policy would greatly improve campus life and cut down on DWI arrests for us. Hell it makes good sense!

And somebody please tell me why in the hell the SGA spent thousands of dollars on pissant bands that did not do a damn thing! As vice president I would like to see four big bands like New Potato Caboose play rather than a bunch of second hand bands play.

I strongly feel that the SGA should back the fraternities and sororities on campus, because the know how to throw a party! I think this would greatly add to student involvement on campus and improve the social scene on campus. And there is a rumor that the administration is considering a plan to force all freshman and sophomores to live on campus. Well as long as I am around here it will not happen without a hell of a good fight.

Friends, these are the problems that I see and want to correct. You need to vote for a vice president that will fight for you the students. The only way I can do this is with your vote and support. Vote for somebody that cares about the most important thing here - you the students.

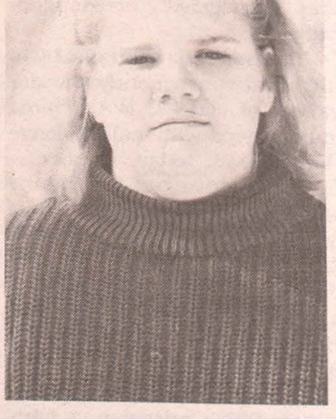
SGA Secretarial Candidate

Kyndra Ponder

I am perhaps an idealist when I look at government in any form - from student government at Washington College to our national government. I truly believe that those people whom we elect should represent our voices and should act in our best interest and not in the interest of their own personal gain. That is why I am running for the office of student government secretary.

During the time I have been at Washington College, I have been involved in many aspects of life here. My activities are as diverse as the student body, ranging from serving as a senator in this year's SGA to being involved in three Drama Department productions to writing for the ELM and the PEGASUS. Because of my involvements in different aspects of life here, I truly feel that I will be able to represent a wide range of student interests and concerns. I know that I will do my best to represent YOU - because YOU are who count!

Many students have expressed concern over an issue that has deeply troubled me since I have been here, and that is student unity and the apparent lack of concern for the general well-being of the school and the other students! I know that this year's SGA has worked very hard to sponsor fun events here for you this year, hoping that we could generate some student excitement. As you can probably tell, we didn't succeed. As high as the ambitions and goals were, without student help, its impossible to bring the students together!! If I am elected, I will do all that I can to work with the SGA to promote student unity and decrease the level of apathy among you, although nothing that I do or that the other SGA Officers do will work without your help and support!!!



Ponder pledges to work for the students' interests.

Some of the other issues that many of you seem to want addressed are the lack of parking/abundance and the issue of parking tickets, the presence of cable TV on campus, less hassle with private phones/phone jacks in rooms and, last but not least, the alcohol policy. If I am elected SGA secretary, I will do all that I can personally and I will work closely with the other SGA officers to see that your concerns are addressed by the administration. I can't promise that we will get results all the time, let's face it, the odds are not always in our favor, but I know for my part, I'll either get results for you, or I'll die (or come moderately close to death) trying!!!!

If you want to see the student body stronger and united during the next school year, and if you want to chip away at the general notion of student apathy at WC, begin by voting Monday. Like I said, YOU have to help if you want to make WC better! When you vote, please remember, I will do my very best to work for the students of Washington College - TAKE NOTE! VOTE FOR KYNDRA PONDER SGA SECRETARY!!!!

Your Candidates for the office of Treasurer

Brian Gimelson

Hello Everyone!!! For those of you who know me, greetings. Anyone else, please get in touch with me somehow, so I can find out where you have been hiding. I am currently running for treasurer of the SGA, and I would like to take this opportunity to explain my qualifications for the job.

I am double-majoring in Business and Art History, and I am currently a senator on the SGA. I am the newly elected vice-president of the Herman Crown Investment Club, and I work in the Audio-Visual booth, as a tour guide in Admissions, and as a Computer Lab assistant in the Library. The business aspect of my majors explains my interest in the monetary part of the job of treasurer, but my role in many of the activities which take place on campus has shown shown me a real need for many organizations to receive funding, much like starving artists. Having served on the SGA for two semesters now, it is quite obvious to me and many of my fellow senators, that the SGA is, for the most part, similar in operation to a very basic business. We meet on a regular basis in order to achieve our goals and come to decisions based upon what we think would be best for the corporation as a whole. In this case, the corporation we are talking about is the student body of Washington College.

The beauty of the Student Government is that we are in business for the college community as a whole, not just ourselves. WE ARE NOT HERE TO MAKE A PROFIT! Quite contrary to it; one of the main functions of the SGA is to allocate funds to needy organizations or causes which strongly affect the student body. If elected, I WILL MAKE EVERY OPPORTUNITY TO SEE THAT FUNDING IS AWARDED TO ANY CAUSE IN WHICH THERE IS DEMAND ON CAMPUS BY THE STUDENT BODY.

This campus has some very socially active people. There are as well a lot of people who have been inhibited or intimidated by some aspects of the social life on this campus. Next semester will see quite a bit of change in this administration. We will have a new president of the college, a new SGA executive committee, as well as a completely revamped campus. IT WOULD BE MY GOAL AS TREASURER OF THE SGA TO SEE TO IT, THAT EVERY MEMBER OF THE WASHINGTON COLLEGE COMMUNITY HAS ACCESS TO WHATEVER FUNDING THEY MAY NEED FOR ANY EVENTS OR ACTIVITIES, WHICH ARE DESIGNED TO BENEFIT THE COMMUNITY, AND IN THE PROCESS MAKE THEIR STAY AT WASHINGTON COLLEGE THE BEST IT CAN POSSIBLY BE!

Vote for me, and you'll see it happen... Thanks, Brian.

Suzanne Hewes

The time for a change in command has approached and it is time for you, the student body, to make a choice of who you want to represent you in the SGA Executive Committee. My name is Suzanne Hewes and I am running for the office of treasurer. I am a junior biology major enrolled in the premedical program here at Washington College. Some of you might think that since I am a science major that I wouldn't have an adequate amount of time to devote to the SGA. You are mistaken. I MAKE time. My duty is to work for you, not for myself, but for you, the students; and that is what I intend to do. My prior involvements with the student government include serving as a juror on the Student Conduct Council and as an SGA representative. Currently, I am the Junior Class President, an SGA senator, a member of the Funding Committee for the SGA, a member of the Subcommittee for the Renovation of Hodson Hall, and a member of the recycling committee. Outside of the Student Government Association, I hold the positions of tour guide for the Admissions Office and Campus Liaison for the Dutch Dumschott Society. In addition to the many campus positions I hold, I have also had the experience of being treasurer. I was the treasurer for my senior class in high school. But now I want to give something to the college and it's students by making sure their voices are heard in the SGA.

In the upcoming year, I would like to see to the continuation of fair distribution of funds among the clubs and student organizations. I agree with the Editor-in-chief that "... the Club Funding Committee [should] take its responsibilities more seriously. ..." I cannot comment on the conduct of the last meeting of the Funding Committee when the Editor-in chief attended, but her points are very well taken and the screening for funds should be better defined. "... Bands and beer [should not be] more important than human rights issues." However, I am not saying that those organizations who request aid for receptions, such as language clubs, or the parties that the SGA sponsors with large bands and the serving of alcohol, will not be banned from funds.

I am here to work for you. Not many people take advantage of talking to their SGA representatives and letting them know what needs to be done. But, I want you to know that my door is always open to all of you. You have that right!

Beth Ann Shepherd

One of the questions most often asked at Senate meetings when an event is proposed is "Do we have enough money?" The person who answers this question needs to be confident in her answer and have previously comprised a semester budget to insure the presence of the needed money. I believe that I would be the most competent and confident person for the position of treasurer of the Student Government.

My qualifications show me to be a sound candidate for this position. I have served on the Senate funding committee under the present treasurer. This has given me first-hand experience of the process that clubs undertake in receiving SGA funding. I have also applied, myself, as a club representative so I can fully understand the other side of the issue.

Recently the funding provided by the SGA has been under attack. Criticisms have been made regarding the funding process, i.e., interviews, standards for providing funds and the amounts being awarded. Through my past experience I can understand and sympathize with student's concerns and will be able to formulate a stricter and more formal type of interview with these standards being applied to every case coming before us. After all, the money the SGA has is provided by the students and is there for us, the students, to use. There must be guidelines on how this money is spent though because it must be used in a way to benefit the whole school and not just select groups. The support of bands in the Coffee House also came under attack because of lack of attendance and the choice of entertainment. Entertainment is very important at school of this size with few alternatives and improvement rests on two factors: funding and student input. As treasurer I will review the current SGA budget and the allocation of funds in each area. After that I will take the criticisms that have already been voiced along with other student input that I hope will come to me and revise the budget to fit student needs.

I have a lot of pride in Washington College and would like to see more students staying here on the weekends and making use of the facilities we have. This year's SGA has done more than any in previous years with the implementation of new programs such as the Dee Dollars and more communication and success with the administration. Next year the Coffee House and Miss Dee's will be renovated to allow for larger bands and more entertainment. To parallel this the SGA must also "renovate" itself to keep in step with the growth of the school and student needs. Your input is very important for the success of the Student Government and I urge everyone to put any criticisms or suggestions in the SGA mailbox in Central Services. Through this input I will be able to see how you want funds distributed and by working with the new executives bring life back to campus!

Joint Candidates for Social Chair

Steve Huettner and Katherine Simms

We are joint candidates for the position of social chairpersons of the Student Government Association. We feel that we are both qualified for this position. Steve served on the Theta Chi Social Committee and Katie served as a dorm senator of the SGA. We also have the support of Chris Warren who currently holds the position of social chairperson.

If elected our main objective is to increase student unity through campus social events. We plan to accomplish this by working in conjunction with the Greek organizations. We want to bring back student interest in SGA social functions. We will attempt to hire more well-known bands and stage bigger events upon the completion of the Student Activity Center.

One concern of the SGA is the increase of students moving off campus. It will be main priority of the social chair to reestablish relations with these students. To accomplish this we will seek input from this group to find out how to gain their support and participation. We want SGA social events to appeal to all students of Washington College.

With the support of students we can recreate student unity. We look forward to the challenge of attaining these goals towards a better social year at Washington College. We hope you will support our efforts with your enthusiasm and participation in all of our events on campus.

said that the Chestertown police would keep an especially close watch on W.C. students. This negative attitude does not foster a productive environment, either for the student or for the Chestertown resident. I feel that improved community relations should be one of the main focal points of the SGA. The first step towards better relations is to recognize and help the community members who work at the College.

We employ a sizable number of local high school students, as well as a number of adult residents. Why can't we offer educational help as well as monetary gain? I believe that the college should offer basic educational classes to our employees. These could include literacy classes as well as basic math comprehension. How about a student tutor pool? This would offer new educational opportunities to these people, and would do wonders for our image, showing that we, as responsible members of this community, care about our neighbors. This is just one of my ideas for community outreach programs to help improve our standing in Chestertown.

At this point I would like to say that the current SGA is very good at what it does. Unfortunately it doesn't do nearly enough. While the honor code and the changes in the transcript for the senior obligation are important, matters such as these should not be the main focus of the SGA. I think that it is important to reiterate the idea that the student population has certain rights and expectations. We must begin to recognize these rights and demand the best education possible from Washington College. This should be the primary goal of the SGA, and if elected president, I intend to make it the number one priority.

recaptured. As your president I will strive to achieve unity among students. For such a small college, there are a surprising number of diverse groups which would learn from each other through better communication. We have many fraternities and sororities, and we are awaiting the arrival of yet another fraternity. The numbers of people moving off campus clearly reflects that people are turning elsewhere for what they should be reaping from the on campus residential experience. There is something wrong when there are 12 people at the Coffee House on a Friday or Saturday night. Where are all of the students? Many may travel elsewhere for entertainment. Larger bands, and more of a relaxed alchohol policy may entice more students to attend on campus social activities. An example of this was the successful New Potato Caboose concert last semester.

To improve unity we can start with the incoming Freshman class. I propose that the entire class take a trip to the Echo Hill Outdoor School before classes begin. Here students learn to work together on mentally and physically challenging obstacles. This will teach the incoming class unity, leadership, team-building, and responsibility.

Although concentration will be on getting more students on campus, the needs of off campus students will not be overlooked. An improved parking situation is of utmost importance. Instead of restricted parking zones, and late night and early morning ticketing, a change in security policy would bring about the neccessary changes that would facilitate parking. Perhaps the folks over there can buy another answering machine with all of the money raised by the tickets. Another thing which would be nice is the addition of an off campus telephone directory that could be printed up for all of the students.

The meal plan of Washington College needs more flexibility. Students should be on a credit system, and then credit not used in the dining hall can be used in Miss Dee's or the Coffee House.

When elected president I will make every effort to listen to the student concerns, and act on these in an affirmative and efficient manner. I believe what I have proposed will be beneficial to the entire Washington College community.

Thank You

Sneezing, coughing, and sniffling at college

Some students comment on the differences of being sick at school and being sick at home

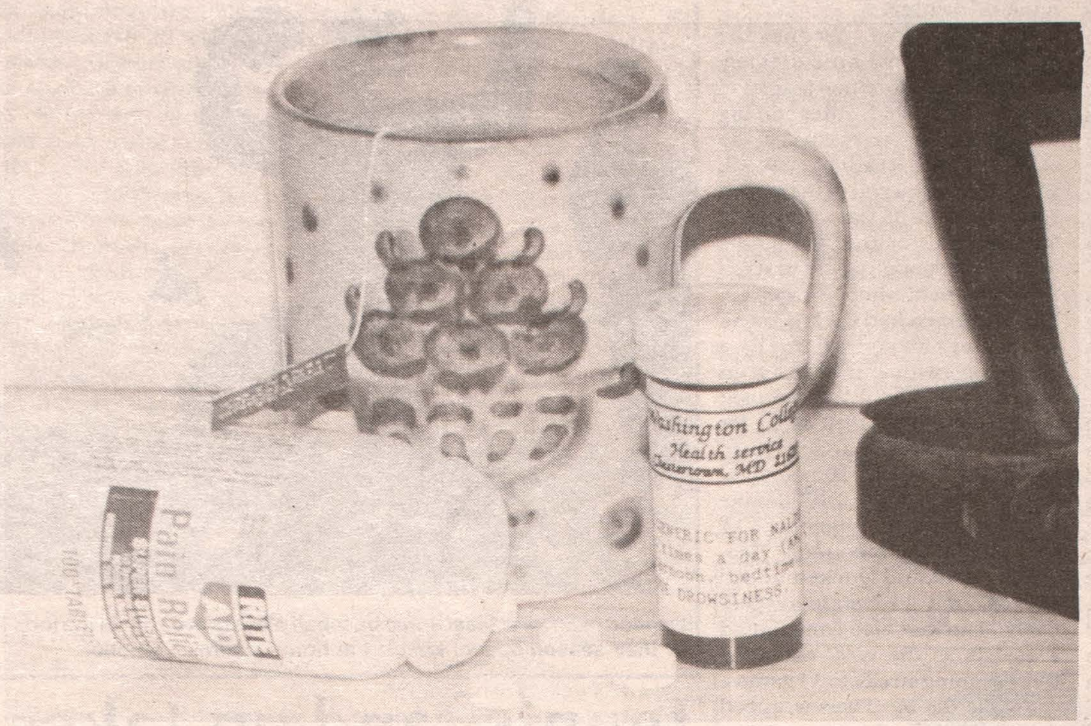
by Katherine Absher
Staff writer

Days of Our Lives, Puff tissues, chicken noodle soup, tea and honey, and mom catering to all your comforts were all the benefits of being sick at home. Here at college, your television only picks up the religious channel, you cannot afford Puffs—opting for the less expensive brand of Acme sand paper, and your roommate brings you sick trays full of greasy french fries and meat loaf from the dinning hall.

Cheering you up, of course, is the newly remodeled Health Services in place of your friendly family doctor. Sophomore Andrew Bohutinsky agrees, "It's a much better experience than at home because the nurses are so caring and understanding toward my plight."

Sophomore Rachel Rice further comments, "There's no compassion here. I know they [Health Services] can't play Mom. But is it not scary that, he [the doctor] asks you to diagnose yourself? The scariest thing is going to Kent and Queen Anne's Hospital. It is like a time warp; you're transported back to the 1950s."

Unlike Rice, Senior Pam Flemke has had only good experiences with Health Services, especially when she was suffering from back problems last semester: "They were very helpful and attentive." But does Mom's tender love and care compare to Health Services? Freshman Peter Jons answers, "Mom doesn't provide forms of contraception in the home and encourage its use like the Health Services do."



Around this time of year, students are plagued with colds and flus, and unlike home, they must resort to playing doctor themselves with hot tea, aspirin, and medicine from Health Services.

Having a cold or the flu at school is a rather nasty experience, but it is something most students have to endure at least once a semester. Unless you are someone like senior Tim Hormes who has "never been sick enough here to be couped up." Hormes probably has a natural resistance to colds because he emphasizes plenty of sleep, exercise, and a balanced diet of protein, vegetables, fruit, and whole grains. These are all necessary factors in preventing colds.

Also, according to the pamphlet The Common Cold and You, "too dry air indoors during winter keeps your nose from fighting colds effectively. Use humidifiers to help keep a relative humidity of 20 to 45 percent. Keep thermostat down. Overheating dries out the air."

Another hint in preventing colds is to not smoke. Smoking aggravates mucous membranes and destroys cilia in the nose and throat, leaving the smoker vulnerable to infection.

Senior Paige Osworth who is presently suffering from a sore throat, runny nose, and tired muscles advises, "Don't buy cool mint chlorasceptic. It made me nauseous, and it wasn't very effective."

Junior Scott Reid recommends Miss Dee's chicken soup, "Coming from a broken home, where I never had the presence of a motherly figure, Miss Dee with chicken soup and all epitomizes all the characteristics a mother should have." When Reid has a cold, he never misses home, thanks to Miss Dee's presence on this campus.

As well as chicken soup, try drinking large amounts of water and fruit juices, and if you're suffering from a sore throat, gargle with warm salt water.

Whatever the ailment and whatever the cure, preventing the illness is best. Making the body more susceptible to colds, college students tend to sleep five or six hours a night instead of the recommended eight. These late hours are usually accompanied with late night drinking; alcohol has recently been shown to lower the effectiveness of the immune system. Furthermore, most students cannot take the time out to rest when they do come down with something. Freshmen Amy Klamber elaborates, "At home you're more tempted to stay at home and be pampered. Here you don't let it stop you as much. When you stop and sit down, it makes you feel worse..you're all alone."

Colds can lead to serious complications, such as sinusitus, ear infection, bronchitis, and pneumonia. All these secondary infections must be treated by a physcian, who will usually prescribe antibiotics. Antibiotics, however,are for bacterial infections only; they should not be given for viral infections.

Although the halls are noisy, try to get some sleep, and if it helps, pretend that your mom is looking down upon you with an angelic smile and a plate of cinnamon toast in her hands.

Helpful Hints

NASAL CONGESTION

- Try steam or hot drinks to help drainage.
- Don't use decongestants for more than 3 days without a physician's approval.
- Clear nostrils gently. Blowing hard through one nostril may cause mucus to infect ears and sinuses.

Cold Facts

SYMPTOMS develop 1 to 3 days after the virus enters the body. And you can pass a cold two days before you know you have it.

COLDS ARE SPREAD by close contact—such as sneezing, coughing, kissing, or touching the same loaf of bread in the dinning hall.

WATCH FOR COMPLICATIONS: a cold's infection can spread to ears and sinuses and can lead to other diseases.

COLDS ARE NOT AS CONTAGIOUS as people used to think they were. A healthy person only catches cold after prolonged contact.

YOU ARE IMMUNE to the virus that caused your cold for three to four months. But you can still catch cold from other viruses.

Shoremen advance to MAC playoffs

by Matt Giller

If I were to make a comparison between the Shoremen's regular season and football, it would look something like this. The team starts off their final drive of the game on the one yard line. Each first down is a struggle - twice they go for it on fourth down and both times they successfully dive for the first down marker. Poised veterans confuse their opponents with precision passes and a steady running game. With time running out on fourth and goal on the ten they opt to pass, but a rushed quarterback throws aimlessly into the endzone. The ball is tipped off an opponent's unsuspecting head and into the arms of the Shoremen's tight end, but before he can regain his balance, he runs into the goal post. In the locker room, he clears his head, looks up into the camera and asks "Duh, what hit me?" The reporter replies "Who cares, you won", then asks the bewildered tight end "Do you think you sustained enough damage from that hit to take you out of the next game?" To be continued.

The Shoremen's season will also be continued this Thursday against Moravian in the first round of the MAC playoffs. They received the chance to host Moravian partially as a result of Tim Liddy's buzzer-beater at Widener, but the Shoremen received a big jolt when Johns Hopkins (the immovable goal post) beat the WAC 95-80 at the Blue Jays' home court last Saturday night.

Many fans have been calling this year's team one of destiny as a result of their last minute style of snatching victories from the jaws of defeat. So what better way to clinch a first-place title than a last-second shot. By the way, wouldn't this make a great movie? A small school, sitting modestly in God's country, beating bigger schools that in the beginning wouldn't have given these small town Jethros a shot. And then if destiny were to have its way we would be watching our simple all-American boys playing for all the small schools that never got that chance. They would get this chance in, maybe, the Hoosier Dome - I'm sorry, I must be drifting.

Anyway, last Wednesday night's game saw an extremely hot shooting Shoremen team nail 64% from the field. After coming out of the locker room for the second half trailing 38-29, Widener made a run of their own. From then on it was a game of streaks, with neither team able to pull far enough away to dash their opponent's hope for victory. The Shoremen had the ball out of bounds at half court down by a single digit with four ticks left on the clock. With all the key men covered, Liddy was left alone for a testy ten footer that he buried. Liddy finished with 10 points on 4-4 shooting, while Bull Jamke led the team with 21 points (9-11 shooting) and 8 rebounds. Keehan, Brandt and Duckett added 16, 14, and 11 points respectively. Duckett also contributed 7 assists as the WAC extended their winning streak to 11 games.

While the MAC was wrapped up and the final game against Hopkins was academic, momentum was in favor of the Shoremen. Furthermore, a win at Hopkins would only put more air in their tires. Instead, the Blue Jays were able to poke a small home in the tire by defeating the WAC 95-80. A fired up Hopkins crowd ignited their team out to a 49-35 halftime lead and they never looked back. Blue Jay forward Gangemi canned an amazing eight 3-pointers and scored 32 points to lead the Jays over the Shoremen. The Bull led WAC scorers with 21 points and 12 rebounds, and Keehan had 14 points and 4 assists. Tank showed muscle on the boards, ripping down eight bounds to go along with his 10 points. Brandt added 17 points for a Shoremen team that saw their hopes for an undefeated MAC season dashed.

The Widener victory and the Hopkins loss allowed the Shoremen to close their season with a record of 20-4, 9-1 in the conference. The WAC have almost certainly clinched a berth in the NCAA tournament, and they are attempting to capture the MAC championship this weekend.

Tennis tandem takes tourney

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Washington College tennis players Scott Read and Scott Shepherd grabbed the lion's share of the awards last weekend at Trenton State's annual Lion's Winter Invitational Tennis Tournament. Read captured the tournament singles championship, then teamed with Shepherd to win the doubles title.

Read was the top seed in the tournament, and his victory in the singles championship enabled him to maintain his ranking as the #3 Division III player in the country. He coasted through the early rounds of the 32 round draw, losing only eight games in his first three matches.

His first challenge came in his semifinal match against Andy Dailey of Swarthmore. Dailey, ranked third in the tournament, shot out to a 5-2 lead over the WC netter in the first set. Read managed to even the set at 6-6, then captured the tiebraker 7-2. He then won the second set 6-3 and moved on to the finals.

Read's opponent in the finals was TSU's own Mike Cremeans, and Read again had difficulties in the first set. He dropped the first set to Cremeans by a score of 3-6, but he quickly resurrected himself in the second set. Read took a 4-1 lead in the set, then captured the set and the singles championship by winning eight of the next ten games. Read's 3-6, 6-3, 6-0 win brought his record this year to 15-3 and his career record to 92-17.

Scott Shepherd also played very well in the singles draw, winning his first two matches in impressive fashion. He took his first two matches in straight sets before losing to TSU's Clemeans in three sets in a quarterfinal match. Shepherd still played great tennis in the 6-3, 3-6, 6-2 loss.

Despite the solid performances in the singles competition, coach Fred Wyman still contends that he was most satisfied with WC's performance in the doubles tournament. "I was really happy with our showing in doubles," Wyman said. "Scott and Scott don't play together often, but they are 4-1 in doubles. Scott Shepherd gained a lot of respect and confidence in the tournament."

Read and Shepherd were overpowering in their matches, and the duo did not drop a single set on their way to the championship. After receiving a first-round bye as the top seed in the tournament, Read and Shepherd won their quarterfinal and semifinal matches in easy fashion. The WC tandem then met the duo from Swarthmore, seeded second in the tournament. Read and Shepherd played excellent tennis in the final and took the title with little difficulty. The 6-4, 6-3 victory ensured Washington College and Scott Read a sweep of the men's titles in the Trenton State Tournament.

The men's tennis team will take a week off from tournament play and spend the next few days practicing and scrimmaging in preparation for the Navy Tournament on March 3. Wyman and his players will then begin their spring season on March 10 in an away match against The Citadel. Both the men's and women's tennis teams will have high expectations this spring, and both programs can expect to have other teams shooting at their spot atop the Middle Atlantic Conference.

Finnegan wins 250th

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Coach Tom Finnegan reached a personal milestone recently, capturing his 250th career victory as coach of the Shoremen basketball program. Finnegan has coached this year's team to an impressive 20-4 record and the MAC championship. He also led last year's squad to the 20 win plateau, and his teams dominated the MAC in the 1980s. Including the 1989-1990 regular season, the WC basketball team has recorded an astounding 147-56 record over the past eight years. Finnegan has been an important part of the Washington College athletic program for many years, both as player and coach of the basketball team. Finnegan has added stability to the college's basketball program and is one of the most successful coaches in the history of Washington College basketball. His 250th career victory is just one more honor for coach Finnegan in his prestigious career at Washington College.

Kesey returns to spotlight at U of MD

by Bruce Hamilton

Did that guy say Kesey? Ken Kesey? At the University of Maryland? When? Sure..I'll go— (It's probably an economics professor with the same name), and I remember my mother telling me I couldn't watch One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest on TV.

It took some doing, but on Monday night 15 students from Washington College attended a lecture at the University of Maryland. No one I talked to seemed to know what it was supposed to be about, but the name was self-promoting.

In a WC culture van and Joe Boone's car we arrived around 7 PM. The speech was to begin about 8 in the Grand Ballroom or something. We waited by a door with a sign that said "guest list," where they accepted people with reserved tickets. Apparently the trip was sponsored by the Writer's Union, and not only were we let in early with front-row seats, but we were given invitations to the reception after the speech. About five students in our group belong to the Writer's Union.

No one seems to know this man's face. It has been a while since the controversial novel was first published. On the stage is a red football—rather large and fluffy like a carnival prize. Apparently, it has a microphone. Everybody in the audience seems to have questions ready to ask Kesey. I can't think of anything—I try to remember what I can of Acid Test because it is more of a biographical novel about Kesey than anything. The lights dim twice.

Kesey is introduced. He comes on stage and immediately his presence is established. He is wearing a blue sweater and a hat, like a captain at the helm. He is balding with white sideburns and a serious disposition. He looks like a college professor. He says his Kentucky writer friends coaxed him south and he is doing a tour. He does this every ten years. He did Virginia last night. He does Notre-Dame Wednesday.

He then answers questions with the "Bear Bryant memorial question/answer toss around the room football," the fuzzy thing with the microphone.

Caverns is Kesey's latest work, the result of a class he conducted in conjunction with the University of Oregon writing program. He and 12 second year graduate students met at his home twice a week. Their object was to conceive, plan and write a novel. The final product is Caverns, a story about various pilgrims and carnival people who make an archaeological discovery.

The first class meeting was a disaster. Kesey arrived late and nervous, and his wife had the keys to the house. He couldn't get in and attempted various windows, eventually knocking himself out. As he came to, he heard one of the students say, "Well, Curly is here. I wonder when Moe and Larry get here."

After character sketches and efforts to map the plot, it became clear that all the writing would have to be done together. The writers were becoming too personal and the pieces couldn't be sewn together. When they eventually held a reading, People and Rolling Stone arrived to hear it. The students began to realize that this was serious.

Then Kesey tells a story. He tells about getting placed in a fiction class in high school. He liked fiction, especially Ray Bradbury. The teacher tells him to read a Hemingway story, Soldiers Home. The teacher asked him what the story was about. He had no idea—the guy sits and eats breakfast with his mother. "No! his teacher said, there is so much more meaning in this story than that! He pointed to a sentence where Kesey was reading: Krebs looks down on his plate at the fat hardening on his bacon. "Can't you see the meaning in that?" his teacher asked. Kesey did.

Kesey was asked how true-to-life he thought Acid Test was. "I know a lot about drugs," he says. He was still in high school training for the Olympics. He was a wrestler. He says he hadn't even had whiskey before.

"You want to know who turned me on, man?" he asks. "The United States Government!" He participated in early drug testing where he took LSD-6, LSD-25 and many others. Some good, some bad, he remembers. Allen Ginsberg once told him that this testing was CIA funded. Kesey said he thought Ginsberg was paranoid. Sure enough, Ginsberg produced documents proving the CIA was funding many government tests. This wasn't to find a drug to make you feel good; this was to find a drug to drive you crazy.

"We were like astronauts," Kesey says, "They told us, 'We want you to go up there! We want you to see what's up there!' And we said OK!" There was a window through which Kesey says he could see the psychiatric ward. During the testing he looked out and watched the patients. He began to realize, he says, that "these people knew something." Hence Cuckoo's Nest.

He talks about the US: "People in America today don't know they've had an orgasm unless they read about it in Rolling Stone."

Kesey cites Beckett, Faulkner and Hemingway as influences. He says he likes Burroughs and Tom Robbins. He says the best musical incantation that you can use is "bullshit."

He can't understand when Reagan was saying there wasn't that many homeless why someone didn't just yell, "BULLSHIT!"

He says he is not to be mistaken for an anti-intellectual, because in reality, he is a near-illiterate.

He mentions Shakespeare. He goes into a long exposition about the task of today's writer. God will appear to you on the street one day, he says, and you will know it's God. He will beckon you and tell you about the glories of heaven. The job of today's writer is to say: FUCK YOU, GOD!

Kesey finally reads his childrens story, soon to be released by the Viking Press. He tells it as his Grandmother Smith told him almost 50 years ago—with all the vehemence and descriptive gestures of the storyteller.

I had a great time, and everyone I talked to did as well. As they say of circus fires, it was intense.

semester.

In addition, Brown was given five hours of commmunity service for the charge of disturbance, and ten hours of community service for the charge of vandalism.

Ferris was given twenty hours of community service– ten for the charge of disturbance and ten for the charge of vandalism. She has also agreed to pay Sadtler the estimated $900 that it will cost to repair her car.

In the evening's third and final case, Doug Sarno, Jason Scarborough and David Slomkowski were charged with "Disturbance, Vandalism and Endangering the well-being of a member of the Washington College community" in relation to a January 27 incident in which the Cecil dorm lounge was vandalized.

The three were held responsible for the "Disturbance" charge because of "rowdy behavior" and were each assigned to perform two hours of community service.

All students who have cases appearing before the SCC have the right to appeal any decision that the council makes. At press time, only Brown planned to appeal the decision.

Chief Stetson resigns

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Chestertown Police Chief Mauritz Stetson resigned last week, leaving the local force without a temporary chief. A search committee for a new head of police has been appointed with Sergeant William Bright of the Maryland State Police as chairman, according to the Kent County News.

Stetson often addressed Washington College students on issues ranging from crosswalk safety to drug arrests, always stressing the relationship between students and townspeople.

He once stated, "Some students think that Washington College is a country unto itself, exempt from other laws, but it's not. It is part of the State of Maryland and we expect people to obey Maryland's laws. I also want to emphasize that the students are citizens of Chestertown, with all of those rights and privileges, but with those rights and privileges they have to take responsibility."

Stetson resigned in part due to "deep philosophical differences" of opinion between himself and Mayor Horsey, according to his resignation letter.

Horsey denied that conflicts existed while citing Stetson's six years of service.

Birthday Ball

The first Birthday Ball I went to was a lot less enjoyable, due in part to the inane band that found it necessary to play "Your Love is Lifting Me Higher" on the one occasion that I wasn't sitting morosely at a table lamenting my outrageous expenditure. This Ball was a lot better due in part to the appropriateness of the band, making the outrageous expenditure considerably more bearable. Perhaps I have internalized the notion of poverty by this time, realizing that with the benefits of my liberal arts education it is likely to be my destiny or doom. Fun and poverty are not mutualy exclusive, as I once attested to in both deed and thought.

Additionally, on this occassion I was bereft of the cumberbund-slippage paranoia that plagued my earlier foray into the big leagues and was better able to concentrate on the jovial matters at hand. Yes. Rather. Jocularity being my forte, I thrived on't.

Mom's Cookie Jar

It is documented that the average American adult gains 1 pound per year. That does not sound like much until you figure that it adds up to a 30 pound gain by age 55. There are exciting and enjoyable approaches in order to maintain the weight gain. Just think activity. If you engage in some kind of activity you burn up calories faster than if you are inactive. Climb stairs instead of using the elevator. Eat lightly in the evening when you are least likely to be active, or take a stroll after dinner. A 30 minute walk of about a mile each day will use up 75 to 120 calories. That s enough to prevent that yearly weight gain.

I hope that everyone will have a great week. Take care.

Neiman begins his reign as SGA president '90-'91

by Tracey Connell and Jennifer Gilday

New Student Government Association President Stuart Neiman has already begun working on some of the initial duties of his position.

Among his first obligations is choosing the chairperson the of the Student Conduct Council (SCC), the SGA parliamentarian, and the SGA faculty advisor. Neiman reported that he had asked student Vicky Vahos to chair the SCC, and he had not yet received an answer. Three unnamed professors are being considered for the position of faculty advisor.

Neiman stated that choosing the appointees is primarily his job, though he does consult with the SGA executive committee.

He also outlined what he called his "philosophy" as it applies to one of those choices.

"Steve brought a serious tone back to student government. He brought the SGA respect. Now I want to bring to it a certain amount of power. The power of student government as a whole. In selecting a faculty advisor, we need someone who is not only recognized as a leader among the faculty, but who also has time to dedicate to the student body."

He stressed that this "power" is derived entirely from proper representation of the views of the students.

Among the other projects which Neiman intends to handle this year as he takes over the office of president is a "proper schedule of public opinion polls." By the end of the semester he hopes to have at least two polls completed.

Also, there are some long term enterprises of this past year's SGA, which Neiman and his new administration will deal with, such as the honor code revisions, and in the Student Academic Board (SAB) the addition of thesis information to transcripts.

Student apathy is another major issue which is of primary importance to Neiman. According to the president, the solution to apathy is usually event oriented "but there are so many special interest groups on campus it's hard to come up with the event that everyone is going to find acceptable."

He added that if students don't want to get involved in things,

Second Hodson Renovation Open Forum meeting held

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Eight students attended the most recent Hodson Hall Renovation Open Meeting which was held last Tuesday, February 27 at 7 PM in Hynson Lounge.

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, began by reviewing schematic plans along with a few minor changes generated from and since the last open meeting. He stressed the need for some kind of a Student Union combining the services of the current Miss Dee's Snack Bar and Coffee House, but, he stated "what students clearly want is a similar area though it ought to be different from the upstairs [dining service]."

He seemed to be addressing concerns raised at the last meeting that because this snack bar would involve a merging of the Miss Dee operation and dining services, "we will have a two story dining hall," as stated by student Matt Weir.

One change in the plans involved the removal of some tables and chairs in the pictured snack bar area. According to Baer the Fire Marshall required they be removed due to the fact they would present a hazard in the event of a fire.

As the meeting progressed one new issues emerged, which was raised by new SGA President Stuart Neiman.

Neiman was concerned about the disturbance that the approximate ten month construction would cause to students who expect the facilities to at least be operative.

"There are some areas which are more important to have operational than others. Students will be forgiving the bookstore not being completed and with the Coffee House they are expecting a change, but as far as the snack bar is concerned students will be more worried with having a functional snack bar area than they will with anything else."

Baer answered by stating that those facilities will be operational throughout the year, but the Coffee House would be closed at some points.

Said Baer, "You would have the new lounge and the gym during certain occasions" to hold events that would normally be held in the Coffee House.

He added that the construction should be completed on time, by September 1991. "The Science Building was completed on schedule as well as the Creative Arts Center, which had a ten month schedule also. So far the only project off schedule is the college lane." Therefore inconvenience might be tempered with expectation at the new expanded and streamlined facilities.

Other suggestions made were that the snack bar have the resource of a debit system, where students could establish an account and buy items from that, and that the arcade be equipped with new college owned pool tables. Said one student, "let us

Director of Physical Plant position filled

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, and Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, announced this week that the position of Director of Physical Plant has been filled. Reid Raudenbush, a manager assigned from the Marriot Corporation, will succeed Bill Coleman, who retired in December.

When Coleman retired from the position of Supervisor of Buildings and Grounds, a search committee was established to find his replacement. Members of the committee were: Clint Baer, Kevin Coveney, Vice President for Admissions and Enrollment Management, Chris Havermeyer, Gene Hessey (Chairperson), Michael Malone, Associate Professor Department of Economics, and Maureen McIntire, Dean of Student Affairs.

Over the past few months, they conducted a national search interviewing individuals and entertaining proposals from two contract services, Marriot and Service Master. Both services had conducted audits of the campus.

According to Baer, "After a review we identified Marriot."

Both Hessey and Baer stressed that "in every way the position functions the same." Raudenbush will have to fit in the administrative structure of the College, serve on committees, and direct staff and employees in the Maintenance area.

Marriot employees also bring with them extensive training, which will "strengthen our program and make all our employees more qualified," said Baer.

Hessey added that

SGA meeting

by Kyndra Ponder

Tuesday marked the last full meeting for this year's SGA officers and allowed some of the new officers a chance to acquaint themselves with the SGA and how it works.

Bill Kerbin, finalizing the new Honor Code revisions, reported that the Student Affairs Committee (SAC) had some problems with the new code. Kerbin stated that the committee felt that there were two problems with the Honor Code-the enforcement is too strict and, in order for the code to work,

EDITORIAL

Campaign tactics were unethical

I would like to take this opportunity to express my concern over the campaigning methods of a few of the candidates that ran for an office in the Student Government Association last week.

Anyone running for office should have enough decency and respect for those in the college community not to swear in print or in a public speech. It is insulting and expresses nothing except the ignorance of the candidate. Swearing only points out the candidate's limited vocabulary and desperation for attention. Legal laws may not exist stating the etiquette of campaigning, but there are understood boundaries of how far a candidate should go.

My other concern is with a candidate who set up a campaigning gimmick within four yards of the voting poll. National and local laws exist which state legal limits of distance between the voting place and an active campaigner. Obviously, no law exists within the SGA, but one should be created since the campaigner is acting like a Big Brother watching everyone place their vote.

The same candidate later approached as I was leaving dinner and asked if I voted. I had deliberately tried to avoid him, but I answered yes. He then followed me a couple of feet and accused me of lying. The truth is I had voted, I just did not want to tell him he was not my choice and publicly embarrass him. This excessive and unethical campaigning did not make a difference in voters' decisions; if anything, it had a negative effect.

In the future I suggest that if the candidates want to inquire about a student's voting habits, they should do so without annoying or offending the student.

Basically, the SGA should take the time to create a few rules and regulations stating specific limitations on campaigning. It would make election time much more pleasant, and allow the freedom of choice that voters rightfully deserve, without candidates peering over their shoulders.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Student complains about cable

Okay, I give up. What's the joke? Why in earth, heaven and hell are we still waiting for cable? According to the obviously exasperated woman at Simmons Cable who spoke to me on the phone today, the company has been waiting and waiting for the college to get back to them, and no one has. Just what the deleted expletive is going on here?

A few weeks ago, I read a front-page article in the Elm about an allegedly impending agreement bewtween W.C. and Simmons. Someone tell me: is something really going to happen soon? Or ever? I think the students have been fairly patient since the college yanked our cable service out over a year ago without even telling us. But right now I get three channels (and very badly) and I have to put a wrestling hold on my antenna in order to watch Nightline. I'm really just sick of it all. By agreeing to reinstall cable on campus after having taken it out for basically no reason in the first place, the college is admitting it made a mistake. Having made the mistake and admitted it, isn't the only polite course of action that of trying to rectify it as soon as humanly possible?

I realize that the installation of cable may be causing the administration some inconvenience. Frankly, I don't care. Besides, the students' now-three-semester-old inconvenience of not having cable, the families of the students who go to school here have a $15,000 inconvenience to deal with every year. Last year, Mr. Baer informed us that it was his opinion that we should be studying in stead of watching TV. It is my opinion that our school's Director of Special Projects should be a continual help to the students, instead of a continual hindrance.

ISSUE: What can be done to improve students' pride in Washington College?

Is pride necessarily a good thing?

Bruce Hamilton

Is Pride necessarily a good thing? I don't want to be one of those people who makes a point of boasting about their alma mater. I think we've had enough of that from our parents. You know the joke: a Yale man and a Harvard man are in the euphemism, and the Harvard man is about to leave when the Yale man makes a comment: "At Yale they taught us to wash our hands after going to the bathroom." The Harvard man retorts, "At Harvard they taught us not to piss on our hands."

Aren't we, as a student body, proud of our school? The question of increasing student pride in Washington College is a loaded one–it assumes that the student body needs an increase in morale, or school spirit. Many would value their school in terms of its prestige or national recognition–but is this any stigma of worth? If our school buildings were old barns and our dorms were log cabins, would we feel any less pride towards the institution itself? The relevant attitudes of our student body correspond to a varied sense of values: while some of us feel that our faculty is outstanding, many simply value the social aspect of WC. This is also a question of loyalty: my fraternity is better than yours.

Pride is usually defined by negative connotation. According to Christian doctrine, one of the seven deadly sins. "Pride goeth before destruction" (Proverbs 16:18). By the same token, it can only be ignorance that breeds the kind of unconstructive criticism that one often hears muttered in the cafeteria, or cluttering the pages of our newspaper. Anyone who devalues or debases this school might as well go somewhere else. As an extreme example, anyone who vandalizes (and by this I mean willful destruction of property with malicious intent) should be either severely punished or removed from the community.

Ideally, that is what WC should strive to be: a community. We as students make up a great percentage of this community and should strive to make it as mutually productive and symbiotic as possible. We're all in this together.

I am told Stuart Neiman made the suggestion of having the Washington College seal painted on the side of the water tower. I think this is an interesting idea, but I don't think it would do anything to raise morale. Is Pride the bumpersticker you put on your car, telling the world you are a student here, or part of the alumni? Is it having a sweatshirt with the name of your school, to impress friends and family? I think not.

To conclude, I think there is nothing that can be done to increase student pride. In fact, it may not be necessary. There are a number of small improvements that would undoubtedly make students happier, but would this make them want to expound on the virtues of WC to their children? We must simply realize the merits of this school and learn to value it as an institution and an education.

Few of the students here realize that this school does have a definite history–one that commands respect. George Washington was the father of our country. Remember that criticism can be heplful or completely useless. Realize that each sorority and fraternity is only a small group within the big picture. To take pride in your school is to take pride in yourself as a student.

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

I think students need to be more supportive of all of the athletic teams here. We have a great basketball team and one of the best Lax programs in the country. We should show some pride through support of them.

Michael Tyson

First, one needs to decide what exactly is the cause of the lack of pride here. Thinking about it, I can find numerous causes. The bottom line is that each individual is able to help make the school what he or she wants it to be and live here the way he or she wants to live.

Andrew Diller

To improve student pride in WC, we need something nice to respect. I know everything is in the middle of being renovated, but right now it's a mess. At least try to keep adequate walkways clear of mud.

Carrie Bryant

As a cheerleader for the SC Basketball team, I think students need to become more active and supportive of team sports. Students also need to look at the construction and renovation here on campus with a more positive attitude and to consider what it will provide for the college's future.

Hard work and perserverence will increase pride

Amy R. Caddle

Looking out a classrom window in William Smith Hall, one sees a towering elm tree and a bronze statue of George Washington, both casting long shadows on the front lawn of Washington College. These are the symbols of Washington College, supposedly representing the tree of knowlege rooted in a liberal arts education, and the ideals of the founder of our country and namesake of our institution. In case you haven't noticed, the elm has been plagued by disease for a few years now, and the statue of Uncle George is looking a bit corroded lately. In the midst of the Master Plan, students seem to be suffering from lack of pride in Washington College.

Enshrouding ourselves in the icons of Washington College does absolutely nothing to improve the problem of lack of school spirit, and, in effect, fosters false pride in our institution. Lack of school pride stems directly from the apathy plaguing the campus, and the only way to promote student pride is through student-initiated change. I often hear students complaining about the dining hall food, limited curriculum, and boring weekends. Obviously, the student body is aware of the changes that need to be made, but few actually take action to solve the problems.

The key to change is to initiate it. All of us have the power to make changes if we wish to do so. Granted, it takes a lot of hard work and determination, but the end result will be ideally worth the effort.

Some reform-minded students are striving to improve WC, and are increasing student morale at the same time. Last year a group of students got together and saw a need for Peace Studies. Over 300 signatures were collected through petitions, and meetings with the administration showed that professors were willing to teach courses that had student demand.

As a result of much perserverance on the part of students and faculty alike, a course focusing on Peace and Justice will be taught next year by Dr. Brien.

Another good example of student initiated change is the recent campus-wide recycling effort. We are not only working together and improving student esteem, but our efforts are having a positive effect on the world as a whole.

Last Saturday night at the Coffee House was Open Mike Night, and the place was packed. It was a great example of students supporting students. The crowd was treated to a variety of talent ranging from SGA Presidential Campaign ballads to jazz guitar. It was the first time I had seen the Coffee House so crowded for an event besides Bid Night or any other big event. Perhaps the C-House should schedule an Open Mike Night each month. It would not only help to improve student unity, but would also prove beneficial to the C-House's recent lack of popularity.

I'm not saying we can save the universe in a semester, but if you see a need for improvement, work for change. Chances are, other students feel the same way you do. Perserverance is essential and results will take time. But heck, we all know the Academic Resources Center wasn't built in a day!

PERSPECTIVES

Jesse Jackson and National Leverage

Laura Hopper

Jesse Jackson first gained national prominence following the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Legend has it that Jesse appeared on the roof of the hotel in Memphis where King was shot wearing a shirt covered in blood, supposedly Dr King's. Jesse Jackson has come a long way from his beginnings on the south side of Chicago. He formed Operation Push, to promote equal rights, and later PUSH for excellence, a program to keep students from dropping out of school.

Jackson is a very eloquent and articulate man. But he can stick his foot in his mouth just as well as anyone else (Remember Hymietown?).

When Jackson moved to the District last spring, I thought he would challenge Marion Barry in the mayor's race. Barry 's Administration was even then thought to be as terrible as the current investigation is proving it is. And in a city where the candidate's race can determine the outcome of the race, Jackson would have been an alternative to the corrupt Barry.

Would have been, or could have been? Jackson has apparently decided not to run. He doesn't want to give up that "national leverage" he possesses by becoming mayor. But take a look at Jackson's record.

He has run for president twice, and did much better the second time. But he has limited, if any experience, in any type of governing. He did negotiate the release of one of the American hostages in the Middle East, but his presence was not appreciated in South Africa during the negotiations for Nelson Mandela's release.

Someone close to Jackson suggested that he actually did intend on running for mayor. That was his reason behind the move last April. But over the last few months, Jackson saw what a mayor must face on a daily basis. Not grand stirring issues that make excellent sound bites for the network news programs, but little day to day problems like a strike by sanitation workers or bus drivers, property tax hikes and street paving.

As mayor of Washington, Jackson might have gotten some national press coverage. But most would be local, not network. Face it, Jesse, the mayors of New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago really only make the network news broadcasts when they are elected, when they do or say something wrong, or when they die.

So all that national leverage (press coverage, name recognition, etc.) would be wasted. Unless, of course, Jesse cleaned up Washington, and made it a safe, if not nice, place to live. To do that, he would have to fight the Drug War, and right behind drugs are unemployment, teen pregnancy, drop-out rates, alcoholism, literacy, the homeless. Endless amounts of material for wonderful, eloquent and articulate speeches, but damn hard problems to actually solve. The list of problems faced by the mayor of a major metropolitan area does go on and on. And then there is always the city council, school board, fire and police departments to haggle with over every little thing.

Being the mayor of a big city is not a glamorous or always rewarding job. No TV shows, no swimming pools, no movie stars. Take a vacation and the critics will call you lazy. Throw a party and they'll say you are extravagant. I'm surprised that you, Jesse Jackson, had no idea what goes into running a city. You have been, after all, a critic of city governments for years. It's a hard job; the late Harold Washington could have told you all about it. But he might have also said there was nothing he enjoyed more than being mayor of Chicago.

So, who will be the next mayor? A recent poll suggests the citizens of Washington think that fine, upstanding Marion Barry would be just fine. That's too bad. Old habits are pretty hard to get rid of, especially when they involve lots of friends. Maybe a drug-free Barry would be different, but I don't know. But don't worry about it too much, Jesse, you'll be off campaigning for statehood for the District, trying to become a "shadow senator" for the District and hosting your TV show.

The sad thing, Jesse, is that maybe you could have done a world of good for Washington DC, and for the people who live there.

The news from Annapolis: environmental bills

Steven Bruchey

Monday afternoon approximately 250 undergraduates from Maryland colleges and universities marched the State House in support of a rigorous line of policy towards the environment. The students feel as though the environment has taken a backseat to the abortion issue.

This march was an important and effective political move for those concerned about the environment, and also a very symbolic gesture. Not only did these students bring statewide attention to an issue that has been overlooked this entire legislative session, they have shown lawmakers that they are concerned about political issues which will affect them and future generations.

It is somewhat odd that the environment has fallen so far behind abortion in the public eye, because there is a worldwide movement to start making environmentally safe products and to implement programs which will begin to protect and cleanup the environment. Furthermore, this is an election year and abortion has the potential to make or break some politicians campaigns because it is such a heated and emotional issue.

However, there are a number of bills on the environment such as an act that is planned to prolong the moratorium on the rockfish ban, another bill which would cease the rockfish ban, another which would prohibit construction on non-tidal wetlands, and some acts that would change hunting license requirements.

This Wednesday the hype will end and the hearings on abortion will finally take place in the Joint Hearing Room of the Legislative Services Building at 1:00 pm. The reason that the session has thus far been relatively quiet is that the Senate and the rest of the General Assembly is afraid of abortion coming up in the legislature is that if someone would start a filibuster in the Senate, the wheels of lawmaking would come to a halt. Even though the hearings on this topic will be heard this week, the bills could be buried at the bottom of the voting schedule so that the bills would not reach their respective house floors until all of the less controversial issues have gone through quietly.

The committees that will be presiding over the hearings will be Senate's Judicial Proceedings and the House's Environmental Affairs. Testimony will be very limited and the hearings will end no later than 6:00 pm. From 1:00-4:00, testimony will be heard for and against all of the abortion bills by designees of the Senators and Delegates. Then, from 4:00-5:00, public testimony will be heard on the Senate and House Abortion Omnibus Bills and from 5:00-6:00 on all other abortion bills.

A humorous thing happened on Thursday in the House Environmental Affairs Committee when five bills were presented to give more power to counties in enforcing the clean-up of the Chesapeake Bay. These bills were introduced by Delegates Johnson (one bill) and Weir (four bills) on behalf of the Joint Commission on the Chesapeake Bay Critical Areas. The chairman of the commission, Judge North, was present to testify on the legislation. Even though these are commission bills, North testified against two of the five. It seems to me that he is trying to limit the power of his own commission and biting the hand that feeds him at the same time.

News from around the world: Oil spill in Illinois

UNITED STATES:

Jesse Jackson has indicated he will not be seeking the Democratic nomination for mayor of Washington DC. When Jackson moved from the south side of Chicago to the District last April, many people assumed he would challenge Marion Barry in the next election. Barry's arrest for possession of cocaine thrust Jackson back into the spotlight. But Jackson has now indicated he will not run for mayor, and will continue in his efforts to gain statehood for the District of Columbia. In addition to his television show, Jackson hopes to be elected a sort of "shadow Senator" to lobby Congress.

In southern California, while officials decide whether to reopen 12 miles of beaches following an oil spill, the British Petroleum Company submitted its plan for cleaning up the remainder of the spill. 400,000 gallons of oil spilled into the Pacific ocean on February 7 when the tanker American Trader apparently struck her own anchor. British Petroleum has charted the tanker from the American Trading and Transportation Company. An official in the California Attorney General's office said both companies can be liable for damages.

In Roxana, Illinois, 672,000 gallons of oil spilled into a retention pond following a pipeline break at a Shell Oil refinery on the Mississippi River. Apparently, no oil reached the river.

Despite protests from the Alaska state government, the Justice Department is pursuing efforts to negotiate a plea-bargain settlement with Exxon. According to the proposed agreement, Exxon would plead guilty to negligence and set up a $550 million fund to restore natural resources damaged in the Exxon Valdez oil spill.

Alaskan officials object to the plea-bargain saying it will hinder their efforts to prosecute civil cases and collect damages from Exxon. The agreement contains a clause which prohibits Exxon from suing the government for negligence and demanding that the government pay part of the clean up costs.

SOVIET UNION:

In 20 cities across the Soviet Union, peaceful rallies were held to protest the slow rate of change in the Soviet Union. The rallies were organized by the pro-Democracy opposition and were in support of non-Communist or democracy oriented candidates. There will be elections held this coming Sunday in the republics of the Ukraine, Russia, and Byelorussia.

Lithuanians voted in the first multiparty election on Saturday. It was the first multiparty election held in the Soviet Union since the Bolshevik revolution. 72 of the 141 seats in the parliament were won by the Lithuanian independence movement, Sajudis. Sajudis is a coalition group made up of pro-secession Communists, independents, Social Democrats, Christian Democrats, and the Green Party. Sajudis won enough seats to have a majority in parliament. 51 seats will be decided in run-off elections. Only 29 seats were won by Communists, and only 7 of those 29 belonged to the group of the party loyal to Moscow.

Elections were also held in the republic of Moldavia. Moldavia joined the Baltic States in seeking independence.

Vaclav Havel is in Moscow this week to meet with Mikhail Gorbachev. Havel is expected to press for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Czechoslovakia.

GERMANY:

President Bush and West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl met at Camp David to discus German reunification. Both leaders tried to verbally reassure the Polish government's worries about the current border. But there is still a general uneasiness in Europe about German reunification and possible border and territory disputes.

The Poles are concerned about East Prussia and Silesia, both of which have a large ethnic German population. The Czechs are worried about the Sudetenland, which also has a large German population. And both Margaret Thatcher and François Mitter- and have expressed concerns about Germany's possible territorial aims.

Kohl has offered no firm reassurances to the Poles, and has indicated he does not want them greatly involved in reunification negotiations. Bush is more concerned that a reunified Germany be a firm member and supporter of NATO, and not become an isolated power.

NICARAGUA:

In a closely monitored presidential election, Violetta Chamorro defeated the leader of the Sandinistas, Daniel Ortega. Chamorro, the candidate of the National Opposition Union, is the widow of an outspoken newspaper publisher whose assassination sparked the 1978 revolution. The Bush Administration has pledged economic aid to help rebuild the Nicaraguan economy. But US aid will not be forthcoming until the Sandinistas hand power over to the Chamorro government.

EL SALVADOR:

José Napoleon Duarte, former president of El Salvador, died at his home in San Salvador. Duarte, 64, suffered from advanced liver cancer. In the 1960's, Duarte helped form the Christian Democratic party. He was elected mayor of San Salvador three times. Duarte spent seven years in exile in Venezuela after endorsing a military coup. During his presidency, Duarte was unable to end the civil war in El Salvador.

HUNGARY:

Gyula Horn, the Hungarian Foreign Minister, suggested that Hungary and the other Warsaw Pact nations should try to create closer ties to western Europe by joining some of the committees of NATO.

Horn also called the proposed simultaneous dissolution of both NATO and the Warsaw Pact "an illusion." Hungary and the Soviet Union are currently negotiating the withdrawal of 50,000 Soviet troops.

Traveling to paradise: a Spring Break guide

by Katherine Absher
Staff writer

A week in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, where young educated men and women bask in the sun, drink beer, and are interviewed by MTV, embodies the stereotypical Spring Break for most college students. But at Washington College students are more motivated during their Spring Breaks than other typical young adults. They want to see the world and apply their knowledge, garnered from their liberal arts education, to that world. Many students, therefore, forsake the crowded beaches, full of beer guzzlers and bikini clad bimbos, for the highly educational locales of Hawaii, Acalpuco, the Bahamas, and the Virgin Islands, or they go home and play Scrabble with mom and dad for a week.

Hawaii

Although college students must exchange their cans of beer for a mai tai in a pineapple, Hawaii is a wonderful place to spend Spring Break. In Honolulu students can brush up on their World War II history by visiting Pearl Harbor and the USS Arizona Memorial.

After fulfilling your obligations to Dr. Smith or Dr. Striner, leave Honolulu. Honolulu is a carbon copy of Los Angeles; it is overpopulated and over-commercialized. If you are searching for a beach and palm trees, escape from the skyscrapers of Hawaii and travel to Maui, Kauai, or Molokai, the smallest of the Hawaiian islands and the ultimate getaway. Molokai is only ten miles wide by 37 miles long and free of traffic lights, high-rises, elevators or supermarkets.

Junior Susan Spedden recommends a trip to Hawaii saying, "The neatest thing about Hawaii is when we were leaving the airport to go to the hotel, the airport was surrounded by black lava rock that was graffitied with little white shells that said so and so loves so and so or welcome to Hawaii. It was so respectful of the environment [to use shells instead of spray paint]. Plus the water was so warm. The luaus ar wonderful, but poi tastes really nasty."

Acapulco

Instead of brushing up on their World War II history in Hawaii, some ambitious students might want to practice their Spanish in Acapulco, Mexico. Once a part of the Aztec Empire, Acapulco, with its near perfect climate, has blossomed into one of the world's most popular resorts. Exquisitely framed by glorious beaches, lagoons and the slopes of the Sierra Madres, Acapulco welcomes students to an unparalleled variety of dining, entertainment, and activity opportunities that are a unique change from fraternity parties. Although not as eventful as slam dancing, colorful bullfighters and daredevil cliffdivers provide unforgettable entertainment. Bargain for a serape on the beach, or for silver and onyx at the open air market.

Golden beaches, breathtaking views, parasailing and waterskiing also provide immense pleasure to the vacationing student.

Jamaica

But if your Spanish is impeccable, thanks to all those hours in the language lab, Jamaica is one of the largest English speaking islands in the Caribbean Sea. It offers beautiful white sand beaches, lush gardens, good shopping, tennis, golf and a wide variety of water sports. Your vacation would not be complete without visiting Dunn's River Falls or dancing the night away to Jamaica's famous reggae music. Junior Larry Kilroy liked, "going up on the mountains of Kingston at night because Kingston was a really pretty city from a distance." He thought, however, that "the inner city of Kingston is sort of a slum."

The north coast with its popular resort areas of Montego Bay, Runaway Bay and Ocho Rios features fine coral beaches and broad plains where sugar cane, coconuts and citrus are grown. To the western end of the island lies Negril, once a remote swampy outpost but now a beachcomber's paradise.

Strongly contrasting with Chestertown's rainy weekends, students will be thrilled with the climate of Jamaica. Although temperatures only vary slightly, Jamaica does have seasonal changes in its weather. December to April is dry and cool (75 to 85 degrees) while July to September is dry and warm (85 to 95 degrees). Day breezes blow in from the sea to cool the island, and at night the breeze blows off the island.

Bahamas

If during your travels you are pining away for Chestertown's antique downtown area and modern shopping plaza, the capital of the Bahamas will make you feel right at home. Old World charm and New World glamour are combined in Nassau and in its world-class resorts of Cable Beach and Paradise Island.

In contrast to Old Nassau's stately colonial buildings, monuments and homes, Cable Beach with its ultra-modern resorts stretches three beautiful white-sand miles along western shores. Paradise Island, connected to Nassau by a short bridge, is the most complete resort in the tropics and the model by which others around the world have been measured.

Fine dining, great shopping and a full range of activities are readily available. Junior Greg Hay agrees, "The straw market is fun." Senior Laleh Malek, however, warns, "Be careful there. They rip you off. But the beaches are gorgeous—white sand with blue water."

A visit to Coral World, Nassau's new underwater observatory and marine park, is a must. Dr. Munson will surely give you extra credit points for this excursion.

Virgin Islands

If you are having difficulties juggling the bills for your Spring Break holiday and your Washington College tuition, go to St. Thomas, one of the Virgin Islands. Once the home port for Captain Kidd and Bluebeard, it was from St. Thomas that the pirates of the Caribbean launched their attacks on Spanish ships . If industrious, you might discover a sunken Spanish galleon laden with gold off of St. Thomas's coast. This find will tide you over for the rest of your college years and give you the ability to bribe most of your professors. If deep sea diving paired with treasure hunting is not your forte, you can still visit Bluebeard's Castle and try your luck there, or at least the visit will inspire a theses topic.

Of course one can save money by just lying on the beautiful beaches and swimming in the almost opaque waters, teeming with tropical fish and colorful corals. Or like Junior Jim Blount you can cruise around St. Thomas in a sailboat and visit the neighboring islands. Blount also enjoyed the native reggae music: "The music, the reggae, was great. Most of the bars were outside with a reggae band. Most had British beer."

If a student happens to be spending their Spring Break here rowing crew or writing their thesis, do not mourn. Andy's bar in downtown Chestertown, also serves imported beer and provides talented local entertainment for your enjoyment, such as the Swamp Weasels. There are also many tanning salons in the area to provide you with a tropical brown hue, and the Casey Swim Center, resplendent with beautiful clear and chlorinated water, will be open. If you are going home, you can look forward to the possibility that your college education may have given you the ability to beat mom and dad in Scrabble.

Language assistant's view of WC's campus

by Amy R. Caddle

What stereotypes come to mind when one mentions the French? Many picture the French as wearing berets and toting bread and wine around the countryside. Frédérique Lavanant, the French language assistant currently in residence at Washington College, breaks all of the negative stereotypes you may have of French people.

Lavanant comes to us from Créteil, France, about ten kilometers from Paris as part of an exchange program between Washington College and her home university. She completed her degree studies last year at Paris 12, concentrating in English and American Literature and Civilization. She has studied English for six years. Although Paris 12 and Washington College are similar in size, Lavanant notices some major differences. "At Paris 12, there is no real social life and no real campus. Here at Washington College the social life is a lot more active, and I am able to meet new people all of the time," says Lavanant. As Language Assistant, Lavanant teaches one class per week of Advanced Conversational French, assists students in the Language Lab, and is available any time for French students needing help with their courses. She is also required to attend the French Table every Monday afternoon in Hynson Lounge."I really enjoy all of my work with the students," says Lavanant.

In addition to her assistantship, Lavanant is currently taking Introduction to the Film, Elementary Spanish, African Literature, and American Literature. She especially likes her African Literature course with Professor Forbes. "He encourages us to approach the material from an objective viewpoint, "she says. Lavanant also points out the differences between the French and American educational systems. "French professors concentrate on teaching theory, and students sit in class and take notes," says Lavanant. "Here, the atmosphere is much more relaxed, and professors encourage class discussion," she adds. Lavanant also appreciates the close relationships that students and professors have at Washington College.

This is Lavanant's first stay in the United States. "I have been to England several times, but I was curious to experience American life and culture. I was also interested in learning the difference between English as it is spoken in America as opposed to England," she says. Although Lavanant likes Chestertown, she is finding it difficult to visit other American towns and cities. "I have been to Baltimore and Washington, DC, and I am eager to visit other places, especially New York," she says.

After Lavanant completes her assistantship here , she plans to return to France and complete her Masters Degree on Affirmative Action in the US.

Have a jolly, holly holiday

For the last week there have been two questions that have been dominating conversation on campus. Almost everywhere you go you hear someone asking, "Excuse me, but exactly why in the hell are there eagles on top of the lamp posts?" Still, the most popular question has concerned the fact that Washington College students are required to go to classes on Washington's Birthday.

Suck it up, I say. Students at Brigham Young University go to classes on Brigham's birthday. Classes are held at James Madison when the former president's big day rolls around. Even at the University of Nipsey Russell, students still had to crack open the books on the day "The Wiz" arrived on videocassette.

Besides, if WC students were given off for Washington's Birthday, there would be numerous other holidays that would have to receive the same treatment. Lincoln's Birthday would also require a break from studies. Richard Nixon's birthday could be celebrated with a class field trip where students learn how to make license plates. And while we're giving days off for Nixon birthdays, how about recognizing Mojo Nixon's. Any man who sings the line "Elvis eats boats" deserves a holiday in my book.

Since we will be spending the 1990-1991 academic year celebrating the birthdays of great presidents, we can't forget to celebrate the day Stuart Neiman first graced the world with his presence. There is no doubt in my mind that Stu will do a fine job as president. My God, the man developed his own campaign slogan—what more can you ask from a candidate? So I suggest that next year we are given a day off and allowed to celebrate Stuart Neiman's birthday. Hell, I'll go further than that. I say we give the student body a whole week off when he finally shaves his silly-looking beard.

Brett Lankford

I will also take this opportunity to announce my campaign that Eugene Hamilton's birthday is not only a campus holiday, but a national one. That man was responsible for one of the greatest musical performances and most enjoyable times this campus has ever seen. I am being completely serious. As a matter of fact, I am going to use this space to demand that the Coffee House give Mean Gene a return engagement.

Still, back to the holiday concept. I think Clint Baer should be one of the most celebrated people ever to work at this institution. We shouldn't stop at a holiday for this man. For my second example of blatant misuse of space on the features page, I will now propose that a statue of Clint Baer be constructed right next to the statue of George. Any man who has put up with as much abuse as Clint has over the past few years deserves some form of appreciation. If you won't build a statue for him, at least have his beard bronzed.

If we actually receive all of these holidays, the student body may die celebrating. In addition, students would only be allowed to attend one day of classes a week. Still, this is probably a small sacrifice to put forth as we make the effort to appreciate everyone who deserves recognition. Oh yes. There is one last birthday of note. I turn 21 on October 28th. Gifts and cards can be sent through campus mail. I'll get back to you on the address where you can send the flowers. Still, all I want for my birthday is a day off—and a few bronzed hairs from Clint Baer's beard.

Earth Day 1990

WE DON'T INHERIT THE EARTH FROM OUR PARENTS. WE BORROW IT FROM OUR CHILDREN......

"save the earth"

by Julianne Michael

In April 1970 hundreds of thousands of people from all walks of life came together to do their individual parts to help clean up the environment. The resulting changes in legislation and attitudes have been broad and long lasting. Now, twenty years later, the original organizers of that first Earthday event are back and planning an entire week-long series of activities.

Earthday 1990 will be the most exciting, far-reaching demonstration of environmental concern ever organized. The Elm is going to publish an environmental section each week leading up to Earthday, scheduled for April 22. There will be information concerning environmental issues here at the college as well as on the state, national and international can do to make a difference. There will be information about Earthday meeting and activities here at the college and around the state. There will also be information about different marches and protests around the state and in Washington DC. The Earthday representative for Washington College is Julianne Michael at 778-4110.

Spring Break in spring: a novel idea

Surprising as it may seem, Spring Break is only a little over a week away. Remember Spring Break? A time to pay homage to nature's glorious rebirth and celebrate the eagerly awaited return of warm weather.

Phil "Slice" Macek

Yet, truth be told, there is one fact about Spring Break that should put one's party plans temporarily on hold-it occurs during winter. It seems to me that the "omniscient" schedule makers at this fine learning center are playing a dirty trick on the student body. I can picture them at a meeting attempting to construct our academic calendar saying, "Let's give those juvenile delinquents Spring Break in the winter. Then, when the warm weather finally arrives, they'll be sweating it out over British literature papers, U.S. history exams, and biology lab reports-like those social vagrants should be. Especially seniors, we'll move up the final deadline for their theses so they can't waste their time drinking Milwaukee's Best, playing Nintendo, or entertaining themselves with a few rounds of campus golf."

However, most students, contrary to the wishes of the schedule makers, do manage to enjoy themselves during Spring Break. Many fine, well-meaning college-aged youths migrate to tropical locales to soak up the rays and alleviate the boredom that a Spring Break spent at home promises. Daytona Beach, Florida is a perennial hot bed for Spring Break pleasure seekers. Such hedonistic activities as the "Best Body on the Beach" contests, and all relative contests, act as nothing more than vents for the libidinous frustrations these admirable collegians keep pent up during the academic year as they ponder the academic value of: Marx's doctrines for a classless, egalitarian society, Freud's theories about the Id, Ego, and Superego, Plato's treatment of justice in The Republic, and Shakespeare's use of imagery in MacBeth. Unfortunately, not all students are presented with the opportunity for travel. Alas, these students have to spend their break at home.

However, the prospect of staying at home for a whole week is not as bad as it seems. In terms of completely resting one's mind, staying at home has no rival. Just think of the countless hours one can spend on the sofa eating Cheeze-its, drinking Yoo-Hoos, and becoming completely engulfed in television reruns of "The Banana Splits" and "Fish." Yes, spending an entire week on a sofa just doing nothing except eating and watching Abe Vigoda busting inner city drug czars sounds like pure heaven on earth to me.

No matter how one chooses to detach oneself from one's school work, one soon discovers that break is over and the time to make the subsequent odyssey back to our magnificent campus has arrived. Thus, when the warm weather of spring shows up, students are back in class, figuratively chained to their chairs in Smith Hall, helpless to take full advantage of the nice weather that nature has bestowed upon them.

Obviously, moving Spring Break back this year would not be feasible, as travel plans are already secure and untapped kegs are already being iced down. I only hope that in the future the schedule makers at his school can realize the desire of students to have Spring Break in spring. Granted, students are awarded

Shoremen make NCAA tourney

by Matt Giller

Last week the Shoremen started the post season with two MAC tournament games, beating Moravian at home, 92-88 and losing in the finals to Franklin and Marshall, 87-77 in Lancaster, PA. The last time the Shoremen met Moravian was on opening night in this year's Scotty Wood tournament at Muhlenberg where the Greyhounds left the driving to us falling 82-68. The last time F&M and the WAC met on the hardcourt was in last year's 2nd round of the NCAA's, where the Dips jumped out to an early lead and never let the Shoremen back into the game, winning by a large margin.

But the Shoremen's next meetings with these two squads would prove to be much different than the last. NBA great Bill Russell once said that basketball is a game of streaks so it is important to get the first one and the last one - the Moravian game, case in point. Both teams had scoring streaks in the first half, adding up to a 35-34 Greyhound lead. For most of the second half, the Shoremen had control while building their leads. The WAC played near perfect basketball until about one minute left in regulation, when action was as wild as a tumbleweed in a tornado.

With the WAC leading by 7 it looked like the game was in the books. Looking to foul on every opportunity, Moravian sent WC to the line. Tank, an 80% free throw shooter was sent to the line on two straight occasions, only to see the front end of a one and one carom off the rim to keep Moravian within distance. Down by 3 and with 5 ticks left on the Timex, the Greyhounds took the ball out at halfcourt. The ball was inbounded into the corner and a desparation three-pointer was released. To the disbelief of everyone, the next sound they heard was the swish of the net and overtime was in the making.

With the Shoremen in foul trouble, Moravian's center controlled the paint. But the home team once again thrilled the crowd with another win due to clutch foul shooting(27-31 total) and super defense. Keehan led WAC scorers with 33 points aided by 4 3-pointers. Chris Brandt followed with 20, Jamke had 17 points, 10 rebounds, Tank tallied 14 and 8 assists, while C.J. Johnson contributed with his 8 points and 7 rebounds. The win sent WC on to the MAC finals.

Each year it seems that to win the MAC tournament you must get by the Diplomats of F&M. This year would prove no different as the Dips beat our friends Widener College to advance to the finals. Both teams came out shootng the proverbial lights out, as the Shoremen shot 52% from the field and F&M only slightly better with 58%. F&M went into the locker room leading by a score of 41-37. Certainly if this game remained close the Shoremen, who have won every game that ended with a margin of 5 points or less, would rise over the top.

While the WAC never regained the lead in the 2nd half, the visitors kept the Dips extremely wary of an upset. The Shoremen thrilled the crowd that journeyed north when Duckett fed the Bull for an alleyoop to make it a one point contest with about 5 minutes remaining. Unfortunately the Dips took over for the remainder of the game resulting in a large final margin.

Chris "Bull" Jamke was dominating in the paint and led the Shore's scoring with 24 points and 10 rebounds. Keehan, who missed last year's game due to an ankle injury, scored 14 points and 8 rebounds. Brandt, riddled by foul difficulties, followed with 13, while Tank netted 9 and Liddy equalled that in one of his strongest games as a Shoreman.

Due to their strong 21-5 record the Shoremen were given their second straight NCAA tournament bid. They face Kings College(17-10) at home Saturday night at 7:30. This is the first NCAA playoff game WC has ever hosted, and a good turnout would be helpful. Coach Finnegan and the team would greatly appreciate your support at the playoff game Saturday night.

Lacrosse hopes '90 will end years as bridesmaids

by Matt Giller

Each late winter about this time, bordering on a new season, talk surrounds the lacrosse team - unavoidably, Hobart slips through somebody's lips. That word alone almost seems to be taboo. But one can't help but be a little anxious about THAT OPPONENNT. First of all there has never been a team that has dominated a sport for so many years; and at the same time there has never been a team that has been second best for so many years. Call it an era of the bride and the bridesmaid complex, call it what you like, but after years of playing second fiddle to the Geneva juggernauts, the players might be putting on added pressure to finally be king of the hill.

But Coach Corcoran insists the pressure should be put on Hobart, who has gained national recognition for their record breaking streak. He feels with the outstanding core of All-American seniors, an All-American between the pipes, and a young talented squad, this could be the year.

This year's leaders are senior captains and 1st team All-Americans Tim Hormes and Bob Martino, Honorable Mention All-American senior Kevin Colbeck, and 3rd team All-American Dave Slomkowski. Hormes, Martino, Colbeck and junior Hank Miller lead a strong experienced corps of middies. They are joined at the center stripe by lettermen senior Mark Cavallaro, junior lettermen Ben Lamanna and Steve Klein. Transfers Jeff Hall and Steve Russell, along with freshmen Jed Cronin and Dave Lapinsky, join the veterans of the team.

With Hormes moving from attack to middie this year, sophomore Nick Darcangelo is the lone proven scorer in the crease. Joining Darcangelo at attack are Greg Rupert and Ron Council. Talented freshmen include Brian Johnson and Greg Mouragady.

Corcoran stongly believes that this team will again be another successful one, despite the fact that they have the toughest schedule in their division. Their schedule includes top 10 Division I powers Navy and Johns Hopkins, along with a Division III schedule that will probably lock horns with 7 of the top 8 teams.

New additions this year consist of rule changes that are geared towards preventing the slowness of stalling. For one, the ball must clear the retaining line in 10 seconds, then another 10 seconds to enter the opponent's box. During the last 2 minutes of the game, teams must stay in box or a loss of posession will result. Corcoran, an advocate of a faster, more exciting game has been a victim of lesser talented teams by this style of play. The head Shoremen feels, as well, these rule changes should improve the interest of the game. Also adding to a quicker pace is changing of the rule after a shot. Once a shot is taken, the ball is immediately put back in play, making the defensive team unable to put longsticks in to counter the bevy of sharpshooters. These rules not only fit the team's fast style but also enables them to be steps closer to king of the hill.

When asked if Hobart can be beaten, Corcoran replied that just like Mike Tyson, they're human. He continued with a smile, "maybe we can be Buster Douglas." Probably hidden in his desk drawer somewhere is a baseball cap inscribed on the lid, "JUST YOUR BEST - SHOREMEN LAX."

Swimming finishes 9th at MAC

by Greg Coss

The 1990 MAC women's swim championships held at Franklin and Marshall College were the biggest challenge of the year for the Washington College Shorewomen. They were comprised of an equivalent of 6 meets condensed into a 3-day period, and the women's swim team responded brilliantly. Among the excitement of the meet was a personal best for Samantha Streamer in the 50 yard freestyle event, which remarkably came on the final day of the grueling competition. Washington College also received very impressive performances by Amy Capone in the 100 and 200 yard breast stroke events. Leslie Newcombe place in 3 events, including a very good showing in the 1650 freestyle event (12th place in MAC's which according to Coach Berry was "way above her seeding") after already swimming in the 200 breast stroke and placing tenth. If there were two real standouts for Washington College, though, they were senior Vicki Carroll and sophomore Kasey Carroll (no relation).

Kasey Carroll had been attempting all year long to post a time which would qualify her for the NCAA III championships at Williams College in Massachusetts. Her last opportunity came at the MAC's, and she more than made the most of her chance. In what Coach Berry and many others called "the premier race of the 3-day meet," Kasey easily defeated a swimmer from Gettysburg who was ranked 7th in the nation in the 1650 freestyle and had beaten Kasey twice before in the same event to capture the big upset of the meet. Berry feels that this year Kasey has an excellent chance to place in the nationals and earn All-American status. The top sixteen times in each event will place and these will be All-Americans. Last year Kasey finished seventeenth and missed All-American by two seconds. This year, Coaches Kim Lessard and Dennis Berry "will train her for two weeks". "There's a lot of hype and hoopla that goes with the national championships," said Berry, "but her win in the MAC's proved she's no fluke. She believes in herself and so do the other swimmers. We all feel she can get the job done in the nationals, and that we'll see some good swimming." Kasey's victory was the first conference championship in Washington College history. In addition to this victory, Kasey finished second in the 500 freestyle to the same girl she defeated in the 1650 free. 3rd in the nation. Kasey rounded out her placings with a third place finish in the 200 fly, ending a brilliant overall performance.

Vicki Carroll swam the best race of her life in the last race of her life. She has been a member of the swim team for four years and a valuable contributor, but she had never been able to place in the MAC championships. But this year would be different, as Vicki posted a personal best time in the 100 butterfly and placed 13th. "I always have special thoughts for seniors," said coach Berry. "In Vicki's case she gave up a lot to concentrate on swimming. She has obligations as a senior and many other concerns, but she still stays dedicated. She has improved every year, and her last swim was a personal best. Maybe it took her last race to place but that's what Washington College is all about. She worked hard for her four years here, and she gave herself a great reward."

Three other swimmers place for WC as well, giving the Shorewomen a total of five placers, a school record. Leslie Newcombe had "a great tournament" according to Berry. Newcombe turned in an excellent 12th place showing in the 1650 free, a 10th place showing in the 200 breast, and a 16th place showing in the 100 breast. Berry was also impressed with Sam Streamer's personal best in the 50 free, as well as an 8th place finish in the 100 free and a 9th place finish in the 200 free. "Amy Capone surprised a lot of people and turned a lot of heads," Berry also noted. The freshman turned in a 6th place finish in the 200 breast and 7th place in the 100 breast.

WC placed ninth overall in the competition, and its 208 total compiled points were a school record. The team could have finished anywhere from 6th to 12th place, as the top five teams were just too strong. WC held sixth at different stages of the competition, and its distance from that spot at the end was very narrow. Berry said there was "a lot of parity, a lot of quality swimmers at the event. We knew our work cut out for us and we came through." The performance at the MAC's, as well as WC's season, was an all-time best for the Shorewomen. On March 8,9 and 10, Kasey Carroll swims in the nationals. Meanwhile, the rest of the team can reflect on their banner season and look forward to a very promising season next year.

Baseball goes south for spring

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

This year's WC baseball team will attempt to improve on their 7-14 record by sending out a young, but talented baseball team that excels on defense. The team's success will depend a great deal on the squad's hitting and pitching. This formula may sound familiar to Baltimore Orioles fans, and by late April, who knows, the campus may be hearing cries of "Why Not?" from the ballclub.

The team has already experienced a few setbacks this season. Scott Riley, a starting outfielder from last year's team, transferred from the school at the end of last semester. In addition, pitcher Hal McBee had an elbow operation a couple of months ago, and the injury has yet to heal completely. McBee will be unable to pitch this year, but he will be able to play in the outfield. Coach Athey hopes that the team will be able to overcome these setbacks and make a run at the MAC championship.

"This year's team is more experienced," Athey said recently. "We could be competitive in the MAC this year. Johns Hopkins is probably the only team in the conference with more material than us, and if things work out we might be able to make a run."

This year's club does have four dependable pitchers on the squad. Chris Long, Joe Boan, Grame Wildman and C.J. Johnson make up the Washington College pitching staff. Long and Boan combined to register five of the team's seven victories last season. Long led the team in innings pitched and strikeouts, while Boan was the only Shoreman with a winning record. Wildman and Johnson are also experienced on the mound.

Joe Boan and Matt Giller will need to carry some of the offensive load for the Shoremen this year. Giller batted .323 last season and was second on the team in doubles, and Boan has shown great potential at the plate. Benny Sanudo will also be an important cog in the WC offensive machine. Sanudo was second on the team in walks last year and led the squad with a .487 on base percentage.

This year the team is experienced at every position. Coach Athey has instituted a platoon system in an effort to get the best out of his talented players.

The team is also heading south over Spring Break for their annual spring trip. The team leaves March 9th, and this is the thirteenth consecutive year that WC has gone south over break. They will scrimmage against Allentown, Upsala, Southeastern Massuchesetts, St. Lawrence, Delaware Valley and Swarthmore. Coach Athey feels this trip is important for the team. "We use these games as practice games. It gives everyone on the team some experience, and it gives the pitchers a chance to loosen their arms and warm up for the season. The trip also helps because it brings the team together."

This year's WC baseball team started their season on March 1 against Catholic. After their spring trip, they return for a March 22 home game against Tufts. The MAC season begins at the end of March and will be in full swing by mid-April. By that time, the Shoremen will have shown whether they will be contenders or pretenders in 1990.

Resident Assistant Positions
(1990-1991 Academic Year)

The Deans of Students encourage qualified students to consider applying for a position on the College's RA staff for the 1990-91 academic year. A student should be in good academic standing (3.0 GPA desirable); in good judicial standing; and possess the qualities of self-discipline, interest in other people and a concern for their rights and needs, interest in harmonious group living, effective leadership skills, good communications skills, and a positive sense of self.

Applications will be availabe in Student Affairs on Wednesday, March 7th. and must be returned no later than Wednesday March 21st.

Maloney's innovative approach to Gabler

Hedda Gabler, a tale of a woman who finds herself trapped in an unfulfilling marriage and attracted to another man, written by Henrik Ibsen, will be performed by the WC Drama Department Friday and Saturday nights at 8 PM under the direction of Tim Maloney. Seating is limited and reservations are required. Free tickets can be reserved by calling 778-2800, ext.269 [photo by Amy L. Undercoffler]

Under the direction of Drama Department Chairman Timothy Maloney, the Washington College Drama Department will perform Henrik Ibsen's Hedda Gabler in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center Wednesday, February 28 through Saturday, March 3. Rehearsals for the production began in early February, and the cast and crew as a whole are feeling very confident about their work.

In much of his work, Ibsen, a prominent late 19th century Danish playwright, focused on the psychological making or "mismaking" of his principal character, and he conveys the destructive effects that this person's deficiences have on the people around them.

This psychological-emotional approach to drama is very much present in the story of Hedda Gabler. First performed in 1889 at the Munich Hoftheater, this play reveals the desperation of a woman who, through outside pressures, finds herself caught in an unfulfilling marriage and attracted to another man.

The themes of human potential unrealized and conformation to society's standards are two other motifs that are crucial in Hedda Gabler, as well as in many other plays by Ibsen.

According to several members of the cast and crew, the approach taken, by director Tim Maloney, with this particular production is quite innovative and exciting.

Assistant Stage Manager and sophomore Stephanie Hess explains, "It is definitely a non-traditional approach but he [Maloney] is not taking the story out of context." The costumes and props being used are from the late 19th century period although there is some use of unusual, unexpected properties for symbolic purposes.

Predicts junior Felicia Shakman, who is portraying the lead character of Hedda, "The audience will really have to use their imaginations when watching this interpretation of the play and I think that's a good thing." The use of some surprising special effects will also add to the unique nature of the production.

The cast of this production includes Shakman as Hedda Tesman; Peter Johnson as her husband, George Tesman; Lisa Woodcock as Juliana Tesman, his aunt; Emily Lott as Mrs. Elvsted; Ryder Daniels as Elbert Lovborg and Cindy Croot as Berta, a servant to the Tesmans.

Through a intense, rigorous rehearsal process, averaging four hours every night, the actors initially familiarized themselves with the play through improvisational portrayal of their characters. Shakman recalls, "For almost the first three weeks we were doing improv. Our director had us explore every extreme, every possibility for our character before we even started looking at scripts." The audience should expect to experience a wide range of emotions towards the characters in the play.

Those involved in the show agree it is hard to know whether or not to sympathize with Hedda at the end of the play. "The play is really about the mismaking of Hedda and how everyone has an ideal for what they want her to be," emphasizes Hess.

Seating for the production is limited and reservations can be made by calling 778-2800 ext.269. Admission is free.

WC graduate and Congressional candidate visits campus

by Kevin Holland

Maryland Delegate and Congressional candidate Barbara Kramer will speak on campus Thursday, March 8. A 1970 graduate of Washington College, Delegate Kramer will deliver a speech, sponsored by the William James Forum.

Delegate Kramer is currently completing her second term as State Delegate for Harford County, having been elected in 1983, and recently launched her campaign to be named the Democratic candidate for the Maryland First District Congressional seat. That position is held by incumbent Congressman Roy Dyson, who will face Kramer in the Democratic primary later this year, according to Kramer's aide.

This year's Congressional race should prove interesting, as incumbent Dyson has faced growing opposition in the last two years.

After defeating Republican contender Wayne Gilchrest by a very small margin in 1988, Dyson has endured allegations concerning ethics and finance management. His popularity on the Eastern Shore has waned considerably, and Shore Republicans are hopeful of gaining a new Congressional seat.

If Kramer defeats Dyson in the Democratic primary, the Democrats may have a better chance at holding the seat, but it will be an uphill battle.

Kramer has visited Washington College in the past, as both alumni and guest. In 1988, she spoke at the College concerning her role as a woman in state government and as one of the Maryland delegates to the Democratic National Convention.

Thursday's speech will begin at 7 PM in Hynson Lounge. For more information, contact Professor Tapke, advisor for the William James Forum.

Designer's life after Broadway

by Teresa Cropper

Broadway scenic designer Clarke Dunham will speak on "Is There LIfe After Broadway?" Tuesday evening in the Norman James Theater.

Over the past thirty years, Dunham has tried his hand at practically every facet of entertainment. Making his professional debut at the Valley Forge Music Fair, Dunham has since moved on to more demanding challenges. He has worked on commercials and theme parks, industrial shows and World's Fairs, in addition to working as a producer and as a designer for network television.

Since the time he spent studying at Philadelphia's Tyler School of Fine Arts, Dunham's designs have been displayed in major theaters throughout the United States, Europe, and Canada, including the Royalty in London, and the Theatre de Paris. He has designed the lighting, scenery and/or projections for over 300 Broadway, Off-Broadway, Regional Theater and Opera productions.

Among his credits at the New York theater are the smash hit political satire Macbird, Bubbling Brown Sugar and The End of the World.

Aside from his success in the theater, Dunham has experienced equal success in the field of opera; he designed the set for the NYC Opera's production of the Bernstein opera Candide.

Dunham also partakes as director/designer in music theater, where he has contributed to the production of the American premiere of Wagner's Das Liebesverbot, and Amahal and the Night Visitors at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Over the years, Dunham's success has led to many distinguishable awards and nominations for his work, including Tony, Drama Desk and Outer Critics Circle nominations in 1985 for the musical, Grind.

Durham is currently working with a theatrical architect on several co-designed theaters. He is also in the midst of designing the sets for Hal Prince's production of Madame Butterfly at the Houston Opera.

Dunham's talk will be held in the Norman James Theater at 8 PM on Tuesday.

Picturing Will : the work of a promising "photographer"

by Claire Capuzzi

Picturing Will
by Ann Beattie
230pp. Random House, New York
$18.95

In his self-righteous Social Manifesto for a New Novel, author Tom Wolfe asserts the superiority of the large sprawling realistic novel (for example, oh, say, Bonfire of the Vanities) over those mysterious and inaccessible writing styles among young authors today, Wolfe wonders aloud at the loss of such a rich and rewarding approach to literature.

After he gets his foot out of his mouth, Mr. Wolfe should get himself a library card. There are writers writing in this vein—and many of them are making the best seller list; writers like Anne Tyler, Kaye Gibbons, and Anne Beattie, all of whose novels should be real enough to please Mr. Wolfe—their characters have messy marriages, ill-behaved children and backed up toilets enough to last lifetime.

Picturing Will tells the story of several different people whose lives are linked together through five-and-a-half-year-old Will. Jody, Will's mother, is forced to become emotionally independent when her husband walks out on her. She channels her anger by periodically sending him envelopes of personal affects she has gathered together: receipts from the grocery store, postcards form her lover, Will's discarded bubblegum wrappers, etc. Jody's bitterness is soothed by the presence of Mel, her lover and Will's surrogate father, and also by her burgeoning career as a photographer.

The author uses photography as a metaphor to link the lives of these people to the structure of the novel itself—whenever Jody speaks about the nature of her work, it is clear that Beattie is doing the same:

> She moved the tripod to another location so that when she photographed the house the little ash trees would be in the picture. She leaned over to look through the lens. Until you looked through the lens, you could never be sure. That was when things took on a prominence they didn't have in life, or when details disappeared. You could find that the picture you thought to take with a wide angle lens was really better seen in close-up.

Beattie shifts her narrative and perspective the way a photographer changes lenses on a camera—in order to obtain a more complex and insightful picture. In this way, she successfully demonstrates the idea that one story told by many people becomes many different stories, each with its own strange angle. Although Beattie's metaphor works nicely, and her presence remains unobtrusive throughout the novel, it becomes unclear what exactly the novel is trying to accomplish. If it is a picture of Will, or indeed a picture of any of the characters, it is a vague and unsatisfying one.

There is a tension in the novel that is never resolved—a kind of dark undercurrent characterized by incidents such as Will's witnessing a homosexual liaison between an older man and a young boy, and, less seriously, Jody's ex-husband's rather sloppy adulterous affairs. In order to resolve this, the author interrupts the novel periodically with a monologue on the difficulties of raising a child. While this device seems to work well as yet another way of controlling the novel, it fails to enhance it in any other way.

Although the intentions behind Picturing Will are, like the work of a beginning photographer, more than a little fuzzy, Beattie proves she is capable of a realistic style that doesn't succumb to sentimentality or tired stereotypes. Her work is as complex as lives of her characters—she is sensitive to the presence of truth, whether seen through the eyes of a lonely woman, a devoted lover, a neglected wife, an irresponsible husband or the small child that keeps them all together.

Ann Beattie's recent novel, Picturing Will, tells the story of several different people whose lives are linked together by a young boy.

Lecture on Beckett

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

James Knowlson, long time friend and now biographer of Samuel Beckett, will lecture on the author's life and works in "Beckett Directing Beckett" Tuesday afternoon.

Through a friendship spanning twenty years, Knowlson established the Beckett International Foundation, to which Beckett contributed by donating not only recent manuscripts, but early manuscripts as well.

Reading University in England, is the institution to which Beckett has donated most of his work and is the location of the Foundation, which provides a "focus for Beckett scholars form around the world," writes the London Sunday Times.

In one of the notebooks donated by Beckett, those who influenced his literary career are recognized by such examples as "scores from Schubert and quotations form Sherman's School for Scandal and the Beggar's Opera" as well as "the prophetic words 'damned to fame' from Pope's Dunciad and 'The worst is not so long as one can say, this is the worst' [from Shakespeare's King Lear]," according to the Sunday Times.

Explains Dr. John Pilling, Reader in English at Reading, "Beckett is being honorifically treated in his life time like no other writer." From as far away as Japan, Beckett scholars travel to Reading in hopes of quenching their thirst for knowledge.

The archive includes everything from dozens of unpublished manuscripts from unfinished poems to long stretches of prose, reports the Times, adding that Knowlson's personal favorites are two notebooks covering Godot, one of them a journal of annotations Beckett made in 1975 while directing a German production.

John Calder, former publisher of the author hailed by many as one of the great 20th century modernists, predicts that Beckett may rank after Christ, Napoleon and Wagner as having the most books written about him by 2000 AD if the current trend continues, says the Times.

Currently, Knowlson is in the process of editing the production journals Beckett authored as director of his own plays. For six months before Beckett's decline in health and eventual death, Knowlson interviewed the author and collated the tales of his life up to the end of WWII.

Knowlson's talk will begin at 4 PM Tuesday afternoon in the Sophie Kerr Room.

then "don't let them complain in the end."

Neiman will also have to deal with the recently raised questions of funding. He said, "I will personally work with anyone who has got an idea for a club. I will also take a look at the clubs being funded now. I don't want to dig through personal finances, I just want the groups to account for how their money is being spent."

He also addressed prejudice in funding allocation. "Any prejudice in funding or any prejudice based on personal reasons will become an impeachable offense. That is not under any circumstances going to happen in my administration."

In regard to the alcohol policy, he warned that change toward leniency is "not going to happen. If it's what the students want I'm willing to complain but reality dictates that it's not going to change. We have to find more plausible and interesting ways to work within the system."

Above all, Neiman stressed that he will pose the students' views and not his own in every situation. For example, he would be willing to fund fraternity, international house or other organization's activities in addition to three or four big bands a year instead of allocating $1,500 a week to bands that no one is going to show up to.

"If that's where the students want to go, then that's where the money ought to go."

Election chairman Kristen Kujawski reported on the outcome of the elections. Approximately 450 students voted. (see returns in box this page)

Finally, two senators, Curtis Campbell and Matt Weir were impeached because they had missed more than the three unexcused absences that are permitted to Senators in the SGA Constitution.

There will be an SGA meeting Tuesday, March 6 at 9:30 in the SGA offfice to swear-in the new SGA officers.

Benefit planned

by Kyndra Ponder

SGA Senator and Junior Class President, Suzanne Hewes is trying to organize a benefit-similar to the Tamara Alexander Benefit-to help the Benedictine School for Exceptional Children.

On Sunday February 25, 1990, Sister Jeanette of the Benedictine School asked the Sacred Heart Catholic Church for funds to help build a new 600 ft. well and neutralizing system for the school. The State of Maryland Board of Health recently told Benedictine that their already existing 60 ft. well is inadequate; if the new system is not built, the state will have to close the school down.

The new well will cost Benedictine School an estimated 1.2 million dollars, but if they can raise half that amount, the state will match it. For all students who are interested, there will be an organizational meeting on Sunday, March 4 at 9:00 in the SGA Office in the basement of Minta Martin.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Food For Thought

"You are what you eat!" It's true! There's no way around it. What we eat and how much we eat directly affect how well we feel and look.

Our diet can influence our risk of developing life-shortening and typically American diseases such as heart disease, cancer, stroke, diabetes and high blood pressure, not to mention less-threatening problems such as tooth decay, bone fractures, and America's leading ailment - obesity.

Diet affects our physical appearance as well as our emotional and psychological health.

Such subtleties as how well you study and how restfully you sleep can be affected by the way you eat.

Unfortunately, despite a growing awareness of nutrition and wellness, Americans continue to eat too much fat, sodium, sugar and protein.

Hope everyone has a great week. Take care....

Academy award for best foreign film, Pelle the Conqueror is about the matching habits of survival adopted by a boy, Pelle, who is sturdy and resourceful, and his entirely lovable but weak and elderly father (played by Max von Sydow). Emerging from the fears and illusions of childhood, Pelle begins to see his father objectively, as an ineffectual fantasist. Yet he sees him clearly, without any loss of love—he understands that his father has the right merely to survive. Von Sydow has an elemental physical presence—all crinkled face and a voice with more crevasses than a shelf of hardened volcanic lava. (In Danish and Swedish with English subtitles.)

Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center profiled

by Suzie Mazzullo

The Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center, located in what used to be the old boiler plant, opened in January after more than a year of remodeling.

Marsha L. Fritz, of Chesapeake Associated Architects, Inc., designed the plan which would transform the boiler plant into the Arts Center. It preserved the exterior of the building and transformed the interior into classrooms, studios, and a gallery. Fritz worked with the Art Department and the administration for almost five years to come up with a suitable plan, which divided the boiler plant into two floors. The ground floor consists of the painting, drawing, and design studios, as well as a gallery, which alternates as a classroom. The lower level contains the sculpture and printmaking studios, a darkroom for photography, and kilns for pottery.

A new arts center was needed because of the limited quarters of the original studios at McAlpin House. The new center's increased classroom space allows art majors and non-art majors to take art courses.

Art major Vicco von Voss, who played an active role in refurbishing some of the equipment which was moved from the old to the new building, is enthusiastic about the new arts center: "I think this building is just great. There's a lot more space to work in. This will let more students take art classes, even if they aren't art majors. As an art major, in the past I've been in classes with the same small group. Now a lot more students will be able to take just one course, to learn the basics."

"Constance Stuart Larrabee: WW II Photo Journal" will be the first exhibit to hang on the new gallery walls. Reviewing these exceptional photographs in the Washington Post, Hank Buchard wrote, "The World War II photographs of Constance Stuart Larrabee remind us of what happens to people when men make war. Some female correspondents fought to win respect by out-drinking and out-toughing the men, and some succeeded. Larrabee did not play the men's game, she just took pictures. Among them are powerful shots of boys playing at war and men dying in it, but the most poignant of her scenes are of people getting used to being free again, rebuilding their communities while the guns are still thundering, or paying the price for fraternizing with the enemy."

Her association with the College has lasted nearly forty years. In 1982, her Eastern Shore photographs, "Celebration on the Chesapeake," were exhibited at Washington College in honor of the College's bicentennial anniversary. That same year, she founded the Washington College Friends of the Arts, an organization which supports the arts at WC.

In 1986, the College awarded her the honorary degree of Doctor of Arts; she is one of the few American photographers who have been so honored.

The dedication of the Arts Center will be held on Saturday, April 7, at 1 PM. After the ribbon cutting, there will be a tour of the Center followed by a reception. Present at the dedication will be: Dr. Anne-Imelda Radice, Chief of the Division of Creative Arts for the US Information Agency; Jane

Constance Stuart Larrabee has been widely recognized as a gifted photographer. She has often contributed her time and energy to Washington College students as well as monetary support in times of need. For this Larrabee was honored last May by the Washington College Alumni Association. In a testimonial it was written, "Daughter of our Alma Mater - Mistress of Celluloid, Mother of the Kent County Norwich Terrier - Sister of AOπ, Friend & Teacher to generations of Washington College Students....we, your fellow alumni, wish to salute you as a faithful alumna, both honorary & honored."

Washington College Basketball one of "final four"

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The Washington College men's basketball team completed their Division III version of "March Madness" last weekend in Springfield, Ohio. The Shoremen finished a profitable NCAA postseason that included the program's first ever trip to the Final Four and a third place finish in Division III basketball.

The team's brilliant season has received a great deal of attention and brought an outpouring of support from both the townspeople and the administration. The Eastern Regional finals, held March 9-10 at the Cain Athletic Center, was extremely well attended by the people of Chestertown as well as a good number of college students who stayed around at the beginning of Spring Break. The team's accomplishments were recognized this past Tuesday in a reception held in Hynson Lounge. President Cater was among the people in attendance, and he spoke of pride in Washington College athletics.

Coach Tom Finnegan's team, led by a nucleus of five seniors, eclipsed all of the preseason predictions from Division III prognosticators. The team was picked to finish in the middle of their conference, but instead the Shoremen managed to capture the MAC-South championship with only one conference loss. "This year's team has lived up to their potential more than any other team I've coached here," coach Finnegan said in one of his many recent interviews with area newspapers.

The team's storybook season and postseason began during fall semester, when the Shoremen captured the Wild Goose Classic. Washington College then dominated play in the MAC and won the conference title. The Shoremen lost to Franklin & Marshall in the finals of the MAC playoffs and were awarded an NCAA bid.

The playoff games were thrilling, with the team's first three games being decided by a total of six points. They opened the tournament with a home game against King's College, and the game seesawed back and forth for the full forty minutes. The Shoremen advanced to the sweet 16 when Charles Duckett buried two free throws with eight seconds left for a two point win.

The regional semifinals and finals were scheduled in Chestertown for the weekend of March 9-10, and the town turnout was wonderful. Washington College was joined by Stockton State, Johns Hopkins and Western Connecticut State in the regional, and the Shoremen faced Stock-

Basketball's benefits

The role of sports in society is often taken for granted. For some reason, sports have always been able to bring people together and take their minds off the troubles of the real world for a little while. This explains the love and affection that many people, myself included, feel for the sporting world.

For this reason, the success of the Washington College basketball program cannot be appreciated enough. The team's storybook run in the NCAA tournament unified the school and the town during a year when student-town relations have been substantially less than rosy. Everywhere you went for about three weeks, Shoremen basketball was being discussed. Townspeople were constantly asking questions about the happenings at Cain Gymnasium. Do we have enough muscle inside to keep on winning? How can we win so many close games? What's with that student who wears the basketball on his head? The townspeople were entertained by the play and the success of the Shoremen, and the school really benefitted from the town's wholehearted support of the team. That is the way that things should be in relations between a college and the town it inhabits.

The team's success also brought a temporary end to cries of student apathy and a lack of student pride. Students from all social classes showed up en masse for the Shoremen's game against King's College. Between the comraderie at the basketball game and the huge turnout at the SGA reggae band, that is easily the most unified I've seen this campus in a long time. In addition, an amazing number of students stayed around to cheer the Shoremen on in the regionals at the beginning of spring break.

In reality, it was easy to care about this team because of their togetherness and the personalities of the players. Where else could you have a hulking center affectionately called Bull? Tim Keehan was an all-American who would usually be compared to the Holy Father in signs seen at games. The team had starting guards named Squirrel and Tank. Squirrel made up shots while in midair, but they still managed to fall. Tank was the self-proclaimed chauffeur of the WC Cadillac. The other senior was known by initials only and could bury jumpers from Fargo, North Dakota. Underclassmen like Liddy, Vican and Basel help make up a group of players who will be in the program for years.

I hope that the success of the basketball team will also lead both students and townspeople to broaden their horizons and fully realize the strength of the Washington College athletic program. Men's lacrosse is brilliant every year and has earned their huge following, but a lot of other programs have excelled in recent years and deserve support.

Men's and women's tennis are among the top ten programs in Division III tennis. The volleyball team put on a remarkable display this past fall. The swim team nearly went undefeated and sent a swimmer to the national championships. Baseball has made a huge turnaround and could finish at the top of the MAC. In short, I'm saying that every program here is a solid one and deserves support from both students and townspeople. Hopefully, this will be another result of the basketball team's cinderella story.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Cater criticizes WC b-ball fans

To the Editor:

As we celebrate the triumph of Washington College's basketball victories this year, it saddens me to request that you publish the attached letter from an Eastern Shore neighbor in Suddlersville who, with his family, attended the Kings College basketball game on March 3rd. I was present at the game but did not hear the chants that he describes.

I will be requesting the Student Government Association, the Office of Student Affairs, and the Alumni Council to consider ways by which a genuine sporting spirit can be established at Washington College events. It brings discredit to the College when students or visitors shout offensive language. I was offended when the cheerleading team from Kings College was roundly booed by our more zealous fans. Surely we can root for the home team without abandoning good manners.

Sincerely yours,
Douglass Cater

Dear Mr. President:

On March 3, 1990, my wife, children, and I attended the Maryland-Virginia Basketball game at College Park, MD. It was a great sporting event.

On the way home, it was voiced that there was a basketball game at Washington College this same evening, they were to play Kings College from Pennsylvania. We decided to attend.

This was a great sporting event also, but my family and I will not be attending any more sporting events of any kind at Washington College. My wife, children, and I don't need to hear "You suck", "You suck" chanted in our faces and ears by the College's "rooting' section.

Furthermore, I observed several youngsters, probably ten to twelve year olds, looking over to that section and shouting the same thing in unison with them! They were sitting right in front of us.

I, as a responsible man and citizen of this area have done my part, I've informed you. Now you, as a responsible man and president of Washington College must do your part.

I would be interested to know what steps you will take to preclude this type of vulgarity from taking place in a public building where women and children are present.

My apology for not knowing your name at this time.

Yours truly,
Name witheld

LSAT course info

The Stanley H. Kaplan Educational Center's preparatory course for the Law School Admission Test will be offered to college students and the public. The course, which will be given in April and early May, 1990, will be held on Wednesday evenings and Saturdays at Washington College. Students should contact Dr. Linda Cades in the Career Development Office, ext. 311

The Law School Admission Test, or LSAT, is required for admission to almost all law schools in the United States. Scores on this test are weighed very heavily in law school admissions decisions.

The 9-session Stanley Kaplan LSAT prep course includes extensive study material and other resources based on the most recent version of the LSAT, the standard law school entrance examination. The cost of the course is $695.00. Scholarships are available on a case by case basis.

ISSUE: What facilities would you like to see included in the renovated Student Center?

Center must offer choices in food and furnishings

Sharon Bonner

The proposed renovations to combine the Coffee House and the Snack Bar into a larger, more fully equipped student center sounds like an exciting idea! This new student center can be constructed into a place where we want to be, not a place we go to only because we're starving and choices are limited with in Chestertown. It will be a larger place for all of us to get together away from the dorms, away from the library, to a place to relax and relieve that stress. Sometimes going to Miss D's or the Coffee House just doesn't do it, which means there's a definite need for improvement in both places.

The quality of food and service at the Snack Bar is definitely lacking. The service is slow and the absence of respect is clearly indicated by the staff's rude treatment of the customers, who are mostly students.

The Snack Bar closes at 11 PM. So where do those of us who get the munchies after hours go? The Coffee House, as the next option, offers choices such as: pizza (which is not served after 11:00 anyway), microwave popcorn (which has been out of stock for the past three weeks), hard pretzels (also out of stock) and nachos and cheese (which you can usually count on). What happens when they run out of nachos and cheese?

Another part of the renovations plan is the plan for the Bookstore to move to the Academic Resourse Center and for that space to be renovated to a student lounge, an excellent idea. The lounge could be furnished with comfortable chairs and sofas and also could provide a radio and a TV in a separate room for people who just want to relax. The lounge would be the perfect alternative to Bill Smith or the Library as a place for studying.

No one seems to want to go to the Coffee House unless we have a dance on a Friday night and/or there will be alchohol there. In an effort to change this present situation with our new student center, to begin with, we could designate a new name for the Coffee House, a name that draws attention and enthusiasm. A new name brings with it a new beginning and new impressions.

In creating these new impressions of the student center, changing the menu might also be very effective. There could be several different kinds of food offered to suit several different needs; for example, dinner offered at the student center as an alternative to a disappointing dining service meal, nutritious food, late night snack food, and a selection of cakes, cookies, etc.

Along with renovations comes the need for change in programs offered presently at the Coffee House. If more interesting, fun, and exciting events are held in the new student center than people will have a better impression and want to spend time there. The last talent show is a good example of a successful event that seemed to attract a good number of people.

I was talking to a senior a few weeks ago in the Coffee House and he was telling me that in his freshman year, the Coffee House was always crowded on weeknights and that it was the thing to do—to get your work done by 10 PM and go to the C-house. An incentive to finish our work—that's something I think we all need. Wouldn't it be surprising to walk into a place on campus and find alot of different groups of people just hanging out together? Why couldn't our new student center be like that? If we can form a committee to toss around and add ideas to the renovation plans, we can create a more appealing place in the student center.

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

Andrew Price

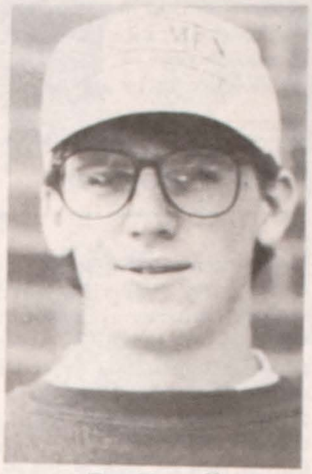
I'd like to see them put in a new snack bar, arcade, movie theater, bowling alleys, indoor tennis courts, TV room, and anything else if possible.



Dan Russell
Severna Park, MD
Freshman

It would be nice to have a large open area where bands can play. A few TVs with VCRs would be nice also.

Alison K. Auber
Springfield, VA
Senior

Perhaps a larger stage and dance floor would be appropriate. Otherwise, I'm quite satisfied with the accomodations.

I think it would be very important to include a 24-hour study area with computers where students could go for late night studying.

I would like to see a real student-faculty lounge for the new year.

Renovations could eradicate present problems in Student Center

Kim Coburn

The renovations for Miss D's and the Coffee House look promising. Will more people take advantage of the Coffee House? Probably not for a while. Renovations include combining Miss D's and the Coffee House, as well as making the Bookstore area into a student lounge. Impressive? Well, let's just say it's an improvement.

As it is now, the Coffee House doesn't see much business come its way. In a lot of respects, it's a depressing atmosphere. Basically, it's a dark, dingy cave. You could call it uninviting. Not many people venture into the Coffee House. Every night at 11:00, my friends and I wander over for a break. There are people there...the same people every night. Once the five or six of us arrive, there are about twelve people at the Coffee House. You see, one doesn't just happen upon the Coffee House...you plan ahead to go there.

Once you're at the exciting, energetic Coffee House, you have a slim selection of munchies (and most likely, they will be out of stock). The week before spring break, they were out of popcorn and pretzels: the two inexpensive munchies the Coffee House offers. Of course, you can get Pepsi OR Coke there—Freedom of Choice!

With the new renovations, the Coffee House should offer more selections (in all respects). They have ping pong and pool, but there's just something missing. I guess that would be people. But the Coffee House isn't prepared for many people. It already takes a while to get a soda. There should be two people behind the counter; it gets too confusing with just one person to help all twelve customers...service is kind of slow.

The issue of slow service leads me into Miss D's. Overall, Miss D's works, and pretty effeciently, too, but it has that same dingy, grimy feeling of the Coffee House. But if you're hungry, you can't beat Miss D's prices.

What, you miss mom? Well, then, Miss D has that special way of reminding you that you're a measly college student and you'll follow her rules while you're under her roof (see "Rules to live by at Miss D's"). The snack bar is great...people are there, you get service, it's inexpensive, and they're never out of stock, but aesthetically, it needs lots of improvement.

The proposed floor plan combines the Coffee House and Miss D's, making the ordering counter more convenient and allowing more dance room for the Coffee House events (that is, if anybody shows up for them). But, more than that, with the amount of business that Miss D's brings in, maybe the Coffee House would pick up some, too—more people coming in to relax rather than get their food and run.

The bookstore is being moved to the Academic Resources Center, and in that area, there will be a student lounge/center. This will be an essential common ground for the students if they take advantage of it.

PERSPECTIVES

Let's move 'em out and shoot 'em up

Laura Hopper

It must be something in the air. Or maybe it's just the season for strikes. Every so often, a strange malaise sets in across the country, and then people just feel like not doing what they should be.

Take, for example, the recently ended baseball lockout. While owners and players squabbled, we, the loyal fans, were forced to cancel our plans for a quick vacation in Arizona (Florida for all you Oriel fans). Now, by mid-March, I'm sick of winter, and by association, winter sports. Football, basketball, hockey, ice skating, they all have lost their luster by March. What better sign of spring could there be than the ne'er make the Series Cubbies packing their duffels and heading for the sunny southland. No, sports fans, you'll have to agree with me, there's nothing like spring training, until football camp opens up in August.

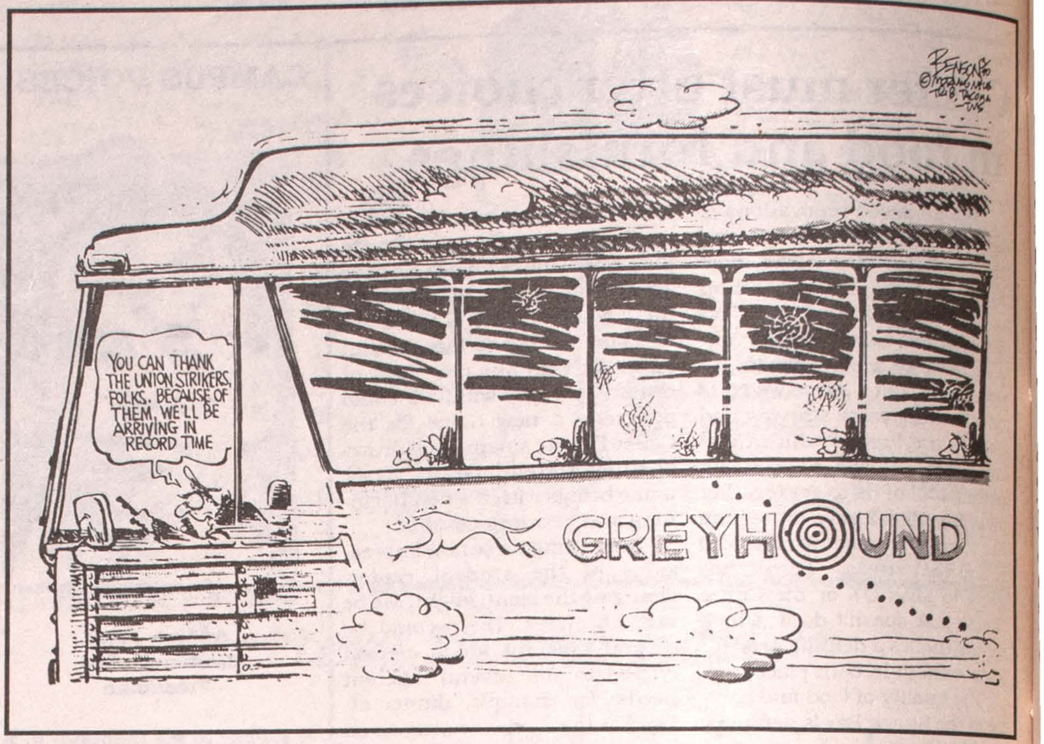
But the baseball lockout seems laughable next to the "Move 'em out and Shoot 'em up" Greyhound bus strike. My goodness, seems like the good old days of scabs, and striking miners being shot down by management-hired security guards, and occasionally, the army. (Good old days is meant sarcastically.) Isn't this one of the very reasons the Federal government got involved in labor relations to begin with? I am referring to the most recent incident of violence in the Greyhound bud strike, when the windows of a bus were shot out by a striking worker. And yes, there were people on that bus.

Many people take the Greyhound because the plane and train are rather pricey and yes, they would rather leave the driving to Greyhound. But one wonders...I'm sure all the passengers on that bus got right off and headed for their travel agents, to ask for more.

Violence by or against striking workers isn't going to help either party involved. When a striking employee shoots out the windows on a bus full of passengers, he has not advanced his cause in the eyes of the American people; and when a striking employee is crushed by a vengeful bus, well, the company doesn't gain any brownie points either. If there is what could be called an anti-union movement in this country, it gained credibility from that one strikers actions.

Let us, before we tell the world how civilized we are, practice what we preach so well. Legitimate demands and grievances deserved to be heard and handled by an arbitrator, not solved by firing a gun or stepping on an a gas pedal. We should be far to civilized and yes, grown up, to handle our differences and problems that way.

Now, I'm off to my travel agent. I've heard Greyhound has a special on tickets to Arizona.



YOU CAN THANK THE UNION STRIKERS, FOLKS. BECAUSE OF THEM, WE'LL BE ARRIVING IN RECORD TIME

These are strange times we live in. The Germanies seem to be rushing headlong towards reunification. The Warsaw Pact is becoming the Welfare Pact, and the Soviet Union is on the verge, of something.

Perhaps the most interesting development is a sudden global concern for the environment. Groups like Greenpeace and Sea Shepherd have been around for many, many moons, but now, corporations are jumping onto the bandwagon. Downy, the fabric softener, now comes in a super concentrated formula that you add water to. It is packaged in a cardboard carton about the size of a half pint of cream. Won't that make the landfill people happy.

Yes, maybe the modern, industrialized world is facing the fact that we highly advanced apes do seem to produce a lot of garbage. And the third world isn't putting up with our trash anymore. Remember how Mexico turned away that garbage barge from New York saying in effect, we won't be your garbage dump anymore. And who could forget the famous garbage train which wound its lonely way through the south this summer, becoming a regular feature on the network news and quite a tourist attraction until it returned to its creator, Baltimore.

Ah, but not everyone seems to be catching onto this trend of conserving and saving the world we live in. The Brazilians are still destroying the rain forest and the Japanese seem to have developed a taste for shark fin soup.

Now when the word shark is mentioned, the image that pops into mind is that of Bruce, the mechanical great white from Jaws. Sharks have never been high on my list of favorite fish. They have none of the charm of goldfish, angel fish, or guppies. Let's face it, sharks are frightening reminders of the days when the dinosaurs ambled merrily across the continents, and, on the silver screen, sharks have shown a decided liking for drumsticks of the human variety.

Sharks have been considered mans only serious enemy. And they did not seem to be in the least threatened by extinction. I guess the Japanese are changing all that. Their passion for shark fin soup has driven the price of fins sky high, and dangerously decreased the numbers of sharks. Sharks aren't like other fish. They don't have thousands of offspring each year. They reproduce maybe every other year at the most. Sharks have not, as yet, been bred successfully in captivity. (It would be a brave person indeed, who tried to breed a great white) And at the rate the Japanese are sipping their shark fin soup, our only predator might not make it. Sports fishermen are on the side of the shark. They would lost their trophies, should the shark become extinct. And for the shark, I must admit, it is very degrading to be caught on a hook or in a net, and then to just have your fins cut off.

Times are changing. People are starting to recognize that sharks, like baby harp seals, elephants and rhinoceroses have the right to live on this planet as well, and that they are in as much danger. A shark will never look cute or cuddly, or even friendly, but still, support your local shark. It needs you.

News from around the world: FAA seeks airport tax

UNITED STATES:

The Federal Aviation Administration is seeking new consumption taxes to help pay for airport modernization and improvements in air traffic control. The new taxes would amount to a $3 charge to board an airplane at an airport, and a $3 charge to change planes. These would be added to the ticket price and collected by the airlines. The airlines are protesting claiming the new taxes will place an additional administrative burden on them.

Defense Secretary Cheney denied that President Bush wants deeper cuts in defense spending. The Secretary said the president wants to pursue high-tech weapons in space. Critics of the so-called Star Wars defense plan say the cost would be too high, while supporters claim that while the Cold War may be ending, the threat of Soviet missiles is still present as is the possibility of an accidental launch.

As the first anniversary of the Exxon Valdez oil spill approaches, a spokesman for Exxon Shipping Company said the tanker will be returning to service this summer. Last July, the tanker was towed from Alaska to San Diego with a 680 foot by 80 foot hole in her 987 foot hull. The Exxon Valdez is the youngest tanker in Exxon's fleet. The oil spill last spring, and the recent spill off California have increased support in Congress for double hulled tankers

A firebomb explosion at a Drug Enforcement Agency office in Fort Myers, Florida early Saturday morning caused an estimated $4 million in damage. DEA officials say the explosion was possibly the work of local drug traffickers. A team of agents from the DEA, FBI, Lee County Sheriff's office, and the Department of Tobacco, Alcohol, and Firearms are investigating the bombing.

Torrential rains last week in Florida, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi caused flooding forcing people out of their homes. In Elba, Alabama a levee along the Pea River burst flooding the town. The National Weather Service reports that in some areas the flooding is the worst it has been in 60 years.

Last Saturday, at least 125 gallons of the chemical Cumene were spilled into the Delaware River. The Cumene, a common ingredient in nail polish, was being unloaded from a Norwegian tanker, the Jo Rogn, when the spill occurred. Cumene is hazardous if ingested, inhaled, or absorbed through the skin in large quantities. It is also a fire hazard. Both Route 95 and the Betsy Ross Bridge were closed temporarily closed due to the spill.

SOVIET UNION:

The Lithuanian parliament declared its independence from the Soviet Union. Mikhail Gorbachev has given the new government of Lithuania three days to retract their declaration. A Lithuanian speaker in the Supreme Soviet was heckled. The Soviet Air Force has been dropping pamphlets on the capital city of Vilnius, while Armored Personnel Carriers were moved to block border crossings. In Latvia, the pro-independence movement won a majority of the seats in parliament, but not the two thirds needed to declare independence from the Soviet Union. Estonians have not held parliamentary elections yet.

EAST GERMANY:

In the first free parliamentary elections in East Germany since the end of the war, the Christian Democratic Party, allied with West German chancellor Helmut Kohl. One of the new government's prime objectives will be reunification with West Germany. There is a clause in the West German constitution that allows local states in East Germany to be absorbed into West Germany. But the parliament will have to create regional governments that can then deal directly with Bonn. The Communists abolished the five state governments in East Germany. The Democratic Socialists, the second largest party in East Germany, call this annexation or anschluss, the same term used when the Nazi government took over Austria.

LIBYA:

A Libyan diplomat in Italy disclosed that the fire at a chemical plant in Libya was started by one of the employees of the plant. Many workers have been arrested, and the diplomat stated that the guilty worker would be executed on the spot where the fire broke out. The Libyan government had accused West Germany of setting the fire. The US government maintains that the plant produces chemical weapons.

12 ways students can make the environment cleaner

by Juli Michael

1. Use The Recycling Bins– Recycled aluminum requires 95% less energy than producing it from bauxite, and each recycled can saves the equivalent of half a can of gasoline. For every ton of recycled crushed glass used in the manufacturing process, some 1.2 tons of raw materials are saved. Recycled glass requires 50% less water and reduces air pollution by 20%. Each year our nation uses 67 million tons of paper or 580 pounds per person. Newspaper, paperboard, cardboard and other types of paper make up 40% of garbage in the US. Logging tropical rain forest for paper pulp has helped contribute to the destruction of 95 acres of these forests every minute.

2. Be Wild and Crazy– Run or Ride Your Bike Instead of Using Your Car–

Acid rain is the result of our massive burning of natural non-renewable fossil fuels.

The fish are dead in 140 lakes in Ontario, Canada. 1800 of Sweden's fresh water lakes are almost totally lifeless. 55% of the Netherland's forests are dying. On the local level– Rockfish in the Chesapeake Bay have been greatly decimated due to the high pH levels which interfere with the fish's reproduction.

3. Drink Budweiser–This company, Anheuser-Busch, donates money to the Chesapeake Bay Foundation.

4. Drink From a Cup With Character- Bring your favorite cup to Miss D's, the coffeehouse, parties, the Vern, Newts, etc. Boycott the use of disposable plastic and styrofoam cups.

Try to think about where all these disposables go when you are through with them. Since THEY ARE NOT BIODEGRADABLE THEY NEVER GO AWAY. 10 to 30% of styrofoam produced in the US is made with ozone depleting chloroflourocarbons.

5. Put Your Butt Where it Belongs– If you smoke, pinch your cigarette butt so the tobacco falls on the ground (Not the floor!) and put the filter in the trash. Studies have shown that one used cigarette butt is so toxic, that if swallowed, it could kill a small child.

6. Get Together With Your Friends– If you must use your car, then carpool to school, the grocery store, bars, parties, etc. Automobiles are responsible for 30% of the nations carbon dioxide emissions, a major cause of acid rain and the greenhouse effect.

7. Save Energy– If you are off campus, (one-third of use are!) save energy in your house by turning down the heat a few degrees and turning off the lights when you leave the room.

Rental housing poses a serious problem. Since tenants usually pay oil, gas and electric bills, landlords have little incentive to reduce their tenants costs i.e. by insulating the house better to lower bills. So if you are renting, try to do what you can to lower the energy bills.

If every household in the US lowered its average heating temperature six degrees for just 24 hours, this could save more than 570,000 barrels of oil!

8. Keep It Clean– When you do your laundry, make sure you are using biodegradable soap. Most of them are but there are some which are not. Here is a list of NONBIODEGRADABLE detergents: Yes liquid, Gain powder, Fresh Start (This one is actually highly toxic), Purex liquid, Fab 1 shots, Fab powder, Econobuy liquid and powder.

Some good laundry detergents are: Ivory Snow, Arm&Hammer, Tide, Ajax, and Surf.

Avoid using chlorine bleach or detergents containing bleach, they directly poison the environment.

9. Keep Animal Products Out of Your Hair– Most shampoos use animals in their products. They are used in the form of hydrolyzed protein, urea, placenta, etc. Try to use shampoos and conditioners which do not contain animal products. Here is a list of some good ones: Aussie Moist (All Redmond products, Pert, Prell, Ivory, Vidal Sasson, Head n' Shoulders, Freeman products, Mill Creek, Tom's of Maine, Wella Balsam, Johnson's Baby Shampoo, and Nature's Gate (This is a great product– you can find it in any health food store.)

10. Shave in Style– don't use disposable razors, they are a waste. Buy yourself a razor for a few bucks, or use a rechargeable.

11. Clean Your Plate– when you eat a meal, do not let your eyes be bigger than your stomach. It is much better to take small portions and go back for more if you are still hungry. Wasting food directly damages the environment by causing the destruction of forests and natural environments for the creation of agricultural and grazing lands. AT THE PRESENT RATE OF DEFORESTATION, NOT A SINGLE TREE WILL BE STANDING IN THE US IN 50 YEARS.

12. Be Active, Not Apathetic– There is a general mind-trap in which people think, "Someone knows what to do and is in control." Sorry, but this is a myth. Chances are "They" are not in control and "They" are not doing it. People also tend to think, "Even if I do my share nobody else will, so why bother?" Doing your share will set an example for others. It is also a self-fulfilling prophecy– doing your part feels a lot better than not doing your part. Another important thing to remember is, don't tell someone to do something if you are not doing it yourself.

We all must take responsibility for keeping our campus environmentally sound. The lure to do otherwise is strong. So avoid mind-traps and be conscious!

If you are interested in joining the Earthday Committee, there will be a meeting at my house, 100 W. Campus Ave. right across the school lawn, next to the Alumni House. The meeting will be at 7:30 on Wednesday the 28th. We are planning some fun events and we could really use more input and support. If you have any ideas or questions and can't make the meeting, give me a call at 778-4110. Furthermore, this Tuesday, March 27, Senator Timothy Wirth from Colorado will speak in Hynson Lounge at 8:00 on environmental issues.

Slice looks at the '89-'90 basketball season

Phil "Slice" Macek

As the din of cheers echo off the Cain Athletic Center's walls and the curtain is drawn on yet another season here at Washington College, I would like to take a look back at the people who truly make the games enjoyable– the fans, especially a small group of dedicated basketball "aficionados" who will say anything to keep opponents off their game.

According to some people (and it depends on who you talk to) these particular fans are nothing more than raunchy, immature collegians, who toss around verbal insults and bird calls like they toss around cans of beer before the game. Such students want nothing more than to undermine the true spirit of competition that the game on the court represents.

The misguided souls having such warped and twisted perceptions of these students are the ones that should be banned from the games. What good is a cheering section sitting straight-up, looking stiff and uncomfortable and never uttering a single sound during the game? But I digress.

Now as a reporter, it is my duty to remain neutral, and I will try the best I can to play the part– but it will be hard.

For the most part, these students are fun. One can always count on this notorious group of fans to ease the tension that a controversial call delivers. However, some people's antics of rampant idiocy do tend to border on the realm of the unacceptable.

Some students, during a tense moment, like to verbally attack the referee. Many times, when a questionable call has been made, the students usually suggest that the referee do something that is anatomically impossible. Others make reference to the ref's wife and kids, while the boldest members of the "peanut gallery" put the ref in a compromising position with the opposing teams' coach.

However, one should see that this behavior is used only in extreme emergencies, and that furthermore, no personal offense to the referee in question is intended.

Other students choose not to indulge in the fun of shouting obscenities at the zebras, and instead, use visual aids to lessen the pressure of a big game. A few fans have been known to make "Keehan is God" and "C.J.'s favorite activity rhymes with free-falling" signs, while constructively criticizing the cheerleaders by rating their performances on a scale of 1 to 10. It should be noted that the cheerleaders did a solid job all year long and received an overall average score of nine. Yet, in the view of this writer, the cheerleading squad should acquire a male member– just like Stockton State.

While it is true that these great fans are an invaluable addition to any home game, sometimes they do mange to step over the line of decency and good taste. Certain fans are practically booted from some games for going over to the other side of the gym and shouting "You Got Nothing" at the opposing team and their supporters. However, the quick wit and lightning fast reactions of the Cain center administrators keep such disgraceful displays of "doing Satan's work" in check.

In this humble writer's view, this infamous group of student-fans are nothing more than cheerleaders that sit down while still trying to raise crowd noise to a fevered pitch. They would stand on the floor, but they never practice their routines, and they would look truly hideous in those short skirts.

Overall, the administrators and older fans should realize these students provide good quality entertainment for free, so they should not be so hasty in handing out reprimands to these zealous fans. After all, one man's obscenity is another man's poetry.

Basketball finishes season with fantastic journey

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The 1989-1990 men's basketball team earned a spot in the Washington College record books with a month-long chase for the NCAA tournament. The team captured the Eastern Regional Championship, became the first WC team to make the Final Four, and finished third in the nation. The team ended the season with a 25-6 record they earned with a heart-stopping brand of basketball. The Shoremen became a Division III version of the Cardiac Kids, possessing the amazing ability to pull a win out of the clutches of defeat. The team utilized this style throughout the NCAA tournament, winning close game after close game as they made their way to the Final Four.

After a first-round bye, the team faced their initial test against King's College. This was easily one of the most emotional games the Cain Athletic Center had ever laid eyes on, and both teams played at a feverish pitch. The score remained close for the full forty minutes, and the tension continued to build. The game was tied with eight seconds left when point guard Charles Duckett was fouled and sent to the line to shoot a one-and-one. The King's College coach called time out in an attempt to ice Duckett, but Tank stepped to the line and coolly sank both free throws to give the WAC a two point lead. King's was unable to convert on the other end, and the Shoremen slipped into the sweet 16.

Cain Athletic Center was chosen as the site for the Eastern Regionals, giving WC a home court advantage that would prove helpful. Stockton State, Johns Hopkins and Western Connecticut State were the other three schools left for the regionals, and the Shoremen drew Stockton State as their opponent in the round of 16.

The Shoremen jumped on Stockton immediately, and with four minutes gone the WAC already led 12-2. WC maintained their torrid outside shooting throughout the first half to go into intermission with an 11 point lead. The team connected on eight three pointers in the first half alone. Tank buried four tres, while Keehan nailed three of his own. Duckett led the scoring with 14 points in the first half, and Stockton found themselves praying that the WAC would stop their long-range bombing.

The second half showed that some prayers are indeed answered. Chris Brandt sank the team's only three pointer of the second half, and Stockton gradually made their way back into the game. Stockton State cut the lead to five with ten minutes remaining and tied the score at 69 with 8:45 to play. Fortunately, Squirrel had shouldered the load in the second half. Brandt scored five of his 21 second half points to start a Shoremen run. Chris Jamke slammed one home on a breakaway to give the WAC a nine point lead with 5:00 left.

Things went downhill from there for the Shoremen. Jamke picked up his fifth foul with 3:00 left and a five point lead, but it was tied with a minute to go. WC missed their shot at the lead, but Tim Liddy was fouled while battling for an offensive board. He sank one of two free throws with 18 seconds left, giving the Shoremen a precarious 89-88 lead. Stockton pushed the ball upcourt, but their point guard was short on a jumper from 15 feet. The Shoremen were led by Brandt's 27 points on 9-13 shooting. Duckett and Jamke added 16 and 14 respectively, and Liddy contributed 14 in what was possibly his best game at WC. The WAC took the one-point win and advanced to the regional finals against a tough Western Connecticut State team.

As if Shoremen fans didn't have enough ulcers from the previous two games, this game was going to test the nerves of everyone in attendance. The Shoremen suffered serious foul trouble in the first half as three of their starters had to sit with two fouls. WCS held the lead throughout most of the first half, and they went to the locker room up by six.

They continued their run early in the second half and increased their lead to nine, but Brandt took control once again He helped the Shoremen cut the WCS lead to 1 with 5 straight points. WCS then benefitted from a technical on Bull and a five-point play to expand their lead. The WAC battled back, and Keehan's three with 8:30 left tied the score. The lead continued to change hands as time ran down, and WCS was up by two with less than a minute left when Squirrel stepped to the line. He hit both ends of a one-and-one to tie it at 90, and both teams survived a frantic final minute to move to overtime.

The Shoremen never trailed in the extra stanza, scoring the first four points. The team missed only two shots in overtime and led by as much as seven points. Still, WC was never able to put WCS away, and they only trailed by three when Bull missed a one-and-one with six seconds left. Their desperation three pointer missed, and Cain Athletic Center went completely insane. WC won 107-104, and they were led by a 37 point effort from Brandt. His 37 points included a perfect 16-16 from the line. Jamke added 22 and Tank threw in 16 for the WAC.

The victory moved the Shoremen into the Final Four at Wittenburg University in Springfield, Ohio. The team, traveling with a loyal following of Shoremen supporters, met University of Rochester in the semifinals. This is where the hopes of a national championship in Chestertown drew to a close. Rochester's towering center Chris Fite scored 25 points and 10 rebounds, and the Shoremen were outrebounded 53-37 in the game. The WAC shot only 35% for the game, resulting in an 86-70 defeat. The Shoremen were led by Keehan with 19 points and Brandt with 18. Bull fouled out of the game with only eight points, a victim of Rochester's bigger bodies. WC was destined to meet Calvin University in the consolation game.

The Shoremen were sure to end their season in typical WC fashion - winning a game that went down to the wire. The WAC trailed by as many as 17 in the second half, then outscored Calvin 22-5 to tie the score at 57. The Shoremen took the lead for a period of time, but then Calvin regained the lead with a minute remaining. Chris Brandt missed his opportunity to take the lead with ten seconds left, and the Shoremen seemed destined for a one-point defeat. Tank Duckett came through and stole the ball to give the WAC another chance. Brandt made good this time, nailing a 2 foot jumper in the lane with 2 seconds left to give the victory to WC.

Brandt continued his torrid playoff pace, scoring 34 points in the game. Keehan added 24 of his own, while Bull scored 12 points and hauled down 12 rebounds.

The consolation victory was the perfect ending to a nearly perfect postseason for the Washington College Shoremen. They finished the season at 25-6 and left the 5 departing seniors with enough memories to last a lifetime. The fans were also left with a collection of memories of their own. Next year's team will have a tough act to follow, but right now the team can bask in the glory of a picture-perfect postseason.

Tennis dominates spring trip

by Fred Wyman

When the Shoremen tennis team departed for South Carolina for their spring trip, their doubles play was the team's biggest question mark. However, it turned out that it was the doubles play that enabled WC to win 7 of their 8 matches over their spring trip.

In Washington College's two 5-4 triumphs over 18th ranked Kenyon and Division II UNC-Greensboro, it was the #1 and #2 doubles teams that secured the victories for Washington. Both matches were tied at 3-3 after singles, but in each instance the #1 doubles team of Larry Gewer and Scott Read put Washington College up 4-3 and the #2 team of Scott Shepherd and Peter Maller then proceeded to clinch the wins. Against Baptist and The Citadel, Gewer and Read sealed the Shoremen victory. In two of the team's other triumphs, all three doubles tandems won to start off the match as doubles was played first.

The Shoremen began their trip in a match against The Citadel, and they chalked up a 6-3 victory. They were led by singles victories from Read, Maller, Diaz and Bohutinsky. Their record then fell to 1-1 on the trip when Washington College dropped the match to NAIA powerhouse College of Charleston. Scott Read and Alberto Diaz were winners in their singles matches, and Diaz/Bohutinsky combined to win in doubles competition. The victories were still not enough to allow the Shoremen to defeat the #15 Cougars.

Washington College defeated Division I Baptist College as a result of singles victories from Gewer, Diaz, Shepherd and Bohutinsky. Once again, the #1 doubles tandem clinched the victory. The Shoremen managed to dodge a bullet against #18 Kenyon College. They took a 3-0 lead early in the singles matches on the strength of victories from Gewer, Read and Scott Shepherd. The victory from Shepherd was pivotal as he rallied to win from one set down to win the match. Shepherd also teamed with Peter Maller to clinch the WC victory. The duo was down a set, but they managed to rally and defeat Kenyon's #2 doubles tandem. This brought the team's record to 3-1.

Austin Peay and Nazareth were the next two teams to be thumped by the Shoremen Express. WC only lost once in these two matches and they were perfect in doubles competition. Maller won both of his singles matches in straight sets, including a 6-0,6-0 win against Nazareth. Maller only gave up one point in the second set of that match as Washington College overwhelmed both opponents. The Shoremen only lost five games in their singles competition against Nazareth.

Their next match was indoors against UNC-Greensboro. The Shoremen were down 3-2 in singles matches, but a three-set victory from Alberto Diaz evened the score. Read and Gewer won in impressive fasion in doubles, and Maller and Shepherd clinched the Washington College victory in straight sets. The Shoremen finished their 7-1 road trip with a 6-0 whitewashing of Averett College. Washington College did not lose a single set in their resounding victory over Averett.

The 7-1 record was the best ever registered by the Shoremen tennis team on a spring trip. Scott Read and Alberto Diaz both recorded 7-1 records in singles, and both only lost once in their doubles competition. Read raised his overall record to 23-6, while Diaz moved to 16-5. Larry Gewer maintained his #1 seed by going 5-2 on the trip. Overall, the team's performance solidified Washington College's ranking as one of the top schools in Division III tennis.

Women's tennis shows promise for spring

by Holly Bramble

Before women's tennis left for Hilton Head, coach Holly Bramble remembered thinking of the progress and success of the 1989 team. During that season, the team made their best showing ever in the MAC's and reached the finals of the MAC Invitational Tournament. The team was also ranked ninth in the eastern regional and boasted two all-Americans.

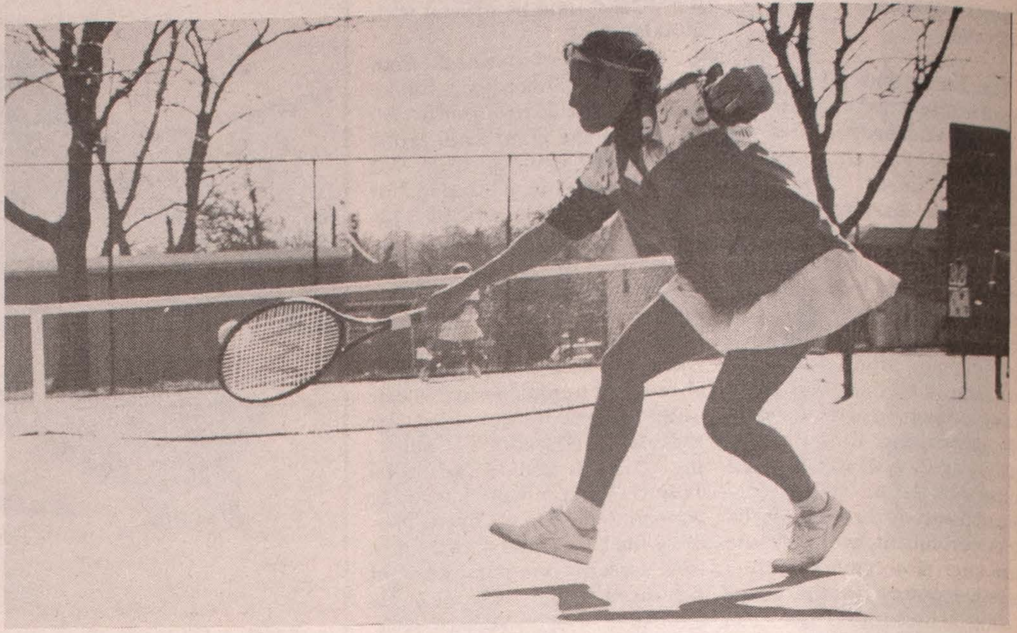
This year's schedule is extremely rigorous, with three of the top 10 Division III teams included among their matches. Still, they showed their potential during their trip over spring break. The women went 1-4 on their trip, improving from last year's 0-5 record. They played two Division I schools as well as some of the top Division III schools in the country, but they managed to play competitive tennis throughout their trip.

Tracy Peel continued to show why she is an all-American, winning all but two of her matches. One loss came against Division I opponent UNC-Wilmington in three sets, and she lost her other match when she was forced to retire from fatigue. Tracy remained undefeated this year in matches against Division III opponents, defeating top ranked players from Mary Washington and Kenyon College.

In addition, Tracy teamed with Monica Blanco to win all but one of their doubles matches. Peel and Blanco managed to defeat two top-ten teams. Their only loss came in a tough three set match against the University of Evansville. Meg Wheatley also managed three singles victories on the spring trip. The Shorewomen played competitive tennis throughout the trip and displayed their talent and their consistency.

The team returned from their spring trip to play a home match against Hope College, ranked sixth in the midwest region. The women put on an impressive display, playing solid tennis in every match. The Shorewomen were ahead 4-2 after the singles matches were completed behind victories from veterans Tracy Peel, Miriam Dittman, Meg Wheatley and Rachael Rice.

The rain arrived at this point, and Hope College agreed to play the doubles matches on the basketball tennis court. Peel and Blanco combined to take their doubles match in straight sets. The win clinched the women's victory over Hope. The other two doubles matches were extremely close and won by Hope College, but WC captured the match 5-4. With the victory over a 6th ranked team, the Shorewomen should be in line for a national ranking for sure.



Miriam Dittman returns a shot in a recent parctice as the women's tennis team prepares for their spring season to get in full swing.

Carroll sets personal bests at NCAA

by Greg Coss

When Kasey Carroll saw a swimmer finish the 1650 meter freestyle event with a time of 17:41 in the first heat of the event, she was very concerned. The time was eighteen seconds faster than Kasey's personal best. Times of 17:46 and 17:47 were also posted, and Kasey began to wonder if she would even finish in the top sixteen. "I said to Dennis (Berry) 'What's going on?' He just told me to relax, and that everyone there was posting personal bests, so I could do it too."

Certainly the NCAA Division III championships are reason enough to work your hardest, and Kasey certainly did. She swam the 1650 in 17:46, 13 seconds faster than her previous best. Coming into the event, she was seeded ninth and had doubts of maintaining this seeding. Kasey managed to erase all doubts with an 8th place finish and a lot of personal satisfaction. Later, Carroll finished 19th in the 400IM and recorded another personal best. She was predicted to finish 35th in the event.

Kasey's drastic drop in time was the most impressive part of her performance. "A girl I swam with in my heat went neck and neck with me the entire way," she said, "and it really helped me push myself even harder." Carroll said she gave little thought to where she'd place in the competition. "Of course I'd like to finish in the top eight, but whenever I think too much about what place I'll finish I get too nervous and I choke." The important part of Kasey's character as a swimmer is her ability to block out other swimmers, and simply concentrate on ways to improve herself.

So where does Kasey go after her booming successes at Williams College and her two national rankings? "I'll be training now and through this summer for the team I swim for in Sarasota, Florida," she answered. Kasey is only a sophomore and has aspirations of cracking the top five in the 1650 meter free next year. If she keeps up her hard work this should be a realistic goal, especially with the help of Coach Berry.

Coach Berry had a nice surprise for Kasey at the awards ceremony. "Dennis asked an old friend, who was in charge of the award ceremonies, if he could hand out the awards. When I saw Dennis in a suit and tie I was wondering what was going on. When I found out that Dennis would give me my award it was a great feeling." The two have an excellent rapport which makes it easier for Kasey to concentrate on her goals. It also will help Kasey to become a team leader in the next two years and an inspiration to her teammates. As a result, expect more big things from next year's team.

Lacrosse dominates opponents, wins St. Patrick's Day tourney

by Matt Giller

Last St. Patrick's Day weekend, while the basketball team was making history and millions of Irishmen took years off their livers, the Shoremen lax team impressively won two games against top 15 foe Springfield, 13-7, and # 4 ranked Nazareth College 12-8.

During the first two games Coach Corcoran was unable to clear his bench against lax powers Navy and Johns Hopkins, but last weekend he used almost the entire team. Depth, he feels, is one of their fortes and was well illustrated by the fact that nine different players contributed to the scoring over the weekend.

In the first round against Springfield the Shoremen (3-2) battled the elements to defeat a much improved Division III foe. Freshmen Jed Cronin led all WAC scorers with 3 goals and 2 assists while senior co-captain Tim Hormes followed with a hat trick and an assist. Also contributing in the scoring was Brian Johnson, Hank Miller, and Ben Lamana, each tallying 2 goals. Senior co-captain Bob Martino added a goal and an assist, and Dave Slomkowski came up big with 8 saves in goal.

On Sunday the rain went away but the wins kept coming, but this time it was against highly touted Nazareth from the north. Again the scoring was spread thin over the Shoremen team, with Hormes leading the way with a hat trick and 2 assists. Others that followed were Martino, Lamana, Miller, and junior Greg Rupert, each filling the nets with two of their own. Once again, Slomkowski was outstanding in between the pipes, making 12 saves and causing the Nazzes to fall to their first defeat.

Coach Corcoran felt that the keys to the weekend successes was a strong bench and outstanding fundamental play. By dominating ground balls and playing solid defense, the Shoremen did not allow a lead change. Corcoran was extremely pleased with the effort from the whole team. The earlier games against the two mighty Division I teams, he added, helped them prepare for the lesser foes. The head laxer was also impressed with the speed at which the team has developed their overall depth, which will definitely be a key if they hope to sustain their success.

Baseball's lockout was useless

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Hooray, hooray. The baseball strike/lockout has finally drawn to a close. This year's festivities were just as infuriating as those problems from previous years. The labor dispute between the owners and the players has been going on for long enough now, and work stoppages are now occurring as regularly as the Summer Olympics. Soon, instead of talking of past World Series, baseball fans will be able to reminisce about the great labor disputes in baseball history. I can just see it now. A grandfather is sitting with his grandson on his porch in Seymour, Indiana, telling him "I remember the great strike of '81. Things got so bad that we were actually crying for pro bowling to return to television."

What was accomplished this time around? Absolutely nothing. The management attempted to convince players receiving a 300% increase in pay that they needed a new salary structure. Not surprisingly, the players rejected the deal. The owners certainly didn't win the battle. The players wanted a year taken off of the arbitration deal, but instead agreed to an arrangement that only benefits about ten players a year. In conclusion, the battle of egos between Donald Fehr and Chuck O'Connor accomplished absolutely nothing and helped absolutely no one.

Once again, this was a case of the fans losing out because of a battle between millionaires and billionaires. This time, however, the fans seem to have less patience with the situation. I can say from personal experience that the mere sight of Donald Fehr whining into a microphone causes me to wretch violently and lunge for the remote control.

The fans' frustration was expected by owners and players, and they have every right to be upset. They are the ones who wind up suffering the consequences. It now costs $6.50 to get a hot dog at the Sky Dome in Toronto. I'm not that old, and I can remember the day when box seats behind home plate cost that much. I'm not suggesting a strike by the fans, since that would accomplish nothing. I merely suggest that the players and the owners would be wise to keep the fans in mind when negotiations drag on in the future. Management and the union should remember that fans are paying to see a game. If they wanted to see big business in action, they would go to Wall Street. Hot dogs don't cost $6.50 in there.

Innovative group performs Havel's "Protest"

Life of Czechoslovakia's prez kicks off Sophie Kerr Weekend

by Kelly L. Huber

As a part of Sophie Kerr Weekend, the Washington College English Department presents the Theater for the Twentieth Century performing "Protest," a play that has recently made headlines. What makes this play newsworthy is the fact that it was written by Czechoslovakian president Vaclav Havel before he was elected to office, when he was recognized as a dissident instead of a patriot.

"Protest" is essentially autobiographical in that it chronicles the time one man spends in prison for protesting his government. Havel himself had been imprisoned three times for the same reasons in 1977 and again in 1989. The time Havel has spent in prison adds up to about five years.

Havel's first play, "Garden Party" (1968), a surreal satire of communism, won him the praise of many critics who likened him to the late literary genius Samuel Beckett. Havel, who always considered himself as a follower of Beckett, was paid tribute by Beckett in 1984 with his play "Catastrophe,"which recounts the inquisition of a dissident.

In addition to absurd theater pieces, Havel has also written many stories and essays which have credited him as a political prophet. In his works he denounces and pokes fun at communism, but his main targets are usually his fellow citizens who accepted the status quo.

Some of Havel's other works include: "Largo Desolato," in which the hero is asked to change his name and state that he is not the author of his works in order to avert torture; "Temptation," in which Havel retells the Faust myth in terms of the distorted truths told by his compatriots; and the essay "The Power of the Powerless." Other works about his time in prison include "Technical Notes on My House-Arrest" and "Letters to Olga."

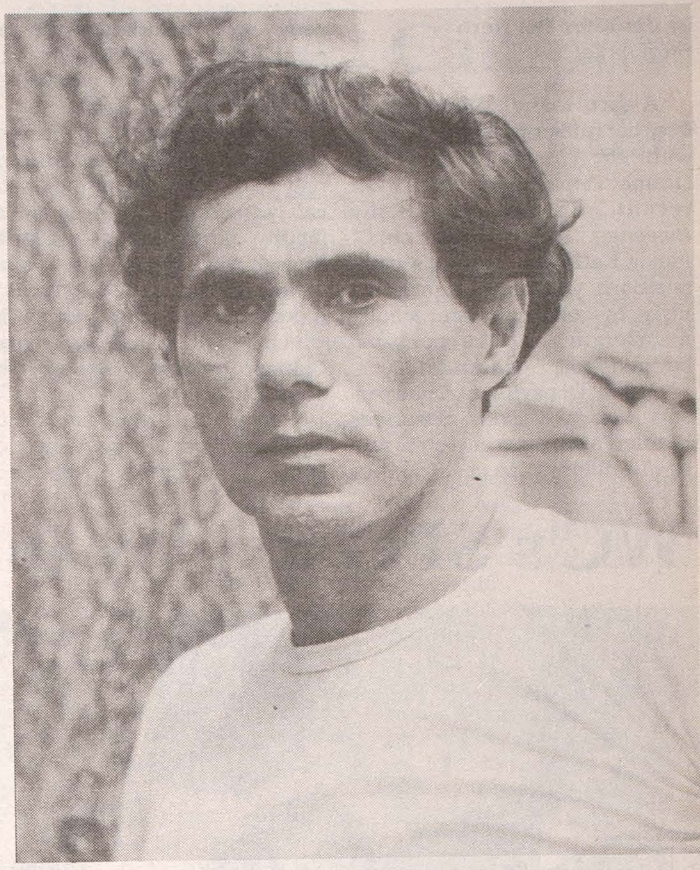
The Theater for the 20th Century brings Havel's "Protest" to campus as part of its continuing effort to present major modern and contemporary dramas to the community at large. The Theater for the 20th Century hopes to bridge the gap between professional troupes that perform plays merely for their entertainment value and university troupes that perform as part of a curriculum. Their goal is an educational one, to offer certain works of drama in a way that will foster their appreciation and promote cultural vitality.

Many professional troupes have an expertise that usually hinders the devotion to a serious drama. The troupes in the Theater for the 20th Century, however, use their expertise to interpret dramatic works through performances of the highest quality, professionally and aesthetically.

The Theater for the 20th Century sees that each participating troupe performs at least one production a year. Each production is to be followed by a critical discussion involving the actors and directors along with scholars, critics and the audience.

Ira Lewis portrays the character in the one man production of "Protest." Lewis made his professional acting debut on television at the age of thirteen and appeared frequently on television throughout his teenage years. After high school he became interested in the theater and began acting in the New York and regional theaters.

As a member of the original Kazan-Clurman Lincoln Center Repertory Company, he performed in numerous productions including Harold Clurman's production of Arthur Miller's "Incident" at Vichy and Clurman's International State Department production of O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey Into Night." Lewis has also appeared in A.E. Hotchner's "The Hemingway Hero" and several more plays by Miller.



Actor Ira Lewis stars in Havel's autobiographical tale of his life in prison. Lewis, who made his professional acting debut at age thirteen, recently produced his own play, "Vital Signs."

Lewis has also established himself a playwright, with four full-length plays which have been produced off-Broadway and in regional theaters. His most recent production is "Vital Signs," which was directed and starred in by Jose Ferrer. Next fall, "Chinese Coffee" will be produced, starring Al Pacino.

Ira Lewis is a member of Actors Equity Association, the Screen Actors Guild, the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, the Writers Guild of America, the Dramatists Guild, and the Actors Studio.

Nina daVinci Nichols has been the Producer and Dramaturg of the Theater for the 20th Century since 1988 and will produce the production of "Protest" here on campus. She also moderates the discussions which follow each performance.

Havel now joins a large group of dramatists Nichols has produced which include such famous playwrights as Strindberg, O'Neill, Chekhov, Joyce and Beckett.

The Theater for the Twentieth Century's performance of Havel's "Protest" will begin at 4 PM today in the Norman James Theater.

Bennett's compositions featured in recital

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

A face many will recognize from her numerous performances with the Washington College Drama Department, her most recent appearance being Sweeney Todd, senior music major Kathleen Bennett's compositions will be performed tonight by colleagues and faculty members in her recital sponsored by the Music Department.

Music Department Chairperson Garry Clarke describes Bennett's program as "retrospective of different pieces Kate has composed," including works she completed for the College and those she wrote as a member of the band Cowboy Jazz.

Clarke predicts the concert to be an interesting one due not only to the diversity of the musical selections, but because of faculty participation. Clarke himself will contribute on piano to the performance of "Daybreak", a dedication to Vaclav Havel, in which he will be joined by Denise Carlson on violin and Sally McGee on cello.

Among the original works to be performed is the debut of "Close Your Eyes", vocals provided by junior Cindy Croot and accompanied by associate music professor Kathleen Mills on piano, which carries the refrain: "Close your eyes, the night is falling silently./ Close your eyes, and let your dreams come quietly./ Close your eyes, when you awake there'll be a bright new day./ Close your eyes, slowly drift away."

Also scheduled for the recital is Three Songs for Four Voices, a collection of three e.e. cummings poems put to music: "Jimmie's got a goil"; "you shall above all things be glad and young", another of Bennett's four debuting compositions; and "Buffalo Bill's defunct." (The two other first performances are Leocadia Suite and Algernon Swinburne's A Match.)

One of the highlights of the program will feature six songs Bennett composed for Cowboy Jazz, in which she leads on voice and guitar, supported by Carlson on voice and violin and Victor Belanger on bass.

Bennett's band, Cowboy Jazz, of which violinist Carlson is also a member, has toured extensively, performing its western swing and rock and roll rhythms as far away as Alaska, though concentrating on the Western US where it is the most popular.

Combining her love for music with her love for the theater, Bennett aspires to eventually compose a musical of her own, explaining, "I love collaborating on putting music to drama." Bennett got a taste of such a challenge last spring with the Drama Department production Leocadia for which she composed all the music.

Bennett, who has spent most of the academic year preparing for the recital, is excited about the performance. The most difficult part, she recalls, was the coordination of rehearsals, but Bennett is confident: "They [the performers] are all capable."

For Bennett, the recital represents "the culmination of what I've always wanted to learn–how to orchestrate, notation," as she remembers her interest in music theory but initial lack of knowledge in the area.

Not only does Bennett share her musical talent with the College, but she participates in many community affairs as well, singing with the Early Music Vocal Consort, the Washington College Community Choir under the direction of Mills and the Jazz Band directed by associate music professor Amzie Parcell. Bassoonist Parcell performs a duet with pianist and wife Elizabeth Parcell, a WC music lecturer, in Bennett's La Chasse composition.

The concert will be held in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center at 8 PM. There is no admission fee.

Black Sheep celebrates the outsider

by Bruce Hamilton

They call themselves Black Sheep. A Washington, DC-based reggae band that has played all over Maryland. They are a progressive group with an original style and music that is filled with positivism.

A "black sheep" is defined in our culture as a person viewed by a group or family as a disgrace. This band serves as an exaltation of the outcast, a celebration of the outsider.

They have two albums– the first is entitled Gathering . A week before Spring break on Saturday, March 3, they played in our dining hall.

Everyone I talked to reached a unanimous conclusion: this band is good. In concert they displayed fierce energy and talent. It was the kind of music that almost forces you to move, and even the people that sat listening on the side were jumping around by the end of the night.

Black Sheep's latest album, Learn From Each Other, contains ten new offerings and was sold at their March 3 performance. Perhaps one could call it typical reggae in that its motifs are characteristic of the reggae message: peace, unity, nonviolence. However, anyone who is familiar with reggae knows that it is a very diversified genre.

The opening track is called "One in every family." A light, dancy tune, it is a perfect opening for the album as it introduces the band in a musical greeting: "Wherever we go/ people wanna know/ who we are. So, we tell them/ who we are." Lines like "One in every family/ one in every family tree/ baa baa baa black sheep" express the idea that these musicians view themselves as society's outcasts.

The members of Black Sheep seem to work well together; forming a rhythmically and melodically tight whole. The band features Moata on bass, Dontez on saxophone and flute, King Abasi on percussion, Bruce on drums, Barry on guitar, and Isa on lead vocals.

Learn From Each Other's second track, "United we stand," expresses a moving need for unity. It is, as the lyrics say, "a message of hope/ a message of peace/ a message of love/ to each and every one." The next song, "Watch what you believe," is a powerful effort about the need for freedom of belief and ideology.

"We as a people" is another anthemic effort focusing on liberation and unity. The title track, "Learn from each other" is a melodic song expressing the need for humanity to put aside differences for true progress and happiness: "We were made to be different so that we could learn from each other."

All the songs on the album contain fantastic guitar riffs and saxophone solos. Songs like "Reflections" and "Watch what you dub," are the kinds of songs you find echoing inside your head long after the music has stopped.

Black Sheep is a must-see band whose music is refreshing and original. Learn From Each Other is a great second effort. Black Sheep are, as Drumbeat puts it, "Reggae masters of positive high energy personified."

Henry V : Branagh's insightful readaptation

by Timothy J. Madison

Kenneth Branagh, in adapting Henry V for the screen, has rather impertinently attacked a number of thorny issues. Perhaps the most durable of all the arguments against him is the question: can justice be done to Shakespeare in a medium so fundamentally different from the one for it was intended? The question then becomes: is Branagh sufficiently versed in cinematic vocabulary to find the play's "truth" for the screen? But in reinterpreting the play, Branagh seems to have also discovered the play's implicit relevancy to its new medium.

By directing and starring in Henry , Branagh has invited the obvious comparisons to Laurence Olivier's 1944 adaptation. Olivier's interpretation was striking in the way it so aptly reflected the reality of WWI Britain; it was a stirring, romantic "call-to-arms" and patriotic celebration of England. In making the play accessible to contemporary audiences, Branagh's battlefields reflect a different perception of war an its supposed glories; it is a darker, grittier world stripped of the fairy tale romance of Olivier's Henry . Branagh's film focuses upon the psychology of the young monarch and how his heroism as a military leader parallels his spiritual heroism in coming to terms with a future that has been prematurely thrust upon him.

Like Olivier's Henry , which opens as a period performance in the Globe Theater and uses the chorus as a link to the "reality" of the play, Branagh begins his chorus (Derek Jacobi) on an after-hours film set. It is clear that Branagh's Henry is of a more contemporary sensibility. When Branagh films the aftermath of Henry's victory, it is with a long tracking shot of a sooty battlefield strewn with the corpses of boys and horse. It is a shot that reminds us of our familiarity through both the news and cinema with the stark reality of warfare. Even Branagh himself, with his Irish pug face, presents a surprisingly unglamorized Henry.

When Branagh set out to readapt Henry V, it was with the intention to create "a popular film that would satisfy the Shakespearean scholar as well as the filmgoers who like Crocodile Dundee." What Branagh has produced is an extremely dynamic and accessible vision of Shakespeare which remains true to both the letter and the spirit of the text. This is a richly textured, powerful adaptation which will thrill both fans of the Bard and anyone who loves film.

Asking about a partner's AIDS-risk history may not be enough to protect you, suggests a study in the latest New England Journal of Medicine.

The study of 422 sexually active 18- to 25-year-old college students – reported in a letter to the editor – found 34 percent of the men and 10 percent of the women admitted having told a lie in order to have sex.

Forty-seven percent of the men and 60 percent of the women said they had been lied to for purposes of sex.

"Using information from your partner as the only strategy for protecting yourself from (AIDS) risk is not a good strategy," says Vickie Mays, associate professor of psychology at UCLA.

"People will stretch the truth in talking about their past behavior. This is not an unusual phenomenon when entering into a relationship.

"Regardless of whether a person tells you they've had one partner or no partners, you still should practice safer sex, unless you have information that's based on HIV antibody tests over time," Mays says.

ton State in their first game. This game was also decided by free throws as Tim Liddy buried one from the line to give Washington College the victory.

The Shoremen moved onto the regional finals and a confrontation with Western Connecticut State. This game was a battle from the beginning, and Chris Brandt buried two free throws with less than a minute remaining in regulation to send the game to overtime. The Shoremen took control early in overtime and moved on to the Final Four with a 107-104 victory.

Washington College moved to the NCAA championships at Wittenburg University in Springfield, Ohio, and the team brought its share of Shoremen supporters with them. Geoff Miller, Director of Athletics, estimated that approximately 175 WC fans attended the tournament. They saw their team's dream of a national championship end in a semifinal loss to eventual champion University of Rochester.

The team bounced back quickly and ended the tournament on an up note, earning an impressive come from behind victory against Calvin University in the consolation game. Chris Brandt buried a short jumper with two seconds left to give the Shoremen a third place finish. "The win over Calvin gave everyone a big lift," admitted Gary Brown, Sports Information Director.

The Shoremen ended the season with an impressive 25-6 record. The team finished a very successful postseason that helped to make the 1989-1990 season one of the greatest in the program's history. The basketball team's showing also did a great deal to put Washington College and its athletics program on the map.

Announcing new lower prices on the Macintosh SE and Macintosh Plus.

If you'd like to enhance your education and your budget, take note. We just lowered prices on two powerful members of our Macintosh® family, the Macintosh SE and the Macintosh Plus.

They'll put a world of possibilities at your fingertips. Like graphing the economic impact of Japanese expansionism. Analyzing Freud. Or just organizing that stack of notes. Better yet, once you've mastered one application you can use them all, because all Macintosh software works the same way. Protest an effective student tool: students who care can get results

by Carol Bradley

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

It may be months before a true victor emerges from the two-week sit-in at Tennessee State University, but a rash of similar campus protests in the past year have yielded mixed results.

For every Howard University in Washington – where Republican National Chairman Lee Atwater resigned from the board of trustees last March after angry students occupied a building for three days – there is a University of Massachusetts. There, Pentagon-supported research rolls along despite a series of student demonstrations opposing it.

Last May at Stanford University in Palo Alto, Calif., 53 students seized President Donald Kennedy's office for a day to protest racism on campus and the scarcity of minority faculty at the school.

Stanford is seeking minority hires, but had started the search before the protest, administrators say.

In the meantime, a judge convicted each of the students of trespassing and sentenced them to six months of probation and 40 hours of community service – on top of 75 hours of community service meted out by the university.

The success of student protests is not always absolute, however.

The same month of the Stanford protest, black students at Michigan State University in East Lansing ended a weeklong sit-in at the administration building after school officials agreed to consider the protesters' 36 requests regarding minority concerns.

Among their demands was that Michigan State appoint a vice president or assistant provost to monitor minority affairs. The school did create a position of minority adviser, though somewhat lower on the flow chart.

The person who filled the new job, Lee June, said that while some of students' remaining requests have been addressed – for instance, the school has held a conference on black issues – officials have been "generally slow" to respond to other concerns, such as hiring minority faculty.

Regardless, June said, the protest served a purpose: At a school where blacks comprise only 6 percent of the 42,000 students enrolled, "They got the administration's attention and moved along the agenda further."

The key to a successful protest may lie in knowing in advance what concessions a college or university is willing to make, said Dave Cutler, a representative of the Washington-based United States Student Association.

"As long as students are aware of what they're capable of achieving, a sufficiently organized student body can get just about anything," Cutler said.

At Gallaudet University for the deaf in Washington, students convinced the administration to replace a new hearing president with a deaf president.

The school overlooked a more minor request: that a majority of the university's board of trustees be deaf. Though additional deaf members have been added to the 16-member board, the majority – nine – are still hearing.

Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles appointed an 11-member committee of faculty, alumni and community leaders to monitor race relations after five students walked into President James N. Loughran's office last April and refused to leave until he addressed racial problems.

Just last week, students at Morgan State University in Baltimore ended a weeklong protest by convincing the administration to install more lights and hire six more security guards.

No progress was reported, however, on the students' biggest request – for more state aid.

Welcome back from Spring Break!! Hopefully everyone enjoyed themselves among family and friends. Now it is time to get back into the swing of things and buckle down once again. for the last few weeks.

Wellness information: This still being the cold and flu season, I am reminded of an article I read in Tufts Diet and Nutrition Letter, November 1988. Have you ever felt cold while everyone in the room is perfectly comfortable? It may be a lack of iron in your diet. In a study at the Department of Agriculture's Human Nutrition Research Center in Grand Forks, North Dakota, a group of women who were put on low iron diets for 2-1/2 months lost almost 30% more body heat while sitting in a drafty room than they did after their iron stores were replenished. In addition, the women were able to tolerate the cold for slightly longer periods of time when they were given adequate amounts of iron.

You do not have to be suffering from iron-deficiency anemia to respond poorly to the cold. even a relatively mild deficiency can increase the likelihood of experiencing chills and shivers, which is reason enough for everyone to make an effort to follow a diet that supplies adequate amounts of iron. That means including lean meats, fish, poultry, dried beans and enriched grain products on a regular basis. To best absorb the iron in these foods, especially the beans and grains, eat them with a food enriched with Vitamin C, such as orange juice or tomato sauce.

Art major to remain intact, but questions of staffing, communication unanswered

by Susan Di Leo
Staff writer

Although the art major at Washington College is not, as rumored, in danger of becoming a program, the Art Department is now confronted with the challenge of utilizing the full potential of the recently opened Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center in the face of what members of the department call inadequate staffing.

As Tex Andrews, Lecturer in Art, tells it, Chairman pro temp of Art and Chairman of Music Garry Clarke said that "the idea of the art (major) becoming a program was being discussed."

The gravity of such a rumor lies in the fact that had the art major been demoted to being a program, students could no longer work toward a B.A. in art.

The administration professed to be "baffled" by the rumor, in the words of President Douglass Cater. Provost and Dean Elizabeth Baer said that she was "taken aback" when she was informed of inquiries regarding the question of the art major becoming a program.

Both Cater and Baer emphatically deny that the administration is discussing such a change. "It would be foolhardy...to make a change in what's available to students," said Baer. "I believe very strongly that studying art should be an option at Washington College."

In fact, she says, funds have been allocated for scholarships to attract students who are interested in pursuing a degree in any of the fine arts at the College.

For his part, Clarke says that the idea of turning the major into a program has "never been seriously considered," and has never extended beyond "idle conversation." He says he has argued against taking such action.

As Cater and Baer tell it, the first seeds of the rumor were planted last fall, when Associate Professor of Art Sue Tessem resigned as chairman of the department. Cater claims that Tessem said that the department could exist as a program, and, "in her estimate, we would need two full-time art history professors...I have not heard one more word" from her since that time. A proposal was not submitted, and the administration did not act on the suggestion.

"I did not recommend that the art major be downgraded to an art program," Tessem said. She did, however, request to Cater that Andrews be promoted to a full-time faculty position; Cater was unresponsive to the idea, and so Tessem asked for the administration's suggestions as to whether the department should be a major or a program.

As far as the confusion over the rumor is concerned, Cater said, "I feel there's a guerrilla warfare going on where, intentionally or not, I am the victim."

Since the administration was unable or unwilling to meet her requests for additional faculty and some needed supplies, Tessem maintains that the Art Department was and is a weak major, and cannot be developed into a competitive program without the needed resources.

The imminent predicament facing the Art Department is the chance that Tex Andrews may be forced to leave the College if he is not promoted to full-time status next year. He has taught here for approximately five years.

"If I lose Tex, I'll feel like I've lost my whole program," Tessem said.

Although Andrews is currently a full-time faculty member because of Janson-LaPalme's fall

Washington College gets new President; Charles Trout named

Dr. Charles H. Trout, Provost and Dean of the Faculty of Colgate University, will become the 24th president of Washington College, announced Louis L. Goldstein, Chairman of the College's Boards of Visitors and Governors.

Dr. Trout will succeed Douglass Cater, who will retire at the end of the academic year after serving as president since 1982.

Since 1981, Dr. Trout has been Provost and Dean of the Faculty, as well as Professor of History, at Colgate University in Hamilton, New York. During Trout's tenure at Colgate, the core curriculum of the university was substantially revised and new interdisciplinary programs were established, including Women's Studies, Africana/Hispanic Studies, and Neuroscience. The number of faculty research grants awarded also rose markedly.

In announcing the appointment, Chairman Goldstein stated, "Dr. Trout was the first choice of the College Search Committee after screening several hundred prospects and interviewing eight finalists. He was enthusiastically recommended to the Boards of Visitors and Governors that convened on Sunday to review the Search Committee's recommendation. We believe we have made an excellent choice."

David McLaughlin, President of the Aspen Institute and Chairman of the College's Presidential Search Committee, joined Goldstein in endorsing Dr. Trout's appointment. "The Search Committee worked hard to select Dr. Trout from among an out-

all frame, no painting?

No doubt the Art Department will hear cries of treason from the administration. We've given you this beautiful facility, and what do you do? Whine about needing more faculty!

The Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center is indeed an impressive facility. Any student who inspects the building—especially after the woeful accommodations of McAlpin House—will wish he/she had come to Washington College to pursue a major in art.

Problem is, the grand Arts Center is being run by the McAlpin House Art Department. That is, when the Department was located in the hole that was McAlpin, the number of faculty seemed adequate, compared to its surroundings. At least we have devoted faculty, students said, even if we have to work here. In the Arts Center, the art faculty seems overwhelmed. The facility is being run by one full-time and one soon-to-be part-time faculty member.

Considering the potential represented by the luxurious Arts Center, why shouldn't the Art Department be in line for additional faculty? Though the answer is too complicated to explore fully here, the result is simple: students get short-changed.

First of all, art doesn't have the numbers in students, both majors and nonmajors, as English and History, so if the school is going to hire a new faculty member, it makes sense that overtaxed departments such as these should be first in line to receive that new faculty member.

Art is, however, competitive with many other departments in terms of numbers, such as music, and modern languages, both of which have more faculty than art.

Apart from the "numbers game," the Arts Center is presently without an endowment, meaning that costs for maintenance and supplies must come from an emergency fund. Still, endowment or no endowment, it's better that the Center was opened to students as soon as was possible.

Douglass Cater says he can't "invent money." Why not? From the point of view of students, money has been invented for the Academic Resources Center, the brick walk, both of which we could live without...why not for an academic department?

There are, I'm sure, complicated dollars-and-cents reasons why this cannot and will not happen, but speaking as a student—indeed, as a student who has never even taken an art course—I really don't care about the technical reasons why Washington College cannot have a competitive major, art or otherwise. I don't care what's going on in the board meetings—I want to see results in my classes. That lovely brick walk certainly isn't contributing to my academic life at this institution.

To whom should students direct their anger? To the administration and the Art Department, whose lack of communication is painfully apparent? To patrons, who seem more eager to fund bricks and mortar than academia? Why is there no money for academia at Washington College?

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

Letters to the Editor

Committee should concern itself with matters more pressing than petty paperwork

To the Editor:

Recently I petitioned the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standing. My letter was handwritten. In response to my petition, I received the following letter:

Dear Mary:

Yesterday the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standing held its meeting to review your petition under the date of March 1, 1990. The Committee's decision is that it would withhold its official approval of your request until you hand in a new, formal, typewritten and clean-cut form of your old petition to me. This new petition must be addressed to the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standing.

The Committee and I are waiting for your quick response.

Sincerely,
Tai Sung An (Prof.)

To my knowledge there exists no statutes in the Washington College handbook concerning the format a petition must take. Perhaps the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standing should occupy themselves with more pressing issues instead of wallowing in the mire of bureaucratic pettiness. It is unsettling to think that this pettiness could keep me from graduating and as a result I have already sent a new improved form of my old petition to the appropriate committee.

ISSUE: How can we establish "a genuine sporting spirit at Washington College athletic events?

Cater should have cited creativity, not behavior

Jim Sobczak & Brett Lankford

We would like to inform you that this article is scripted in Bookman, a font admired from coast to coast. If you agree, drop us a line. If you don't, drop us a lime. If you don't care read the comic now and save this one for the bowl. So far this article has proved to be nonsensical, hopefully you noticed.

Speaking of noticing, have you ever noticed that Tracy Peel has a really nice smile? Go ahead, look at her picture. She's even got dimples! And have you ever noticed that all the people they ask in Campus Voices never really answer the question?

Apparently John Manning noticed this tendency along with us. Therefore, we would like to take this opportunity to express our deepest appreciation to Comrade Manning for his epistemological diligence when responding to the interrogative.

Good show, man.

Not only was Friar Manning the only person to answer the question, he was correct in his analysis. It seems rather silly to complain about the "bad manners" of the fans. The fact that these fans are attending sporting events does not give them permission to be a jerk, but they should receive some credit for going to the games. These teams need the fans that they have, and complaining about them when they act the same as people do at every other sporting event will not encourage them to come back for more.

President Cater should not have spent his time complaining about the manners of the fans, but their creativity. Let's face it, a crowd of drunken excited galloots and gallootettes should be able to come up with something a tad more ingenious than "you suck," or at least employ the use of a descriptive modifier. Hey guys, how about dropping in a direct object after that forceful transitive. For instance, "you suck fuzzy things" or "you suck the beads of water off of a bison butt" will convey the same message of foe incompetence and may evoke a chortle or two.

Here are some more suggestions: Confuse the opposition lexically by attempting to rename their temporal reality. Just call the boys with brown hair "food processor" and the tall guy with the buck teeth "Rubber-tire backhoe taster." This should render these all-American athletes practically useless and cause them to drool incessantly on their pearly white socks.

In conclusion, Bookman rules. Also, with a little practice and a beer or two there could be all kinds of spiffy chants and other extraneous noises coming from the stands at Cain Gymnasium and Kibler Field. Heed our advice, keep your feet on the ground and keep reaching for the stars.

P.S. Dear President Cater, you can try to get the corner booth in the restaurant but you don't always get it. How 'bout them apples.

Jim Sobczak and Brett Lankford are two leftovers from The Best Paper in the World regimed.

Matt Giller

Recently, some criticism has been directed towards the beloved basketball fans at the Cain Gymnasium. Last week, a concerned community member who brought his family to the Kings College game on March 3, was ashamed by the overall unsportsmanlike conduct from the student body that spread like a disease to the younger fans. Yet our concerned community member's letter lost all legitimacy when he failed to comment on the Maryland basketball game he and his family endured previous to the Shoremen's. He claimed to have enjoyed both sporting events but said he would never attend the Cain again in fear of hearing "You suck, you suck."

We may be obnoxious, but we're not stupid. I have attended many a sporting event, college and pro, and never have they resembled a Bingo night at St. Jude's. Unless this gentlemen watched the Terps game from the parking lot there is no way he didn't hear fans like ours. This inconsistency results to an illegitimacy to his complaint. If this was the only college game he has ever seen then his comments would be legitimate; but they're not and must be reacted to accordingly.

As President Cater mentioned, he would like to see some actions by the SGA and the Office of Student Affairs as well as the Alumni Council towards a more sportsmanlike atmosphere at basketball games. But let's put things in their proper perspective. We are not common thugs; we, the student body, do not have a history of fan violence. Increased fan violence has indeed put a spot on many sporting events, but not here.

Furthermore, in an era of crooked collegiate athletics where constant allegations and investigations are made concerning everything from gambling to steroids to rape, Washington College athletics have remained a model program from top to bottom. Yet this "concerned, responsible community member" supports the Maryland basketball program which is about to endure a punishing suspension for breaking serious NCAA rules.

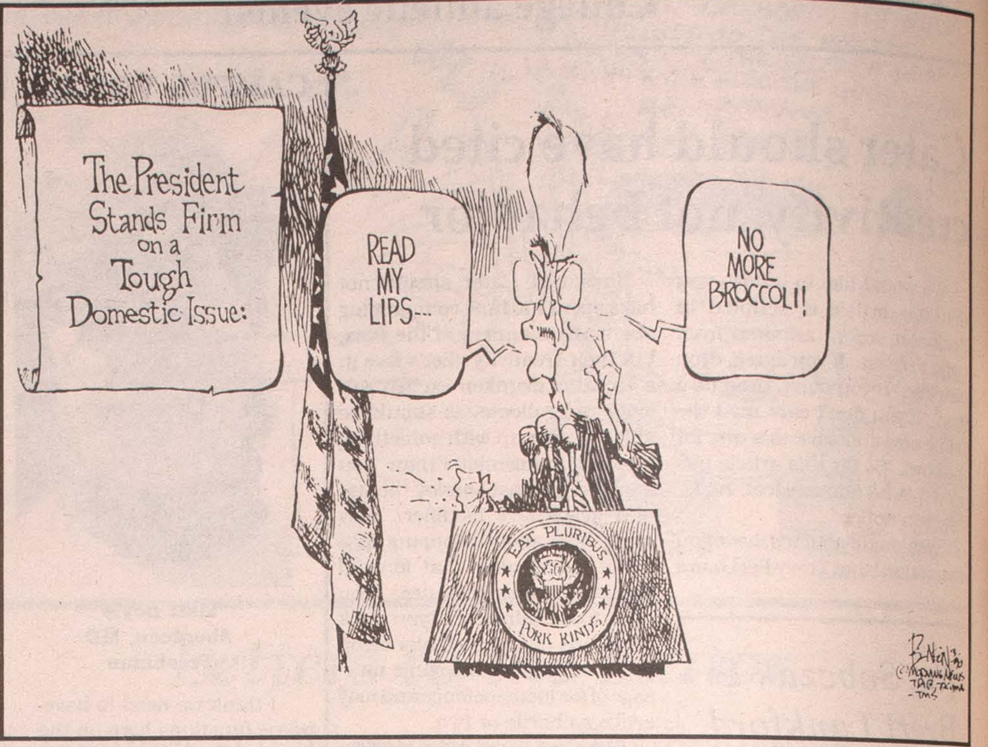
Thus, it is quite obvious that his priorities of concern are skewed. I agree that our enthusiastic fans, functionally speaking, do not provide our youngsters a moralistic base and something may have to be done to ease the visiting families without eradicating the enthusiasm. But to those who agree with our now infamous concerned citizen, please try not to lose sight of the fact that while the integrity of college athletics dwindles in the eyes of its fans, the WAC's enthusiasm must be discussed in the proper perspective. I only hope that the rest of our athletics can provide the same enthusiasm and continue to unite our community.

Matt Giller is a junior who writes frequently for the Elm's sports pages.

PERSPECTIVES

Broccoli and cheese, broccoli and cheese

Laura Hopper



I would like to thank the president for bringing to the attention of the American people a very important issue. An issue that deserves our attention more than the deficit, the drug war, abortion, or anything that is happening in eastern Europe. This issue is, of course, broccoli.

Yes, broccoli, that green vegetable most often found in the dining hall, lurking under a suspicious cream/cheese sauce. Broccoli is the cause of a national crisis. A crisis that even First Lady Barbara Bush noted was unlikely to be resolved because, let's face it folks, the president just won't eat broccoli.

George Bush banned broccoli from Air Force One, and so started an uproar from the broccoli growers of America. But, over what? A green vegetable lurking under a suspicious cream/cheese sauce or swimming in a pasta salad? Or are we talking about a greater issue here. Proper nutrition for America's children?

Picture this...little Brian is sitting at the kitchen table. His mother sets his dinner down in front of him. Baked chicken with stuffing, and broccoli with a cheese sauce. Brian picks at his dinner, clearly wanting a hot dog and french fries, instead.

"Eat your broccoli, dear." His mother tells him.

"Don't want it." he whines. She gives him a stern look, and he whimpers, "But the President doesn't have to eat his broccoli."

There it is. The heart of the issue. The breakdown of the American family. Mom's authority wiped out in a single swipe by the president's broccoli ban. Can we recover from this terrible tragedy? Is there any hope for America? Can't you see the scenario? First broccoli, then cabbage, carrots, beets, rutabegas, parsnips, and finally, the tuber that is the foundation of many a nation, the potato. Hope for America aside, is there hope for the world? I have visions of many little Soviets banging their spoons on the table and shouting, "Potatos, nyet!"

Sure, there is hope. Why didn't Dan Rostenkowski, chairman of the House ways and Means Committee, reveal in a article in the Sunday Washington Post, his plan for how to reduce the deficit? And haven't the parliaments of both Latvia and Estonia voted to use the slow but steady method of seceding from the Soviet Union? Isn't there not one but two McDonalds within range of Lenin's tomb? Of course, when asked for suggestions on how America could improve its balance of trade with Japan, the Japanese did suggest we build bullet trains so we don't buy so many Japanese cars, not that Japanese manufacturers would raise their prices. But you can't have everything.

After all the complaining from the media about the last presidential campaign, no substantiative issues, use of negative campaign ads, etc etc... why is broccoli even mentioned? Our national security will never be seriously jeopardized by not serving broccoli on Air Force One. And yes, the president did eat his broccoli when he was a child (so this stand is a new thing). There are no scientific studies to prove a connection between a non-broccoli eating child and drug use or homicidal tendencies.

So cheer up America. Broccoli may be out of favor at the White House, but pork skins aren't.

Gorbachev, Bush, and those naughty Lithuanians

By John Omicinski

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

Question: What is the Lithuanian dispute all about?

Answer: Gradually over the past two years, Lithuania has declared itself a republic independent from the Soviet Union. However, no foreign country, including the United States, recognizes Lithuania's independence, despite its March 17 declaration. Lithuanians rejected Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev's offer of a five-year phase-in of independence.

Q: What happens if Lithuania's move succeeds?

A: If Lithuania goes, other Soviet republics such as Latvia and Estonia won't be far behind. (On Sunday, the Estonian parliament voted 432-3 for full independence.) Eventually, the separation virus could spread to Azerbaijan and the southern Moslem republics. In Georgia, the Parliament already has taken steps toward independence. The Soviet Union's breadbasket and steel basin – the Ukraine – could drop out, too. Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev faces the threat of a disintegrating nation that could leave him with only the core Russian and Byelorussian republics, little more than the early czars' empire.

Q: What is Lithuania's strategic importance to Soviet Union?

A: Lithuania fronts the Baltic Sea, giving the Soviets important access to warm-water ocean, though neighboring Latvia and Estonia have more important ports (Riga and Talinn). Because most of the USSR's major rivers flow north into the Arctic Ocean, and because major ports are ice-blocked many months of the year, Baltic access is important to Moscow's navy and merchant marine. Lithuania's importance is amplified now with the loss of Poland.

Q: Are there similarities between Lithuanian secession and the breakaway that triggered the U.S. Civil War?

A: Some make the connection, but it is tenuous. Lithuania and the two other Baltic states, Latvia and Estonia, are in a different predicament than the one that led to the 1861-1865 U.S. Civil War. The three Baltics were forcibly annexed in 1940 by Soviet troops, acting under a "secret protocol" made between Stalin and Hitler. In 1941, 30,000 members of the Lithuanian intelligentsia were deported to Siberia. Between the two world wars, Lithuania considered itself independent. "Stalinism and Hitlerism destroyed independent states by secret deals," a Lithuanian commission said last August, on the 50th anniversary of the so-called Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. In the United States, the states that made up the Confederacy previously had joined the Union willingly.

Q: What are Gorbachev's options for putting pressure on Lithuania?

A: Economic and military options exist. High Soviet officials such as Yegor Ligachev have discounted use of force, but Soviet troops over the weekend rolled into Vilnius and now occupy some Communist Party buildings. When Moscow demanded Lithuanian soldiers return to their Red Army units, 3,000 of 38,000 deserted. Moscow also demands Lithuanians turn in their private arms. Economics is a key lever for Moscow. Lithuania imports 97 percent of its oil from elsewhere in Soviet Union. However, because Lithuania is a major agricultural region and supplier of electronics, its loss would hurt Gorbachev's efforts to supply consumer goods to the Soviets.

Q: What's the best guess as to what Gorbachev has in mind?

A: Bush administration advisors seem to think Gorbachev would like to "Finlandize" the Baltics. Finnish ski troops tore up the Soviet army when it invaded in November 1939, inventing the "Molotov cocktail" to destroy Soviet tanks. Yet, Finland now maintains friendly trade and cultural relations with Soviets under a 1948 mutual assistance treaty while it belongs to the Nordic Council of nations. Gorbachev also talks of some sort of Soviet federation, perhaps similar to United States' setup.

Q: What is the U.S. position?

A: President Bush is walking a political-diplomatic tightrope. He neither recognizes independent Lithuania nor offers Gorbachev a free hand. Bush says the United States won't recognize Lithuania until it's in "control of its territory" and urges Lithuanians to recognize "certain realities" of its relationship with Moscow. National security advisor Brent Scowcroft says the United States "would not ignore it" if Soviets use force, but doesn't say what steps Bush would take. Defense Secretary Dick Cheney has warned of "significant negative consequences in terms of U.S.-Soviet relations" if Moscow crushes the Lithuanian freedom movement.

Q: What are U.S. possibilities?

A: Probably three:

– Urge resumption of Moscow-Vilnius talks.

– Recognize the new Lithuania.

– Allow Gorbachev to retake Lithuania with force.

The last alternative seems thoroughly unlikely. More than 100 members of Congress urge Bush to recognize Lithuanian independence. If Bush does that soon, it would be a huge surprise and cause an outcry in the Kremlin, perhaps endangering emigration of Soviet Jews and causing a retightening of Soviet security screws.

WC vs. Hobart - the great rivalry

by Matt Giller

Entering our 40th year as a member of the USILA, Washington College lacrosse has been one of the most successful college programs of all time. Over that period we have proudly captured 328 victories. In one particular stretch during the years 1963-1969, the Shoremen knocked off 26 straight. Among the awards we have accumulated is a collection of seven consecutive Strobhar Trophies. Over the last seven years, the Washington College Shoremen have gone to the NCAA quarterfinals three times, semi-finals once, and finals three times.

All of this success persists in the face of one of the most arduous schedules in collegiate sports. Teams that regularly face this small team are Navy and Johns Hopkins foremost, as well as North Carolina, Virginia, and of course the Statesmen of Hobart. But this school whose male student body barely extends over 400 is still able to compete at level equal to others whose student body's are ten times the size.

In the midst of this winning tradition, another tradition has sprung up. The Hobart/Washington game, since the Division III formed in 1980, has become annually the biggest game of the year. Coach Corcoran attributes this strengthened tradition to the fact that the two schools have several similarities. Both schools have an established lacrosse tradition; furthermore, lacrosse is so inherent in both areas that "the game" between the two schools become more interesting and more fierce.

But unlike the Shoremen program, Hobart's recruting techniques resemble that of a Division I program. Each year 30 freshmen arrive each fall to compete with one hundred other juggernauts. Regardless of the odds, the smaller Shoremen continue to go after them and many feel this could be the year.

Women's lax dominates early

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Women's lacrosse has been WC's most dominant program so far this spring. The women are rolling through their schedule with a 3-0 record, and they have exhibited excellence on both offense and defense. The team has scored an amazing 50 goals in their first three victories while only allowing 18 scores. This domination on the field suggests that this year's team may be among the strongest in the program's history.

The women opened their season with a game against an always tough Washington & Lee squad. This was a late addition to the women's schedule, but they still appeared to be more than prepared. This was the Shorewomen's closest game of the season so far, but they still won the game by a score of 12-8. Sarah Coste opened the season in style with 5 goals to help lead WC to victory. In addition, the Shorewomen were able to silence a powerful W&L offense with a strong defensive performance.

The team then went on the road for a March 21 game against Widener University. The Shorewomen scored early and often against their opponents, storming out to an 8-1 halftime lead. The margin steadily increased in the second half, and WC headed home with an 18-4 victory tucked under their belt. A number of women costarred in the Shorewomen's offensive show. Sam Clements led all scorers with five goals and added an assist, while junior all-American Sarah Coste contributed four goals and three assists of her own. Amy Tiehel and Jenifer Blenckstone each added three goals apiece in the victory, and Blenckstone handed out a team-high six assists. The women outshot Widener 35-11 in the game, and they dominated every statistical category. Goalkeeper Kristy Hilgartner came up with five saves for WC, and freshman Jamee Damron stopped two shots in her first WC appearance.

The game against Franklin & Marshall was postponed scheduled for last Saturday was postponed until late in the season, but Tuesday's game against Goucher went ahead as planned. This was unfortunate for the women from Goucher, who were greeted with a 20-6 thumping from the Shorewomen. WC scored an incredible 13 goals in the second half and once again overwhelmed their opponent on every level. Coste pumped in five more goals, bringing her three game total to 14 scores. Blenckstone scored three goals and added three assists, and four other women contributed multiple goal games. The women bombarded Goucher with 54 shots in the game, while the WC defense only allowed their opponent 15 shots on the day. Hilgartner and Damron combined for six saves in the WC nets.

The women hope to continue their winning ways as they play four games in a span of eight days. Coach Diane Guinan takes her team to Swarthmore for a game on March 29, then returns for a 1:00 home game this Saturday against Dickinson. The women then travel to Western Maryland on Tuesday before playing Salisbury State in a home game on Thursday, April 5.

Maryland sanctions were too severe

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

It seems like everyone else has written on this subject, so I guess it's time for me to comment on the sanctions that the NCAA handed down on the University of Maryland. I am a die-hard fan of the Terps, so I died rather violently when I heard of the punishment the basketball program had received. I admit that I may have some bias in this case, but I still feel that the punishment was too severe and did not fit the crime.

Basically, the University of Maryland was hit with the "death penalty". The team was placed on probation for three years, and they were restricted from joining postseason play for the next two seasons. That punishment has now worsened, since the Atlantic Coast Conference appears ready to kick Maryland out of their postseason tournament. In addition, the Terps were basically hit with a three-year restriction in regard to the NCAA tournament. I sincerely believe that Maryland got the shaft from the selection committee. The committee realized that it would be rather embarrassing if the Terrapins were to suddenly get hot and win the NCAA tourney. Instead, the committee chose to select every Big Ten school imaginable. The Big East also receive six bids to the tournament. You're going to tell me that Villanova was better than Maryland? The Wildcats finished the year with a 17-15 record - real impressive.

Anyway, back to the subject at hand. The Maryland sanctions were too severe, especially considering the violations were not as serious as those of the University of Kentucky, who suffered a similar penalty. The difference probably lies in the fact that Kentucky was willing to help in the investigation, while Bob Wade spent most of his time failing miserably in his attempts to cover his tracks. This violation probably had some effect on the severity of the punishment. Still, you can't tell me that UNLV isn't guilty of more absurd violations than Maryland. The NCAA has received no help from Jerry Tarkanian whatsoever. If the NCAA is going to remain consistent, I shudder to think what will happen to UNLV if anyone ever learns the truth about their program.

When I first learned the details of the sanctions, I was upset. But then I thought a minute. This program has been through hell since the death of Len Bias. Fighting the sanctions won't solve anything. Maryland should quiet down, admit their mistakes, then set to work on rebuilding a once proud program that has nearly been destroyed.

Men's tennis raises their record to 8-1

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Men's tennis spent this week building their reputation as a force to be reckoned with in collegiate athletics. The Shoremen netters met Division I foe Villanova University in a match last Thursday, and Washington College came away smelling like a rose. WC declawed the Wildcats 9-0 with an impressive display of tennis, and their thrashing of their opponent from the Big East conference showed that the Shoremen were not afraid of big name schools.

The Shoremen only lost one set the entire day. Scott Read, playing in the #1 position against the Wildcats, won in straight sets 6-3, 6-2. Larry Gewer, playing in the #2 spot, faced the toughest match of the day. Gewer dropped his first set by a score of 3-4, but then managed to bounce back and capture the second set 6-2. The final set of the match was a struggle, but Gewer was able to win the set and match 7-5. Peter Maller and Scott Shepherd dominated their matches, losing only two and four games, respectively, while claiming their victories. Alberto Diaz won his match 6-2, 6-4, and Andy Bohutinsky clinched the WC victory with a 7-5, 6-0 singles win.

The WC men continued their mastery of Villanova in their doubles matches. Since the Shoremen had already clinched their victory, the doubles matches were played in standard pro set form. This change made no difference to the Shoremen who went on to sweep doubles as well. Maller and Shepherd combined to capture an 8-2 victory, and Diaz and Bohutinsky rolled to an 8-1 win. Read teamed with Allon Rock in the closest doubles match of the day, but the duo still pulled out an 8-5 win.

The tennis team's victory over Villanova improved their overall spring record to 8-1. The Shoremen netters stay on the road for their next four matches, then return home for a Wednesday, April 4 match against Swarthmore. Their road matches come against the likes of Ursinus, Trenton State, Washington & Lee and Haverford, and the Shoremen hope that their dominating performance against Villanova is a sign of things to come this spring.

Softball looking forward to promising 1990 season

by Amy R. Caddle

The Washington College softball team is ready to take on the season with full force, despite a loss to Widener on March 21. "Widener played extremely well. Their pitcher threw a no-hitter and a one-hitter the two games before us, and they came in with a 7-3 record," states coach Penny Fall. The game resulted in a 4-0 loss, but did not stop the Shorewomen from making an impressionable showing. Freshman Marie Mohler had two bunts, a walk, and stole three bases, and the outfield displayed their strength. "Defense is definitely our strong point," coach Fall commented.

The Shorewomen are led by captains Tracey Coleman and Sharon Orser, while Shannon Cupka and Edna Diefenderfer are the key pitchers for coach Fall's team. Diefenderfer is the starting shortstop, but will fill in as pitcher when needed. Becky Bowman is placed at centerfield, and she compliments her outfield skills with excellent hitting. "Becky has made a tremendous amount of progress in her four years as a team member. She's a solid defense player and a threat with a bat," says Coach Fall. Jill Reaper will be changing positions this spring, moving to second base from the outfield. Sophomore Kathy Brewster is returning as a solid player behind the plate. Brewster shared the title of Most Valuable Player with starting pitcher Shannon Cupka last year.

Coach Fall is expecting the team as a whole to play at a better level than last year, due to a number of veteran players. "If the team can stay healthy and avoid injuries, I anticipate a continued progress in our level of play," says Fall. "We have a very tough schedule, and our win-loss record will not necessarily validate our strengths," she adds.

Coach Fall also stresses the fact that this year's team has the highest grade point average than ever— a 3.4 average for the entire squad. "The athletic department takes pride in stressing academics to our players. We encourage academic as well as athletic competition, and we realize that as a Division III school we must have a commitment to academics. All of the players maintain a healthy balance between schoolwork, sports, and social activities," states Fall.

A Slice of info on cheerleading

by Phil "Slice" Macek

There's an underground sport at Washington College that is beginning to emerge from the shadows and gain the widespread attention it so richly deserves - cheerleading. This talented group of enthusiastic supporters is always ready to take the floor at an opportune moment and whip the crowd into an uncontrollable frenzy. Certain cheers like "The Lean" and my personal favorite, "The Dunk Cheer", make the fans in the stands shout so loudly that even the boldest of Duke fans would cower and recoil in fear, running back to Durham just as fast as their legs could carry them. Yet, even after seeing "The Dunk Cheer" several times, I still cannot figure out who taught Carrie Bryant how to throw the ball down with such force. Was it Bull? C.J. Dan Dutton? Jerry Peden?

Other performances by the team are particularly noteworthy, and individual efforts should be applauded. First off, Rebecca Smith's courage should be praised as she displayed nerves of steel every time she plunged headfirst into the waiting arms of her teammates. One wrong move or one miscalculation could have meant disaster. Fortunately, the integration of the team into one cohesive unit assured success for such a dangerous cheer.

Secondly, there are the acrobatic tumbling performances of Traci Costello. Her flips usually served as the icing on the cake after a difficult cheer. However, there was one instance when it meant so much more; during a timeout against Western Connecticut. One of their lame cheerleaders did some weak back flips along the sideline near the WC fans before returning to firma terra. Traci, in an act of spontaneous retaliation, launched into her own series of crowd-pleasing flips, to the dismay of the Connecticut fans. The Holy Father, Tim Keehan, called her "the turning point of the game". Such attributions to our cheerleaders are proof positive that they are on the threshold of greatness.

The other members of the squad also had their own little tricks to guarantee crowd support. For example, Kelli Farrell wore a particular accessory to her uniform, showing that she really stood "behind" the team. Other members of the team, namely: Shannon Cupka (now the star pitcher on the softball team), Jennifer Mowll, Sarah Hillyard, Deanna Houle, Maria Banashak, et. al., led the cheers in a graceful, professional manner and always persuaded an already eager group of fans to get involved in the game. I can scarcely imagine the long hours of training these girls endured while perfecting their craft. Their skill and tenacity for crowd involvement, I feel, turned many games in WC's favor and left the disgruntled visiting teams miffed.

Ladies, I just want to say "Congratulations!" Through your precision, diligence, and extraordinary work ethic, you have managed to turn a respectable program into a powerhouse. Of course, with your new status comes the pressure to perform perfectly next season on the court. But I, for one, feel that you can live up to your label of greatness and conquer brave new worlds.

WC crew battles elements, Chester River in races

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Crew is a sport that traditionally ends its fall season in November and begins to race again sometime in March. This is because crew races are not meant take place in frigid temperatures during a driving snowstorm. Fortunately, their spring schedule is almost never interrupted by such weather conditions. Almost is the important word in that sentence, since last Saturday's crew races on the Chester River brought back memories of chestnuts roasting on an open fire.

Jack Frost was nipping at the noses of rowers from Washington College, George Washington, LaSalle, and Colgate, as well as a local rowing club. Washington College coach Don Chatellier said the weather were among the worst rowing conditions he had ever seen. "As an official who was supposed to keep the races under control, it was nearly impossible. There was a layer of fog on the water, and it limited visibility to about 400 yards. This was on top of the wind, the cold, and the snow. We were very fortunate that there was no other traffic."

Despite the horrific weather conditions, Washington College gave an impressive performance on the Chester River. The men's and women's varsity four boats were victorious, both by considerable margins. Many men and women were forced to compete twice as a result of team injuries.

Chatellier refused to give too much importance to the races, noting that the race was used to help the coaches make some decisions for later this spring. "We did some experimenting this weekend in an effort to find boats for the Dad Vails," Chatellier said. "Also, the conditions for good crew just were not there. The races just could not be a good indication of success."

The men's varsity eight boat got WC off to a good start, finishing second to GWU in the first race. "George Washington has a very well-respected crew program," Chatellier noted. The women's varsity four boat rowed next and won impressively, defeating the second place finisher by fifteen seconds.

The water conditions changed at this point, and a shift in the tide lowered times considerably. The men's novice eight rowed next and came in third with a wonderful time. The men's junior varsity eight was the next group on the water. Despite their last place finish, Chatellier said that the boat rowed a solid race. The women's novice eight boat managed to finish ahead of Colgate in the next race and gained experience that should be helpful in the spring.

The men's varsity four boat took the water, then promptly blew their opponents off the Chester River. The boat defeated second-place George Washington by a whopping seventeen seconds to earn WC their second and final victory of the day. The women's varsity eight ended the day in impressive fashion, finishing third behind two GW boats.

Chatellier hoped that the team would recover from injuries in time for this weekend's race. "Andy Walbert, John Mulvany and Elizabeth McGee were all hurt, and that forced us to make some changes. As a result, the chemistry sometimes isn't there."

The coach was still reasonably pleased with the team's showing. "Considering all of the problems we had to face, we were quite successful. We afforded ourselves well in all races, and the races helped to show us where we need to improve."

The crew team hopes to make their first step in the right direction this Sunday. The men and women head to Virginia for competition on the Occoquan. One can only hope that the weatherman will be agreeable this weekend and allow WC to row and compete in perfect conditions.

Doctor Jock

Knee Pain: Is it torn cartilage or tendinitis?

"My knee really hurts, Doc. Whaddya think it is?"

Sore knees are a common complaint among people who do sports. Runners, walkers, tennis players, skiers and many other kinds of citizen-athletes frequently experience some sort of knee pain before, during or after they work out.

The question for today is: Where, precisely, is your pain coming from? If you can be helpful to your doctor in making a diagnosis, you'll have done everyone a favor. An informed, involved patient is a much better bet for full recovery than one who is distanced and passive.

Kneecap vs. cartilage. There are two major areas in your knee that account for the majority of knee pain problems. The most common problem is pain coming form around the kneecap or patella: the patella pain syndrome. This can be due to tendinitis of the quadriceps or patellar tendons, or it could be a complication of chondromalacia. The next most common site of pain is from meniscal, or cartilage, injuries. Differentiating between the two can be tricky but it's necessary.

Taking the pain to differentiate. Dr. Marvin Bloom at the San Francisco Medical Center has done a lot of work in differentiating pain in these two areas. Pain coming from cartilage tears usually can be identified as starting with a single incident of injury. A fall on the tennis court. An accident at the ski slope. Meniscal or cartilage tears in older people sometimes happen gradually – through wearing out – but young people can almost always identify a specific injury. Patellar pain, however, always occurs gradually. One day you feel a twinge. And another. And then a stronger one, and gradually, you develop serious discomfort. Other differences:

– Patellar pain is more vague. It just hurts somewhere in the knee, more often in the front. Meniscal pain is more likely to be localized to the inside or outside of the knee.

Meniscal problems can cause your knee to lock, so you can't fully extend it. Patellar problems don't cause true locking. Your knee may hurt as you try to extend it, especially after sitting, but it doesn't lock.

– Meniscal pain is worse when you put weight on the knee, especially if you cut sharply. Patellar pain may occur as you are active but will often persist or even be worse after your activity. Jumping usually doesn't make meniscal pain worse, but it does make patellar pain worse.

– Patellar pain is worse when you get up from a squat. Meniscal pain is worse at a full squat. Your knee won't hurt when you kneel if you have a torn meniscus, but it will if the problem is around the patella. Kneeling presses the patella against the end of your femur. Sitting for long periods often makes the patellar pain worse for the same reason. It doesn't affect meniscal pain.

– Meniscal pain is usually worse going uphill or up stairs; patellar pain is worse going downhill or down the stairs.

– Swelling in the knee is more common in meniscal injuries than it is in patellar problems.

These things won't make you an expert diagnostician but they should help you give your doctor the information needed to make an accurate diagnosis.

Lacrosse adds to winning streak

by Matt Giller

Last weekend normalcy returned to our quiet town - precipitation and a Shoremen lacrosse victory. But on this March 24th day, the precipitation was in the form of snow. The Shoremen spoiled the first spring weekend for the RIT laxers by defeating them 13-11.

Although the Shoremen didn't play up to normal standards, they were still able to beat their visitors. As one of the top teams in the country, every team concentrates all their attention to earning a win against the WAC. Coach Corcoran felt that that RIT wanted it more than his players. Evidence to this was the fact that techies outshot and outhustled the Shoremen. Coach attributes some of the lethargic play to the team's inexperience. "The young players must realize that every team we play are going to be extremely hungry," Corcoran said, "and they must get up for every opponent."

Coach was extremely pleased with the offensive effort, as they seemed to get a goal whenever it got close. Tim Hormes and Greg Rupert led with 4 goals apiece while freshmen continues his hot scoring with 3 goals. Bob Martino and Brian Johnson each added 1 goal.

The victory improved the Shoremen's record to 4-2. This weekend the Shoremen head up to face the #1 ranked Geneva juggernauts of Hobart College. The winner of that game will reign in the top spot - a spot seemingly unattainable in the past.

Baseball shows signs of life at the plate

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Baseball coach Ed Athey's analysis of his team seems deadly accurate at this point of the season. He believed that the squad's annual trip over spring break would tell a great deal about his team. Athey also suggested that the trip would bring his team closer together as a unit. Finally, the men's baseball coach said that the team's strength was with solid defense and experienced pitching, and that if they could receive some timely hitting they would be able to contend. So far, Athey appears to have analyzed the situation perfectly.

The team's spring trip was very successful this year. The team learned to play together as a unit, and they also came through with stellar defense. They also received well-pitched games from Chris Long, Chris Warren and Joe Boan. As predicted, the hitting was the last part of their game to come around.

Fortunately, the team has been able to supply the hitting necessary to win games so far this spring. Their season opener against Catholic showed Shoremen baseball at its finest. The team rapped out sixteen hits and scored seventeen runs in their first victory of the season. They also played solid defense behind pitcher Chris Long, who gave up nine hits and struck out five to earn the win. The offensive attack was led by Matt Giller, John Morrall and Hal McBee. The three combined to drive in thirteen runs on seven hits and lead the Shoremen to their 17-6 win over Catholic.

The team's first game after their trip came against Tufts University. This game was a heartbreaker for Shoremen fans. WC was able to come back from a four-run deficit to take an 8-7 lead at the end of the sixth inning, but Tufts scored five runs of their own in the top of the seventh to win 12-8. This game was a slugfest from the outset, featuring seven home runs. Joe Boan, Hal McBee and Chris Warren all connected for the Shoremen, who also got two doubles from Chris Driscoll in a losing effort.

The Shoremen played their next game this Monday against St. Mary's, and the result was more to their liking. Joe Boan came through with a wonderful effort on the mound, throwing a six-hitter for WC. McBee led the team offensively with three hits and two runs batted in. The Shoremen also played perfect defense as coach Athey's team raised their record to 2-1.

The baseball team continues their season this weekend with a home doubleheader against Haverford. The team then hits the road for two games against Gallaudet this Tuesday before returning home for a doubleheader against University of Maryland Eastern-Shore on Thursday.

NCAA tourney is best yet

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

This year's NCAA tournament has been the best in recent memory. I'm not just saying that because I'm an ACC fan. Of course, that is reason enough. Every ACC team in the tournament made an impact, from Duke and Georgia Tech in the Final Four to North Carolina and their stunning upset of Oklahoma. All year people talk about the Big Eight, Big East and Big Ten being the hotbeds of college basketball talent. I will admit that the Big Eight had three of the best teams in the nation this year, and the other two conferences did play exciting basketball. Still, both of those conferences appear to be overrated. Teams from the Big Ten and the Big East made up over 20% of the teams in the tournament, and yet each conference only managed to place one team in the final eight. Both teams then lost to ACC teams in the regional final. Needless to say, I have reason to gloat.

The tournament has also displayed a number of last-second heroics and close games. The Connecticut-Clemson game was the second most exciting game I've seen all year, right behind the Connecticut-Duke game in the regional final. By the way, how long will it be before Duke relocates its campus right outside the New Jersey Meadowlands? The Blue Devils are absolutely unbeatable in that building.

Loyola Marymount's roller coaster ride also captured the attention of millions of sports fans. The team reminded every fan that no matter how enthralling, basketball is just a sport. Bo Kimble, Paul Westhead and company played on emotion that I haven't seen in many years. The team's performance in the NCAA tournament made Hank Gathers and the rest of the basketball world proud.

I refuse to offer any Final Four predictions, since my prognosticating ability seems to have gone the way of Jimmy the Greek. All of my Final Four picks were wiped out, the last coming on Christian Laettner's miraculous double-pump twenty footer at the buzzer. I also miscalculated last season's Final Four horribly, so my only prediction this year is that the game will be exciting. The NCAA tournament is one of the few postseason performances that actually lives up to its billing, and one can only hope that this year the teams live up to the thriving tradition of heart-stopping finishes. If the quality of this year's tournament is any indication about the quality of the Final Four, then "March Madness" could continue the momentum they built up in the 1980's. The nineties looks very promising for college basketball and its fans.

Women's tennis shows benefits of trip, wins three matches

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Holly Bramble's women's tennis team is showing that their record from their spring trip was not indicative of the squad's talent. Their record on the trip was 1-4, but they were playing Division I and Division II opponents. The team is now back to Division III competition, and their spring trip has given them an extra edge that has resulted in three consecutive victories. Last week, the women defeated Hope, the sixth ranked team in the country. This week, the Shorewomen knocked off Swarthmore and Gettysburg, two of the top women's programs in the country. The team's record now stands at .500 despite returning from the spring trip with a record of 1-4.

Swarthmore arrived in Chestertown on March 21 for their Middle Atlantic Conference match. Swarthmore was the defending MAC champions, and their team included star tennis player Julie Shapiro. As one of the top players in Division III, Shapiro offered a strong challenge for Washington College netter Tracy Peel. This singles match showed Peel to be a much stronger player, winning in straight sets by a score of 6-4, 6-2. Monica Blanco dropped a hard-fought three set match, but Miriam Dittman and Meg Wheatley managed straight set victories to keep the match even as the singles events drew to a close.

The Washington College women won their match with their doubles play. The Shorewomen did not drop a set in their three doubles matches, giving the women a 6-3 victory over Swarthmore. Peel and Blanco combined for a 6-4, 6-2 win over Swarthmore's top doubles team, and the Washington College tandems of Dittman/Rice and Sloan/Wheatley also won in straight sets.

Coach Bramble looked at the victory as good preparation for their match against Gettysburg, the defending Southeast Section Middle Atlantic Conference champions. Gettysburg had captured the section seven of the last eight years, and the teams had developed a rivalry over the past few seasons. This was an extremely close match, and the outcome was not decided until the final doubles competition. The Shorewomen swept the top three singles matches. Peel won 6-0, 6-0 in her match, and Dittman only lost two games in her win. Blanco faced a tougher challenge, earning the victory in a third set tiebreaker. Gettysburg won the other three singles matches, tying the score as doubles began.

Peel and Blanco continued their brilliant play together, winning their doubles match by a score of 6-0, 6-2. Wheatley/Sloan were defeated, leaving the chances for a Shorewomen win resting on the shoulders of Miriam Dittman and Rachael Rice. The duo responded with a stirring three set victory, winning 6-3 in the third set. The win was an important one for the Shorewomen. Aside from the emotional boost, it gave Washington College an advantage in case the Middle Atlantic Conference section should come down to a tiebreaker.

The women's tennis team now has a spring season record of 4-4. The team begins a three match homestand on March 29 against Trenton State. The women then play Dickinson on the afternoon of Saturday, March 31 and Catholic University the following Tuesday, April 3.

News from around the world: Hazelwood sentenced

UNITED STATES:

In Alaska, the captain of the Exxon Valdez, Joseph Hazelwood, was found not guilty on all counts except willful spilling of oil. Hazelwood was fined $50,000 and sentenced to 1000 hours of community service. Hazelwood will perform his community service by helping to clean up the oil in Price William Sound.

The US Supreme Court has agreed to hear arguments in a case about a company's fetal protection policy. Johnson Controls, a car battery manufacturer, implemented a policy in 1982 that prohibited women of child-bearing age from performing factory tasks that involve exposure to lead unless the woman can prove she is unable to have children. United Auto Workers charges the policy is a form of sex discrimination, but a federal appeals court in Chicago threw the case out claiming that the policy was "reasonably necessary to the industrial safety-based concern of protecting the unborn child from lead exposure."

Scientific studies have shown that lead can cause damage to fetal brains and nervous systems. In 1985, the Center for Disease Control suggested that women of child bearing age be excluded from jobs involving lead exposure.

In Idaho, Governor Cecil D. Andrus said he would consult outside experts before deciding to veto or sign very restrictive abortion legislation. The Idaho measure bans abortions except in cases of rape and incest, and to save the mother's life. If Andrus does act on the bill, it will automatically become a law in July. Guam, a territory, of the US, recently passed the most restrictive abortion measure in the country. It prohibits abortions except to save the mother's life.

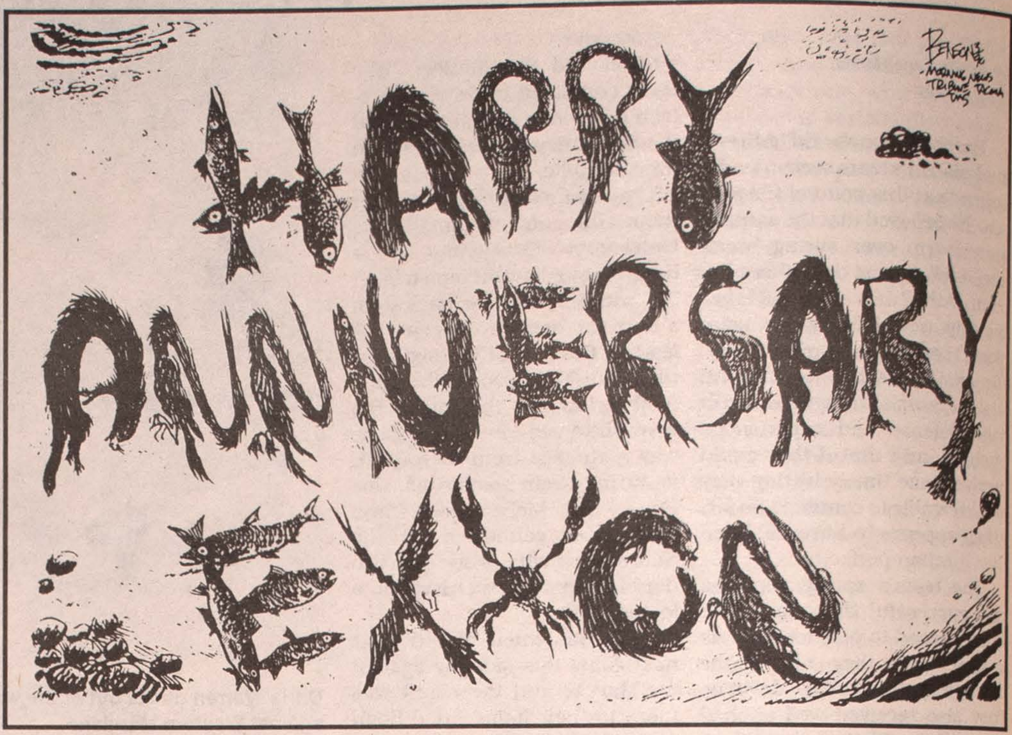
SOUTH AFRICA:

Eight people were killed and more than 340 wounded when police clashed with demonstrators in the Sebokeng township on Monday. 30,000 demonstrators had gathered outside of the municipal offices of the township to protest high rents and poor living conditions. Clashes between police and townspeople continued throughout the day and into the night. Sebokeng is roughly 25 miles south of Johannesburg.

There has been a renewal of violence in South Africa since the legalization of the African National Congress. Ironically, the rise in violence will probably lead to a delay in the lifting of the state of emergency in South Africa, one of the conditions set by the ANC before it would enter into negotiations with the government.

JAPAN:

Major General Henry C. Stackpole, III, a US marine general stationed in Japan, said that US troops must remain in Japan through the 1990's to prevent the Japanese from remilitarizing.



Stackpole's comments came after a column was printed in a Japanese newspaper which expressed the resentment that some Japanese feel over the US suggestion that the Japanese pay more of the costs of the American troops in Japan. Stackpole does agree with Defense Secretary Cheney that the number of troops in South-east Asia should be reduced. But Stackpole cited the uncertain balance of power on the Korean peninsula as a reason for the continuing presence of US troops in the area.

TAIWAN:

Last week, Taiwanese university students occupied Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Park in Taipei to demand revisions in the Taiwanese constitution that would lead to free and direct elections. The students are part of a growing movement to pressure President Lee Teng-hui into speeding up democratic reforms in Taiwan. The process of reform began under Chiang's son, Chiang Ching-kuo, who lifted martial law in 1987 and allowed visits to mainland China.

One of the largest problems facing President Lee is the dismissal of most of the National Assembly. Many members of the National Assembly were elected over 40 years ago and fled mainland China with Chiang Kai-shek's Kuomingtang in 1949. They were "frozen" in office by an emergency decree, and have remained there ever since. Few were tempted by Lee's offer of large pensions in return for leaving office.

EGYPT:

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak telephoned President Bush on March 17 to ask about US involvement in the fire at the suspected chemical plant at Rabta, Libya. The fire, on March 14, came about shortly after US officials denounced the plant as a chemical weapons factory.

In October, Mubarak and Khadafi met and pledged to renew ties and improve relations between Libya and Egypt. After speaking with President Bush, Mubarak relayed assurances to Khadafi that the US was not involved in the fire.

Initially, Khadafi blamed the fire on the West German Intelligence Services. West Germany denied the charges and warned Libya not to rebuild the plant.

LITHUANIA:

In the newly independent republic, official are speaking of lessening of tensions between the new government and the Soviet Union, although the army did occupy the offices of the Communist party over the weekend, and Lithuanian deserters from the Red Army who had taken refuge in a hospital under the protection of the Red Cross were brutally dragged from their sanctuary. Speaking on Soviet television, Mikhail Gorbachev said the Soviet Union would not use "cold war methods" and would respect the right of the people to choose. He also told Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts that he would not forcefully intervene unless lives were threatened. This qualifying statement alarmed the Lithuanian president who reminded western journalists that prior to that Gorbachev had stated he would not use force at all. Gorbachev also warned he has a "mandate to enforce the constitution" and still insists Lithuania's declaration of independence is illegal.

In the US, President Bush still supports Gorbachev's attempts to reform the Soviet Union but the President, along with other administration officials recently sought to remind Gorbachev that US support and commitment could be endangered by the military repression of Lithuania. Although the US has never recognized the annexation of any of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union, the US government has not yet recognized the new Lithuanian government.

Bob after midnight: a fictional story about hooking up

by Jenifer Grindle

You expect nothing because that's more than you'll ever get. Hair in stiff, sweeping curls across your shoulders, cool lips frosted peach, darkly outlined eyes clear, you step in the door unsmiling. Sharp, judgemental faces turn to glance at you without interest as you pass into the privacy of the crowd. Your hands are immediately full, busy, curved around cold plastic, other fingers holding warm, mouth-seeking reassurance. Bitter liquid follows exhaled vapors methodically, waiting for instinct to take over. You always seem to be waiting...waiting for something but you never know what...why?

"How's it going? Been here long?"

His face is familiar. Had she seen him at a party? In class? He was hot, why hadn't she noticed him before?

Her friend clears her throat and leans toward her. "I'll see you later," she whispers.

Sipping her beer, she looks over his shoulder and watches her friend disappear.

"I've been here about a half an hour. It was really lame at first but there's a lot more people here now."

"Yeah, I'm having a good time. I'm Scott." He grasps her hand with his warm, damp one.

"Hi," she says, raising the corners of her mouth and meeting his eyes. "So...have you been drinking long?"

He nods. "We got a case after dinner and just hung out at the dorm. How about you?"

"I did five or six shots before I came over," she says, waiting for his reaction. "I drink way too much."

"Never." He chugs the last half of his beer. "So...what's your major?"

You find yourself wandering restlessly, every room looking the same. The bass rhythm, small talk, and laughter suddenly increase to a hush. Acquaintances, hanging on your arm, tell you how great you are, guys you've been with before turn and smile, ask you how you've been, look at their friends and snicker. You keep trying to drown out the silence.

You find yourself thinking about when it was all new and wonder how it had changed. You keep looking for something new—new face, new conversation—something to separate one night from the rest, something you can or want to remember.

"Aren't you in my psych. class?" The guy beside her grabs her arm lightly.

"Oh, yeah...I think so. Isn't she a bitch?"

"A serious bitch, but at least her exams are easy. I'm Kevin by the way." She recognizes him, jealous stares tell her she should have known his name. "Need another beer?" He holds up his empty cup.

Quickly, she tosses back the rest of hers. "Sure."

He starts through the crowd and puts a hand back to lead her through. In a corner by the bar, he jpasses her a full cup. "What year are you, I don't think I've seen you before?"

"I'm a freshman. I didn't really go out a lot last semester."

"Too much studying for psych. tests, right?" They both laugh.

She frowns as his features blur... Where...uh...what was your name?

"Bob," he sticks out his hand, pretending to reintroduce himself, sloshing beer onto his shirt. "After midnight, anyway."

She's not really listening, but she looks up from sipping her drink and raises her eyes questioningly, smiling.

"Don't worry about my name, babe." His arm disappears around her. "Every guy's Bob after midnight."

You always know when it's coming. Standing close to some guy, watching his mouth while he talks, your head swimming as the shadows flicker on his face, feeling his eyes on your neck, your hair, his hand brushing your hip, pulling you closer...somehow.

Then, you're gone. You stop hearing his words, only see his lips slowly moving, smiling, stopping so you can react and you raise one corner of your mouth obligingly, breathing deeply to the rhythm of the music. You close your eyes, then tilt your head up and open them to look at him for the first time. Scott...or Brian or Jack...or Bob?

He slips his hand around you, resting it lightly on the small of your back, the tips of his fingers wavering there, burning. Suddenly, your mind becomes black, body bending, seeking rest, release. Knowing he's watching, his gaze firmly attached, you wander anxiously past gray, shapeless figures.

"Isn't that Kevin you've been talking to?" Her friend sucks in her stomach and stands on her tiptoes to examine her profile in the bathroom mirror. "I hear he's a major partier. You like him or something?"

Ignoring the question, she leans against the wall, watching her bright-eyed, red-lipped reflection. "S'hot as hell in 'ere," she says turning her head from side to side, her hair falling over her face.

"You look so wasted." The other girl loses her balance and puts a hand against the wall to steady herself. "I'm a little buzzed."

"D'I look ok?" She runs a hand through her hair and finds it wet, sticky.

"You look good." Her friend is bending over to pull up her pantyhose. "Do you want to head out soon?"

Her voice raises above a whisper for the first time. "No!...Why?" She begins to shuffle for the door, arms outstretched for support.

"Hey! Want me to wait around for you?" the other girl calls as the bathroom door swings shut.

You become aware that you're starting to get closed in. You consider leaving, easy avoidance practiced on others who were less...What was different about him? He seemed so...What would he think if you never came back? What if he really liked you?

You imagine him with someone more...someone who knew what she wanted and wouldn't...someone who would...You consider holding out for more.

"S'really hot in 'ere," she says as she takes her beer back from him.

"We could step outside for a little while." She feels him watching her intently for an answer.

"Oh..definitely." He pushes her toward the door, loudly greeting his friends, one hand massaging her neck.

She turns her face away as she passes by her friend. "You leaving?" The voice fades behind her. "If you wanted to go you should have told me."

Outside, she leans against the building. "I'd handle listening t'some mellow music."

"We could go back to my room and hang out." His arm curves around her shoulder.

She sighs and lets her head fall back. "That sounds so good. I'm really tired."

He grins and gives her a quick kiss. "Come on."

You think of guys you dated in high school. Shy phone call about a history test, voice and laugh too loud, talk wearing thin about classes until he asks 'So...uh...I was wondering...well...what you're doing Friday night' and you can finally let out your breath.

Dark eyes behind glasses, soft hair, flushed face...ski jacket warming you as you stand together behind the bleachers. Your eyelashes brushing a smooth cheek as his cool hand holds the hair off your neck, the other gently moving you to the music, corsages crushed. Mouths tasting buttery popcorn in front of a movie screen, wooden arm crushing your ribs, palm sliding over your stomach too hard. Firm chest pressing you to a wall in somebody's house, lips silencing your uncertainty...Warm skin on skin brushing gently for the first time...

You try to remember how it felt when guys made you nervous, before they wanted it or dared to try, before you knew how it would make you feel small and protected. You try to remember when it started to mean nothing.

"I'm really tired," he murmurs, settling onto his back. "You gonna crash?"

"I don't know." Her head feels heavy, her stomach churns. "Maybe I should go?"

"Come on, stay."

"I'll have to walk back early tomorrow...I don't know."

He turns her on her side to rest on his arm. "Just come here." He shuts his eyes.

Lying there, stiff-necked, she watches the harsh digital glow of the clock.

Body curled close, faking intimacy, you lie awake and wonder what the guy beside you was like before. You wonder if he worries about forgotten nights, names, having to look the other way if a passing face looks vaguely familiar. You wonder what happens when you look the other way with every passing face.

You imagine waking hair matted and mouth dry to cold, avoiding eyes, small talk strained, bare bodies unfamiliar. Minds seeking lost words and confessions, shutting out what is not forgotten but remains unsaid. You think of how much is never said...nothing is really ever said.

You look at the guy beside you and decide you don't feel like following the rules anymore. So he won't wake you dress on the floor, awkwardly, hands shaking, stumbling to your feet without a backwards look.

You shut the door behind you and try not to break into a run.

Two students speak about being arrested for DUI

by Katherine Absher
Staff Writer

"All my friends got together. We were talking about the summer over a few beers, and we decided we wanted to go out to Cliff City. I had the least to drink—three or four beers. I decided I would drive. We went into a turn. I was going too fast; I applied the brakes. The car pulled to the right. I over-compensated. The car started to flip and stopped when we hit the ditch. The car in front of us had seen the accident and called for help. My best-friend was unconscious next to me, and I just freaked. One second before that everything was different. It seemed like forever, but it was only about ten minutes until the fire company came."

Returning early for peer advising orientation in August of 1989, ready to begin a new school year, sophomore Debbie Johnson did not foresee that a few beers among friends and a road trip to watch the sun set into the Chesapeake would lead to charges of Driving Under the Influence.

Johnson's case was brought to trial, but she has no police record stating she was arrested for DUI. The judge hearing her case, Judge Sisk, reasoned that Johnson was a responsible student and possessed the ability to reform and learn from her actions. Therefore, he gave her 18 months probation before judgment.

He also gave 18 months probation to junior Ben Sadtler: "I was driving at a party. I was drinking rum and coke. My friend called up; he was out near Tochester. I drove his car out there. There was a car behind me. I didn't know it was a cop. He was right on my tail. I pulled over. I put on my turn signal to get back on the road, and I flashed him with my high beams." That was when the policemen turned around and arrested him for DUI and DWI (Driving While Intoxicated). Sadtler adds, "I didn't think it was that big of a deal until they put handcuffs on me and wouldn't let me go to the bathroom without the door open. Of course, I was drunk at the time. The next morning I was freaking out."

Besides Johnson and Sadtler, Sisk has also placed other Washington College students on probation for DUI before sentencing them. Yet, Sisk says, "I didn't want them to forget that they have been to court."

Although seven months have passed, Johnson and Sadtler certainly have not forgotten their experience. Two constant reminders of their arrest are their monthly meetings with their probation officer and their alcohol education meetings, lasting 15 weeks. If Johnson or Sadtler break any laws, including speed laws, their probation may be terminated.

Furthermore, under Sisk's paternal arm of justice, Johnson, Sadtler, and one other student have been ordered to lecture on their arrest for DUI at the college. So far, they have talked twice and shown an educational video on the risks of drinking and driving to a student audience.

These lectures are a new aspect of Sisk's probation program for college student DUI offenders. He explains, "I do worry about what's happening at the college because the college doesn't seem to be too worried about it. I think they should keep track of the parties that go on off-campus. They should require off-campus permission for parties."

A drunken night at the Tavern could lead to this startling sight in the sober light of morning.

Johnson states, "Since the accident, we would come up to parties on campus and leave our car at home...I've been drinking since the accident, but I definitely haven't been drinking and driving since."

Most college students have not dealt with Johnson's soul-searching experience, however, and many negligently drive home from the Tavern, Newts, or off-campus parties drunk.

In addition, one-third of the student body resides off-campus. This means instead of drunkenly swaying across the muddy campus greens and passing out in their dorm room, more students are driving home drunk from fraternity parties or other campus-alcohol related functions. The three student lecturers on probation all live off-campus.

Although moving off-campus has become the fashion, Sisk has not noted a rise in the number of college students in his courtroom because of it. Yet, Sisk comments, "We've had a tremendous loss of high school kids from drinking and driving in the last five years. It's a horror."

And he reasons students should be aware of the fatal consequences of drinking and driving: "You're old enough to understand what a loss of life is." A quarter of a million people have been killed in the last ten years from drunk drivers, and the vast majority of these drivers were only social drinkers.

Sisk blames this statistic on the trend among the young of drinking to excess: "Partying means you get so drunk you can't stand up. That's a sacrilege. If you have to drink, at least don't drink in such a silly way to become drunk. Tune into your body. If you are running and something hurts you, you slow up. Why can't you do the same with drinking?"

Johnson definitely understands about moderation after her encounter with the law and wants to impart her experience to others: "A lot of times I find myself saying to my friends who are aware of what has happened, 'You've had too much to drink.' And when I say this, they know it has a lot of meaning behind it because of what happened to me." Sadtler adds: "He [Sisk] said a lot of people get DWI over and over again, but I don't think I will. I really don't."

Your cup of coffee leads to global warming

by Juli Michael

How does your cup of coffee contribute to global warming, depletion of the ozone layer, and the general destruction of the environment? Energy is used in every step of the products we use. Much of the needed energy to produce these products is produced by burning fossil fuels, contributing to the problem of global warming.

In addition, the production of styrofoam packaging and disposables increases the use of harmful toxins and fills up landfills.

Chlorofluorocarbons are gases used as refrigerants (freon) and in plastic foams for products such as coffee cups. Chlorofluorcarbons contribute to the problem of global warming by emmitting harmful gas into the atmosphere which allow sunlight to enter the atmosphere but then become trapped. These gases become so condensed in the stratosphere that sunlight can pass through, but it is not filtered out as it is under normal conditions. Scientists predict climatic changes from the earth's warming are expected to melt glaciers and ice caps, causing sea levels to rise five to seven feet by the year 2100. The result would be the flooding of virtually every city around the world. In parts of the globe, rainfall could decline as much as 90%, causing mass starvation on an unprecedented scale. Hundred of plant and animal species unable to adapt to these changes are likely to become extinct.

Besides contributing to global warming, chlorfluorocarbons breakdown the Earth's protective ozone layer. The ozone layer in the upper stratosphere protects the earth from the sun's harmful radiation. As the CFC's breakdown the ozone molecules, more harmful radiation can pass through the atmosphere to the earth. Scientists predict by the middle of next century the amount of harmful radiation reaching the ground could increase by 15%. Exposure to radiation levels of this intensity suppresses the human imune systme, permitting growth of infectious diseases. The EPA estimates a 15% increase in harmful ultravilet rays would cause 1.5 million additional skin cancer cases worldwide each year. Plants and other animals are extremely sensitive to excess radiation as well.

The facts are: 1. Styrofoam contributes to the problem of global warming.

2. Styrofoam contributes to the problem of the destruction of the ozone layer.

3. Styrofoam contributes to the problem of NONBIODEGRADABLE waste.

So, what can a Washington College student do? Protest the use of styrofoam. Make it a personal decision not to accept food or drinks served in styrofoam. Like I mentioned in my article last week, since it is not biodegradeable, it never goes away. If yo drink coffee or tea, why not carry around your own mug? When you go to buy coffee or tea, just ask whom ever you are buying from to fill your cup. Think about it, it saves them money on disposables, and you have nothing to throw away. Voice your opinion— make a request to food places to switch to paper (or better yet, glass, or ceramic.) Once you become conscious of it, you'll realize how evil styrofoam is! A lot of places use it, and it is hard to get away from! Sooner or later we are going to be forced to give up styrofoam. Why not make it sooner? If you would like to get any more information on styrofoam here are some addresses: Cool It / Kristen Brown / National Wildlife Federation / 1400 16th St. N.W. / Washington DC 20036 / (202) 797-5467 / (Cool It is an organization run solely by students), The Greenhouse Crisis Foundation / 1130 17th St. N.W., suite #630 / Washington DC 20036 / (202) 466-2823.

Waverly Consort: Medieval, Renaissance music

The Waverly Consort, comprised of ten musicians total, four of whom perform on authentic reproductions of period instruments and six of whom sing, will play in Tawes Theater following a preconcert lecture by Dr. Jessic Ann Owens, entitled, "The Music of Renaissance Italy." (photo by Steve J. Sherman)

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

By arrangement with Harold Shaw and under the direction of Michael Jaffee, the Waverly Consort will perform music of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, marks the second Washington College Concert Series program of the spring semester.

Comprised of ten singers and players and boasting a repertoire covering five centuries, the ensemble, which has been featured on major radio and television network presentations, will perform tomorrow night in Tawes Theater, following a preconcert lecture, "The Music of Renaissance Italy."

Sponsored in part by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the lecture by Dr. Jessie Ann Owens will explore the role of music in Renaissance Italy and will be held at 6:30 PM in the Norman James Theater.

Holding degrees from both Barnard College and Princeton University, Dr. Owens, a scholar in the field of Renaissance music, previously taught at Columbia University and the Eastman School of Music. Presently, she is Associate Professor of Music and Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Brandeis University.

Compositional process in Renaissance music, English 16th- and 17th-century theory and music at the Este court at Ferrara are examples of Owens' wide range of research and writing topics. Articles of Owen's have been published in the Journal of the American Musicological Society, Renaissance Quarterly and Early Music History.

Focusing on the close relationship between style and function in music of the Italian Renaissance, Dr. Owens will pay particular attention to the different contexts for musical performance: churches, courts and city streets.

Following the presentation in the Norman James Theater, is the Waverly Consort's performance of "Italia Mia": A Musical Tour of Italy in the Renaissance, funded in part by a grant from the Kent County Arts Council.

Acclaimed by William Cowdery of the Ithaca Journal as "America's foremost purveyor of Renaissance music," the Waverly Consort, he describes, "combines high-spirited music with a reverence for the past, but always avoiding the esoteric for its own sake."

Agrees Alan Rich, LA's Herald Examiner music critic: "The real achievement is to recognize the creative energy in the music's original design, and to find a contemporary counterpart....it is the triumph of the Waverly Consort today."

The ensemble, celebrating its 25th anniversary, was organized at New York University where Michael and Kay Jaffee were joined by fellow graduate students in performances of Medieval and Renaissance music, making its public debut at Carnegie Recital Hall in April of 1966.

Appearing in the Casals, Hong Kong and Madeira Bach Festivals, the Waverly Consort is also highly visible in the US and has been the subject of several half-hour CBS specials on the award-winning Camera Three program and recently performed in the TV special I Leonardo.

What is so attractive about the ensemble, according to the New York Times critic Tim Page, is that they "seem more interested in music making, pure and simple, than presenting a stylistic dissertation," emphasizing the group's "balance between austere scholasticism and a more intuitive manner of playing."

Four of the Consort's members perform on authentic reproductions of the instruments from the Medieval and Renaissance periods, including recorders, dulcian, krummhorn, shawm, rauschpfeife, viols and vihuela.

Each member of the audience will receive the Waverly Consort Program Guide, providing complete text and translations of the vocal music performed during the concert, information about original sources and modern editions of the musical selections and high-quality reproductions of manuscript pages, paintings and other illustrations.

The Waverly Consort will begin their performance at 8 PM in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center after the 6:30 lecture on Italian Renaissance music by Dr. Jessie Ann Owens in the Norman James Theater.

Students and faculty are reminded that they may use the tickets issued by the Concert Series last semester for free admission.

Tickets for adults are $8 at the box office on performance night; children will be admitted free. No reservations will be taken, and early arrival is recommended.

Baby with the Bathwater :

"the inanities of parenthood and family life"

by Timothy J. Madison

Christopher Durang's black comedy, Baby with the Bathwater, opens in Tawes Theater on Thursday, April 5 and runs through Saturday, April 7. The play is a funny, bitter and sometimes chilling examination of the inanities of parenthood and family life.

Baby with the Bathwater is the senior project of drama majors Emily Lott and Wendy Snow. Lott, the play's director, says she chose Durang's play because, "Although it's a very comical piece, it makes a serious statement on how society controls us and the way we think."

The play centers around a young couple, John (Jason West) and Helen (Stephanie Hess) who have been so affected by the diction of society that, in Lott's words, "They end up ruining their child."

Michele Volansky, dramaturg and stage manager, describes Baby with the Bahtwater as a "dramaturg's nightmare," adding, "There are so many references and allusions which seem to place the play in time, but really the characters experience no real progression." As Lott says, "If anything, John and Helen almost regress."

Set and costume designer Wendy Snow has incorporated this idea of a lack of progression into her set design. The audience seating and set will form a single integrated unit modeled after her vision of a sort of carnival ride.

Snow sees the carnival ride as an apt metaphor for the characters fundamental dilemma. They live in a world in which, as Snow says, "You go around and around, you have fun and feel sort of sick, but when it's over you haven't really gotten anywhere."

The cast includes: Felicia Shakman as Nanny and the Principal, Cynthia Croot as Cynthia and Susan, Carey Smith as Miss Pringle and Angela, Jeanette Smith as Kate, Peter Johnson as Daisy and Brendan Casey as the Voice.

Comprising the production crew are: Thomas Andrews as Technical Director and Peter Johnson as Lighting Designer.

Baby with the Bathwater will be presented at 8 PM on April 5,6 and 7 in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center.

Admission is free and seating is limited; reservations are recommended. To reserve tickets, call (301) 778-2800 ext. 269 or 268.

Philosophy symposium

by Kevin Holland

Washington College's chapter of Phi Sigma Tau, the national philosophy honor society, will sponsor a student symposium on Just War Theory in an all-day event. Also participating in the proceedings will be members of the Philosophy Club at the United States Military Academy in West Point. According to Dr. J. David Newell, who is teaching at West Point while on sabbatical from WC, he and West Point officers and cadets will arrive in Chestertown on Friday.

West Point's Philosophy Club, comprised mostly of philosophy majors at the institution, will present three or four brief essays at the symposium addressing the questions: "Can going to war be justified? If so, how can such justification be established?"

In regard to the activities scheduled for the day, Dr. Newell explains, "It was my understanding that the cadets would present their essays on Just War, and then the Washington College students would respond to their ideas."

While at Washington College, Dr. Newell, Philosophy Department Chair, worked closely with the Phi Sigma Tau chapter, usually as the club's sponsor and remembers, "When I came up here, I saw West Point had an active Philosophy Club, so I have been working with them as well."

The idea for the symposium with the two colleges followed as a result of his involvement with West Point's club, but Dr. Newell stresses, "All the credit for the symposium should go to Erica Dickson. She has worked very hard in planning and organizing the event." Junior Erica Dickson is this year's president of Phi Sigma Tau.

The day's events will begin at 10:30 Saturday morning with registration in Hodson Hall. West Point cadets will be staying with student volunteers the night before. Following the afternoon session, students will tour the exhibit "Constance Stuart Larrabee: World War II Photo Journal" in the Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center. Closing the symposium will be a 7:45 PM showing of Stanley Kubrick's film, Paths of Glory, in the Norman James Theater. All sessions of the day-long event are open to the public, and admission is free.

ARTS

Sinead O'Connor's I do not want what i haven't got

by Bruce Hamilton

You really can't help but like Sinead O'Connor. What? I hate her, you say, offended that I could make such an assumption. Well, I can only say that judging an artist by their audience, their appearance, their popularity or anything other than their work...well, that's just idiotic– and a common fault of too many, it seems. Everyone has a different reaction to or perception of the same thing– that's human nature. O'Connor shaved her head in response to the record companies desire for her to present a more feminine image. She's been headstrong and rebellious since her childhood.

But is this any basis to form an opinion of her work? An Irish Catholic, Sinead fist achieved real success with the release of Captive. The Edge, of U2 fame, was working on the soundtrack and requested asked her to record a song. "Heroine" was the result. Her subsequent album, The Lion and the Cobra went gold when she was 21.

Those piercing blue eyes, that sculpted face, that passionate voice...that bald head. Well, she's not so bald anymore. Hair is not the only growth that Sinead O'Connor has achieved in the past few years. Her new album, I do not want what I haven't got is a work of considerable maturity and change. A past pregnancy, the death of her mother, changing relationships and virtually overnight fame have had their effects on this young woman. "I do not want" is a statement of adamant individualism and artistic freedom. On it she adresses a number of themes, including politics, religion, maternity and the more personal aspect of relationships.

What I haven't got contains a complex new blend of styles. Sinead explores more fully the dynamic as well as the subtle with her glass-breaking voice. With her first album, Sinead stuck an icicle in your heart and twisted it around until you were bleeding right along with her. Now she seems to have learned a more effective method: the art of control. Silences and seductive whispers take the place of earth-shaking howls. This is not to say she has lost the aggressive confrontational touch, but rather that, she has added the elements of serenity and magnetic elusiveness. If you thought her screams were powerful, wait until you hear her whisper.

The album opens with "Feel so different," an appropriate beginning as it is, thematically, perfectly representative of the whole. "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference" is the opening prayer, ominous as the orchestration kicks in.

An anthem of change and maturation, "different" explores the emotive side of growth and a typical relationship with the constructed other, a "you" constantly referred to that could be anyone from her husband to her mother. Lines like "I am not like I was before/ I thought that nothing would change me/ I was not listening anymore/Still you continue to affect me" echo the element of change and introspection that pervade the album.

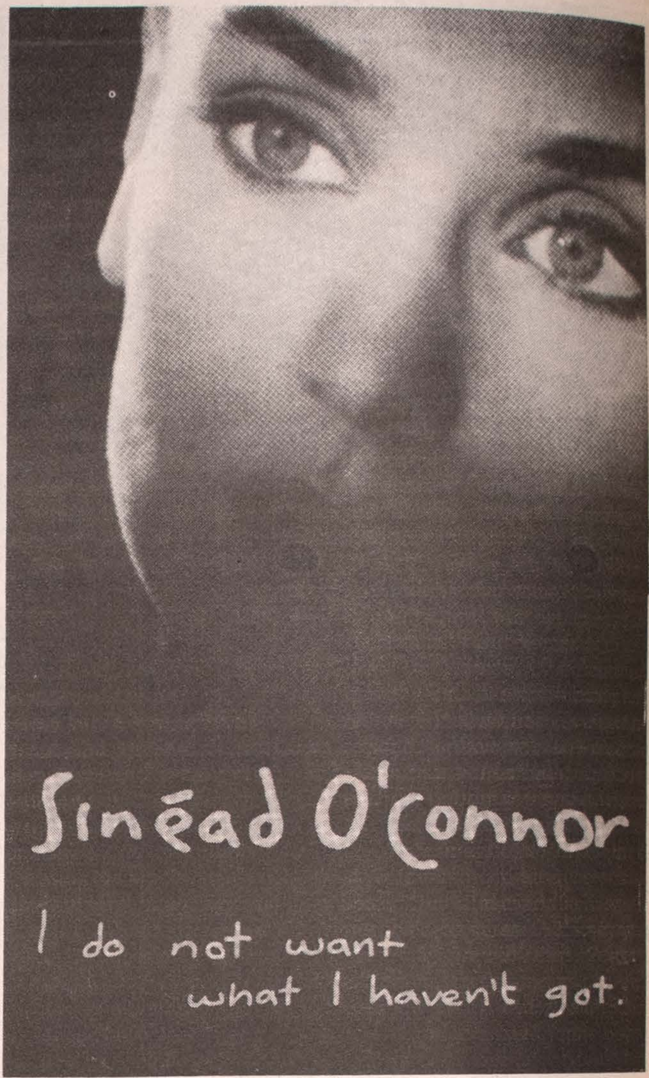
"I am stretched on your grave" is an amazing effort that sounds almost as if Sinead is imitating the style of a Hindu singer like Ofra Haza. Backed by a punchy 'hip-hop' beat, Sinead undulates in a rythmic musical contortion. The song seems to be concerned with a childhood girlfriend now dead, though the nature of this relationship is unclear. Lines like "Thanks be to Jesus/ we did what was right/ and your maidenhead still/ is your pillar of light" are as intriguing as they are mysterious," but don't count on SInead to explain. The song, like the others, is accompanied only by drums and orchestration. It closes with a frenetic violin solo.

"Three Babies" is an equally enigmatic and elusive song. It is the track most reminiscent of her previous album. The tempo slows and begins with a slow acoustic guitar. Perhaps Sinead is referring to aborted children, perhaps she actually has three children (I only know of one), and I am simply ignorant. It is at least poetic license: "Each of these/ my babies/ have brought you closer to me/ no longer mad like a horse/ I'm still wild but not lost/ from the thing that I've chosen to be." These lyrics express all the sentiments and responsibility of motherhood.

One can see that Sinead was profoundly affected by maternity. "Three Babies" exemplifies her ability to do with a feather what she used to do with a hammer: she is more enticing the more subdued she becomes, only to rage once again into a piercing cry. Effective.

"The emperor's new clothes," a song about stardom, pregnancy and their effects on a relationship, is also one of the finer tracks on the album. It also has a dancy beat reminiscent of "mandinka" with a crafty pop fervor. Lines like "He thinks I just became famous and that's what messed me up/ but he's wrong/ who I could I possibly know what I want/ when I was only twenty-one" and "But you know how it is/ and how a pregnancy can change you" illustrate the turmoil of a relationship changed by success and motherhood.

The first side closes on a more somber note: "Black boys on mopeds," a song that addresses political issues like racial problems, the homeless and "the deaths that took place in Bejing." Sinead plays acoustic guitar and sings quietly, "England's not the mythical land of madame George and roses/ it's the home of police who kill black boys on mopeds." When the first side is over, the result is nothing short of haunting.



"Nothing compares 2 U" was written by Prince and released before the album as a single. It is a romantic ballad about lost love and admiration. Although the lyrics bear the stamp of the purple one heavily, Sinead only improves on it with her voice.

"Jump in the river" was previously released as a single on the Married to the Mob soundtrack and later as a remix with a performance artist, Karen Pirroni. The remix is nothing short of raunchy, but the original is startling simply as a beautiful siren song. It is a poetic and intensely psychosexual effort, ranging from the tame "I thought I tasted too many cigarettes/ but you tasted like wine" to the growl "like the times we did it so hard/ there was blood on the wall."

On "You cause as much sorrow" Sinead seems to be attacking the memory of someone now dead: "You've done nothing so far but destroy my life/ you cause as much sorrow dead/ as you did when you were alive." She seems to become more etheral at this point. She also takes a stab at her own fame, singing "So you're a fool to attack me/ for the image you built yourself."

"The last day of our acquaintance" is a touching ballad about the end of friendship. The last songs dissipate until Sinead is nothing more than a whisper- on the final track, "I do not want...," she seems to have taken lessons from Margo Timmins.

The album as a whole is not fantastic, nor is it mediocre; it marks Sinead's emergence as a maturing artist and forces you to take her seriously. It is a likable album, one that grows on you each time you listen to it. Some may fail to appreciate it as a musical effort, but one must realize that the emphasis is on Sinead's voice– the music and orchestra that serve as background only underline the passionate force that comes from her singing.

I think we can expect great things from her in the future. Outspoken and stubborn, Sinead holds her own and speaks her mind. I do not want is a refreshing effort from an intense and serious-minded artist. It is worth a listen.

Campus Calendar: March 30-April 5

Friday, March 30

The WC Film Series presents Dangerous Liasons in the Norman James Theater at 7:30 PM. Admission is $1 for students, faculty and staff; $2 for all others. Also showing Sunday, April 1 and Monday, April 2 at 7:30 PM.

"An Evening in Vienna" will be performed by the Washington College Community Chorus at 8 PM in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center, following the recreation of a Viennese coffeehouse in Tawes Lobby, where from 7-8 PM, pastries, coffee and tea will be sold.

Derry Berry and the Alagia will perform in the Coffee House at 9 PM. Admission is $2, and alcoholic beverages will be available to those with proper ID.

Saturday, March 31

In honor of President and Mrs. Douglass Cater, there will be an Alumni Celebration held at the Engineering Society of Baltimore from 5-8 PM.

The Waverly Consort will perform in a concert sponsored by the WC Concert Series. Students and faculty may use the tickets distributed last fall to gain free admission. Otherwise, tickets are $8.

Phi Sigma Tau presents a symposium on Just War Theory in conjunction with West Point Cadets, beginning at 10:30 AM with registration in Hodson Hall.

Tuesday, April 3

Henry Abraham of UVA discusses "The Supreme Court: Its Personalities and Its Powers" in a lecture sponsored by WC's Louis L. Goldstein Program in Public Affairs. The talk is scheduled for 7:30 PM in the Norman James Theater.

Thursday, April 5

The WC Lecture Series presents "The Fall of Jim Wright," a talk by John Barry at 8 PM in the Sophie Kerr Room.

Christopher Durang's Baby with the Bathwater will be performed by the WC Drama Department in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center at 8 PM. Admission is free. Also April 6 and April 7.

new developments in the importance of foreign language study

By John Omicinski

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

WASHINGTON — Spurred by global turmoil, language study is making a comeback in American schools and boardrooms, with German and Japanese near the top of the list.

"German's really taken off," said Anthony Tedesco, vice president of Berlitz North America, a leading marketer of language instruction. "It's always been a fairly important language, but requests for lessons are up 20 percent to 25 percent."

Twenty-three states now require some language study to get into public colleges and universities — a sizable rebound from the 1960s, when states and universities dropped language requirements.

By 1986, college enrollments in languages inched back up to 1 million for the first time in 14 years, and there are signs that elementary schools may be the next frontier in language study.

"Whether it's a pendulum swing, I don't know. But for the first time in 10 years, there seems to be a surge in enrollments in both high schools and college," said Richard Lambert, director of the National Foreign Language Center at Johns Hopkins University.

It's a good thing, too, said Myriam Met, language instruction coordinator for Montgomery County, Md., where French, Spanish and Japanese are taught in elementary schools.

"Foreign languages will be the survival skill of the 21st century," Met said. "It has the potential to be the wave of the future if we can solve the teacher shortage."

A recent Joint National Committee for Languages survey found 24 states — mostly in the South and Midwest — contending with shortages of high school-language teachers.

Of 26 states using language teachers in grade schools, 17 reported shortages — caused largely by the collapse in college requirements.

"We had an incredible drop in the '70s," said C. Edward Scebold, director of the American Council of Teachers of Foreign Languages, whose membership plummeted to 5,000 a decade ago and has inched back to 8,000. "Now, most major metropolitan areas report shortages of language teachers."

The real boom in schools is in Japanese. From a start of zero a few years ago, about 300 high schools now offer Japanese.

"Finding quality teachers is pretty difficult," said Carol Bond of Urbana, Ill., who coordinates the Japanese Language Teachers Network.

In Portland, Ore., and Fairfax County, Va., first- and second-graders are learning math, science and health in Japanese "immersion" courses.

Europe's new look is reshaping Berlitz' business, Tedesco said.

"In Hungarian, Czech and Polish — languages we might teach to 200 in a year — we're getting groups wanting to learn them," he said.

Tedesco said there also is a surge in Romanian, Ukrainian, Armenian and Serbo-Croatia.

Tedesco expects German, usually fourth behind French in American lessons, to climb to third in 1990. English, however, remains the worldwide leader.

"We'll probably reopen offices for the first time since World War II in places like Budapest, East Germany, Moscow, Warsaw, Sofia and Leipzig."

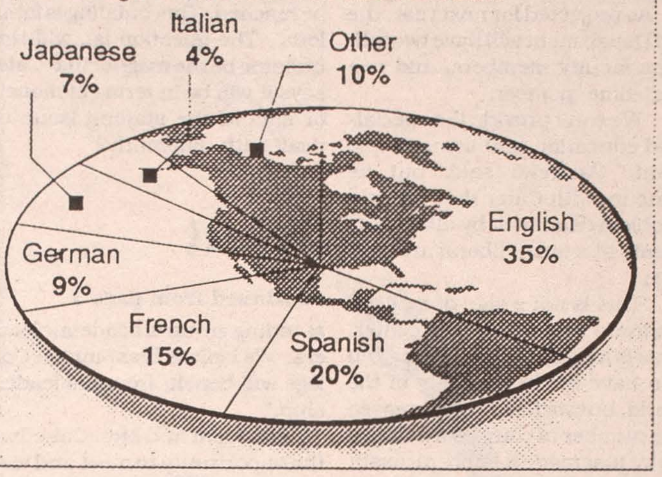
English lessons make up 62 percent of Berlitz' worldwide business, and 35 percent in the United States, he said.

At the Monterey Institute of International Studies in California, the only private graduate school in translation, there is renewed interest in intensive summer courses.

"Spanish is up 30 percent," said Vice President David McIntyre. "Japanese and Russian are up 20 percent, but the biggest jump is in people from foreign countries learning English. That's up 100 percent."

Most popular languages

In 1989, 900,000 students took language lessons nationwide at Berlitz North America, a leading marketer of language instruction. Here's a breakdown of the most popular languages and the percentage of students who studied each:



Steve Reed, Gannett News Service

Margareta Bowen, head of Georgetown University's interpretation and translation division, sees a "heightened interest in the harder languages — Japanese, Chinese, Russian."

This year, she said, 30 students petitioned for a course in Korean. Ironically, a major force that probably has discouraged language study in the past is the global pervasiveness of English, "the first truly global language," according to authors Robert McCrum, William Cran and Robert MacNeil in "The Story of English."

Yet only a handful of world's 147 nations use English as a native language.

English is the mother tongue of 350 million people — less than one-tenth of the world's population.

"It's partly good fortune that English has become the lingua franca," said Fred Starr, president of Oberlin College in Ohio and a driving force on the 1979 White House commission that called the shortfall in language instruction "nothing short of scandalous."

"But most of it's provincialism, pure and simple," Starr said. "Sooner or later a brute reality will make itself felt. In the same way the Soviets realized that they could no longer support their system, Americans will realize they can't operate effectively with one language."

SGA meeting report, new officers take control

by Kyndra Ponder

At Tuesday's SGA meeting, the newly elected SGA Executive officers presided over their first meeting, however only eleven of the twenty-seven Senators were present; therefore the meeting was unofficial.

The first order of business was to introduce Dr. Stewart, who is the new SGA Faculty Adviser, and Gordy Scherer, who will serve as the SGA Parliamentarian.

Co-chairman of the Social Committee Katie Simms, reported that Black Sheep, the reggae band who appeared here in February, will play at the April 28 Luau. The cost to see the band appearing Friday night in the Coffee House will be $2.

SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson reported that the SGA currently has about $8700 and that a more accurate account of the money will be available at the next meeting. He then reported that two clubs have requested funding. The SGA approved the funds for:

1. Psychology Club— requested $200 carried over from last semester and $200 for this semester - total: $400

2. The Society of Twelve— a new committee of faculty and students to recognize the achievements of some of WC's unsung heroes— total: $100

A proposal was submitted that the Honor Code committee look into the possibility of having different colored "blue books" to prevent students from turning in already prepared exams. In addition, the SGA agreed that, in general, the faculty could do more to prevent cheating. Dr. Stewart said that he would bring the subject up at faculty meetings and Kevin Kelly agreed to handle it in the Student Academic Board.

Finally, SGA President Stuart Neiman reported that he will begin the first of the public opinion polls next week. The poll will be a simple questionnaire asking students to indicate their choice among a list of ideas for the the decor in Hodson Hall. On-campus students should receive the poll from their dorm senator. Off-campus students will find a copy of the questionnaire, and directions for returning it, in next week's Elm.

Anthropology honor course offered

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College Professor Jeanette Sherbondy is offering an honors course in Anthropology next semester which may be of interest to students. The title of the course? "What it means to be human."

Sherbondy describes the course as "an inquiry into the human mind and heart. It is about people— about how they think and act, and why they are the way they are. It is a course about the most complex and mysterious puzzle on earth: ourselves and others."

She intends to investigate with students everything from "the implications of human diversity" to "the interconnectedness of humankind."

The course is entitled "Anthropology 205.90 : What it Means to be Human" and the only prerequisites for interested students are either a 3.0 grade point average or special permission from Sherbondy.

Art major sabbatical, if the administration cannot find the funds to continue to pay him a full-time salary, he will only be hired on a part-time basis next year.

"The prognosis is not good," he said.

In a recent meeting with art majors called by Cater to discuss the rumors, students expressed concern that Andrews might leave the College.

Even if Andrews doesn't leave, Tessem maintains that the department needs another art historian and an additional member to teach studio art courses; the studio art teacher could be a part-time member. She says that she has requested additional faculty for three years and hasn't "gotten to first base" with the administration.

"How can we teach a rotation of [studio] courses with only one full-time faculty member?"

Cater argues that in terms of numbers of majors, the Art Department comes at the bottom of the majors at the College, and a small liberal arts school can't support departments which cover all aspects of a subject. Programs then are meant to "encourage students to cultivate their talents."

Andrews says that in terms of the numbers of students who take art courses, the Art Department doesn't appear to be overtasked, but he says that the number of hours spent by Tessem and himself working with students are "more intense."

Furthermore, Andrews points out that in fact there are at least as many art majors as music majors, but the Music Department has three full-time faculty members, as well as additional part-time faculty who teach instruments. The number of art majors is also competitive with drama and modern languages.

As projected for next year, the Art Department will have two full-time faculty members, and one part-time member.

"We can't provide the specialized education that some people want," Andrews said, but he concurs with Cater that this is a problem dealt with by all departments at a small liberal arts college.

"This is not a sign of malice," Andrews said of the arts center, "this is a sign of beneficence. You can have the best facility in the world, but we have not increased the number of courses available, we've just made it [more pleasant to take existing courses]."

The department has made great strides in terms of facilities, moving from the cramped quarters of McAlpin House to the resplendent Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center. Presently, there is no endowment to provide for the maintenance of the facility or supplies.

Although fundraising efforts for the center are continuing, Cater says he can't "invent money."

"Why is it [the administration] can't find money for a program that's established?" Tessem asked.

If the Art Department continues to play what Andrews calls "the numbers game" and attracts more majors, he says that the department may acquire additional faculty members.

"Let's hope a compromise can be reached. This building is fabulous. The question is...will this building be the magnet that Cater says it will be in terms of money, or should the staffing issue be dealt with differently?"

standing group of academic leaders. We believe Washington College will benefit from his leadership."

President and Mrs. Cater had the opportunity to meet and visit with Dr. and Mrs. Trout in the Hynson Ringgold House, long-time residence of the Washington College president. Both Caters voiced enthusiasm over their successors.

Dr. Trout was previously Chairman of the Department of History at Mount Holyoke College, where he joined the faculty in 1969 and taught a wide variety of courses centered on the socio-political history of 19th and 20th century America. While at Mount Holyoke he was named a National Endowment for the Humanities Senior Fellow.

In 1978-79 he was a Charles Warren Fellow at Harvard University. He began his teaching career at the secondary level, at The Hill School in Pottstown, Pennsylvania and at The Phillips Exeter Academy in Exeter, New Hampshire.

Dr. Trout received his bachelor's degree from Amherst College in 1957 and holds a master's degree (1961) and doctorate (1972) in American History from Columbia University.

In 1977, he published Boston, The Great Depression, and the New Deal and is currently at work on a second book, Curley of Boston: A Biography. He has also authored dozens of articles, papers and reviews for history books and journals.

Dr. Trout has served as consultant to the John F. Kennedy Library, the National Endowment for the Humanities, Forum 350 (historical projects in connection with Boston's 350th anniversary), and for several television programs, including "Runaway Shops in Massachusetts" for the National Endowment for the Humanities and "James Michael Curley and His World" for Channel 7 in Boston. He has lectured widely on the history of Boston and on the history of women's issues and urban turmoil in the United States.

"I don't for a moment underestimate the challenge of succeeding a president who has bequeathed such an extraordinary legacy," Trout commented. "During Douglass Cater's time at the helm, Washington College has flourished in every imaginable way. I accept this appointment with a sense of pleasure, humility, and anticipation."

Dr. Trout is married to the former Katherine Taylor. He has two sons, Nicholas and Benjamin of Portland, Maine, and a step-daughter, Katherine D. Griffiths, a student at Brown University.

Commencing in September, Douglass and Libby Cater will be residents of Chapel Hill where he has accepted a year's appointment as the first Senior Fellow in Public Affairs at the National Humanities Center.

The Center's Director, Robert Connor, announced: "This appointment continues the Center's commitment to exploring the links between humanistic scholarship and fundamental concerns behind the issues of civic and political life. We are eager to provide a setting that will advance Mr. Cater's scholarly projects and we wish to benefit from his experience and wisdom in this area."

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Here are a couple of fascinating facts I thought might interest you. Bananas are frequently mentioned as a food high in potassium, but potatoes actually contain nearly twice as much. One large banana has 450 milligrams of potassium, while a large baked potato with its skin contains about 850 milligrams. The skin of the potato alone has about 235 milligrams of potassium.

Saltwater fish are generally no higher in sodium than freshwater fish. Fish have an internal regulatory system that prevents their flesh from taking up sodium from the water. How about that?

Hoped you all enjoyed dinner Wednesday. I heard many favorable responses about the food show. The Italian Chicken Fingers seem to be a real favorite with everyone. Thanks to all of you who filled out the questionaire. And a special thanks to Mike Rogers and T. Furr & Company for all their assistance with the show.

Next Wednesday, April 4th, we will be featuring a Tyson Food Show. There will also be a Schwinn bicycle given away that evening, at 6:00P.M. More on how you can win the bicycle will appear in the Dining Hall beginning Sunday.

Congratulations to Mr. Howard Schultz for being selected W.C.D.S. EMPLOYEE OF THE MONTH for February. Way to go Mr. Howard!!!

A special note to the LAX team... if you are going to be late arriving for dinner, give us a call. I hate to see you guys come in after the meal has ended and not be able to get a hot meal. If you could give us some notice we would be more than glad to hold dinner for you.

Well, I guess that is it for another week. Until next time..................MOM

Dangerous LIAISONS

A severe and powerful adaptation of Laclos' notorious 18th century epistolary novel of seduction and ruin. Stephen Frears' (My Beautiful Laundrette.) direction is superb—swift, decisive, witty. The movie is visually impressive without pomp; the screenplay, by Christopher Hampton, is fine. With John Malkovich and Glenn Close as the schemers who make sexual sport with the young and innocent, and Michelle Pfeiffer, in a strikingly disciplined performance, as a victim.

Washington College awarded $100,000

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College may soon join the ranks of environmentally conscious colleges and universities as the Jessie Ball DuPont and the Chesapeake Bay Foundations (CBF) have recently awarded funds to interested and qualified students.

The money will provide the means for important work study internships in a "broad range" of possible projects, according to Professor Munson, Chairman of Biology and the chairperson of the as yet unformed steering committee which will guide involved students.

Munson stressed that students need not be science majors and therefore the projects need not be strictly scientific. "But we would need to try to orient ourselves toward the Chesapeake Bay area."

A maximum of four projects will be funded, "but we'll start with two. We want to make sure that this is done correctly and academically with lots of checks and balances."

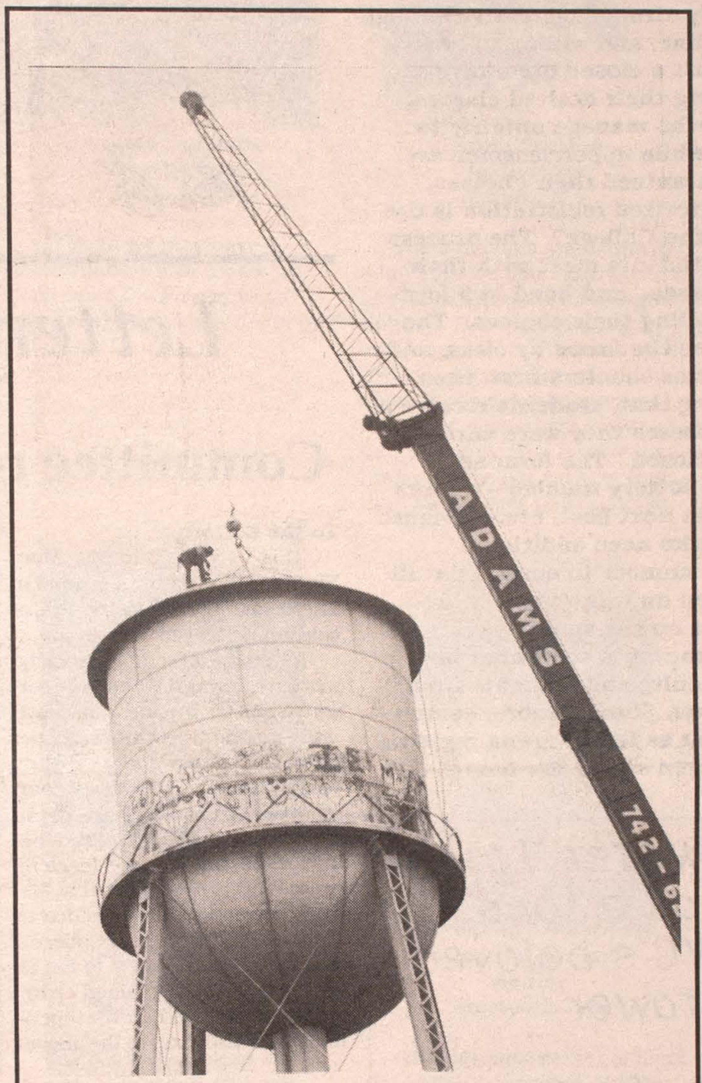
Munson stated that the possibilities at Washington College are "exciting. We are located on the Chesapeake Bay, one of the largest estuaries in the world. The possibilities are almost untold. A student could dream up something." He qualified the statement by saying that the proposal would have to be validated by CBF and the steering committee.

Munson also outlined some suggestions for potential projects. In doing so he demonstrated how students from many disciplines might apply their knowledge and interests.

"Political science might apply—environmental law. Sociologically, one might study the demise of the watermen's family, all kinds of demographic things. What land use would be needed in the year 2000? A business student might study what kind of home should be built. And there are a myriad of other scientific aspects as well."

Details should be worked out by the steering committee by the beginning of the fall semester, according to Munson, including finalizing the committee's actual membership. Munson will chair the committee consisting four as yet unknown faculty and one representative of CBF. Details and deadlines will be announced.

Ideally, the first student project should extend from the spring semester of the student's junior year through summer break and into the fall semester of the student's senior year. Before a project is accepted for funding it, must undergo a formal application procedure, pass requirements on merit, feasibility, and concentrated interest in the environment.



Many students have expressed their sorrow at the recent dismantling of the Washington College water tower. It will fall to make way for the progression of the Master Plan.

Wirth speaks on environment

by Julie Greene

Last Tuesday evening, March 27, Colorado Senator Tim Wirth spoke in the Hynson Lounge on the subject of the environment. His talk was the second in a series of four lectures on the environment sponsored by the William James Forum.

Senator Wirth discussed global warming and other environmental concerns in light of the fact that his clean air bill had been defeated earlier that evening by three votes. Maryland Senator Sarbanes was one who voted to defeat the bill. Senator Wirth mentioned that it will take some time for Congress to pass any environmental bills. He stated that the system is one which does not encourage change.

Unfortunately he said that Detroit is also slow to change. One aspect of Senator Wirth's clean air bill dealt with the air pollution caused by automobile exhaust. One way to aid in slowing this down is to build cars which get more miles to the gallon.

Inquiries were made to manufacturers in Detroit about increasing mileage and they said it could not be done.

Senator Wirth stated that he has sources in Detroit that say they can build cars that get 43 miles to the gallon. That's almost twice what most cars get today.

So why don't they build them? Safety glass was not installed in cars either, until after the Japanese brought it into the market. Wirth suggested that hopefully we can instigate this trend ourselves.

Another point he made was that we need to decrease our national deficit. Most people agree, including the Japanese, that the United States needs to raise taxes. One of these taxes would be put on gasoline. With cars that get 43 miles to the gallon, a tax on gas doubling the price would be wiped out. What is good for the environment is good for the country in all respects.

Wirth himself has acted on these environmental objectives. He has installed in his own automobile a second tank which uses natural gas. Natural gas is already a vapor so it is much cleaner than using gasoline. Its cost is almost half that of gas.

The option of using other fuels was part of Wirth's clean air bill which was defeated this week.

Senator Wirth also brought up another aspect of global warming: the destruction of our rain forests. While the United States encourages Brazil not to destroy their rain forests, we are destroying our last one, in Alaska. Not only are we cutting it down, but we are selling it to the Japanese. According to other sources, the Japanese are not dumb. They will sink the logs and sell them back to us for a hefty profit when we don't have any forests left to cut down.

What does Wirth have planned for the future? He has another

MacTutors at library

by Susie Mazzullo

Now students who prefer to work in the library and also need help do not have to go to the computing center for assistance. The Washington College Miller Library has recently employed two students who will assist others in running the Macintosh computers.

Librarian Bill Tubbs says the student assistants were employed in direct response to the student questionnaire that students filled out at registration. Many students expressed the need for computer assistance in the library as well as in the Computing Center.

The two assistants are sophomore Brian Gimelson and sophomore Tom Shepherd. They will be available to assist anyone needing help Sunday through Thursday from 8 PM until 11 PM in the Newell Room of the library.

They will be available to answer questions students may have when operating the Macintosh computer programs such as Microsoft Word and MacWrite. They will also help with graphing programs that are sometimes difficult.

The "Mac Tutors" will also be responsible for encouraging students to disinfect their discs before introducing them into

A kinder, gentler registration

Students had to endure yet another unpleasant registration process on Wednesday. Perhaps it's time to come up with an alternative to arena registration and recognize that the present method is unorganized and often unfair.

Security isn't at fault for the chaos which ensues at registration time—it is impossible to have order with more than 800 people who are determined to emerge triumphant from the gym with their chosen classes.

Basically, bullies win in arena registration. Students who are are physically strong, aggressive enough to push to the front of the line, and willing to have their persons crushed against a closed door have a pretty good chance of getting their desired classes. Better yet, underclassmen who manage unfairly to push their way to the gym while upperclassmen are registering are virtually guaranteed their choices.

At larger schools, computerized registration is the norm. Why not at Washington College? The process goes something like this: students meet with their advisors to choose their classes, and hand in a form to the registrar's office detailing their choices. The registrar's office then divides the forms by class, and enrolls students in the courses—seniors first, then juniors, and so on. Following that, students receive a printout indicating which classes they were enrolled in, and which, if any, were closed. The form also includes a randomly chosen lottery number—seniors get the best numbers, juniors next best, etc.—because on drop/add day, students who need additional courses are let in by lottery number to enroll in available courses. Courses chosen on drop/add day are processed into the computer on the spot.

Granted, this proposed process is somewhat involved, but it would save faculty and students from the trials of arena registration. Furthermore, computerized registration is at least as fair as arena registration. Who knows? It may even save a few bumps and bruises.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Committee responds to Riner letter

To the Editor:

This is a reply to Ms. Mary Riner's letter that was printed in The Elm's Letter-to-the-Editor column on March 30, 1990.

In this age of complex society, written communication in impersonal official business necessitates, among other things, proper format and minimum civility. This practice is a matter of common sense and a part of an unwritten code of civilized behaviors in our lifelong learning process. It is no wonder that Ms. Riner's search of this practice in statutes in Washington College's handbook was doomed to fail as a comedy of hare-brained error.

Ms. Riner's old (or first) petition failed to live up to the above-mentioned standard of written communication in a civilized society like ours. For instance, the petition was scribbled on a torn-out sheet of her school notebook. (Incidentally, she could not spell such an easy English word as "sophomore" correctly. In fact, she misspelled the same word twice in her old and new petitions.) Moreover, the petition was addressed to no one, so it became a worthless piece of document form the inception. This is why she was asked to submit a new, improved form of the petition. Ms. Riner's self-righteous anger in defense of her useless piece of so-called petition represents sheer arrogance of ignorance. The more the individual is enraptured with arrogance of ignorance, the less likely he or she is to see this human comic-tragedy for what it is. The words which Hamlet addresses to his mother might be addressed with equal lack of success to Ms. Riner:

> . . . Mother, for love of grace,
> Lay not that flattering unction to your soul,
> That not you trespass, but my madness speaks.

Sincerely,
Tai Sung An (Prof.)
On behalf of the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standing.

Benefit

Alpha Chi Omega is having a 50/50 raffle to benefit Mindy Poole, who is an Alpha Chi sister at the University of Virginia. Mindy needs a double lung transplant and her insurance will not cover the $500,000 operation. Tickets are $1 and can be purchased in the Dining Hall. The drawing will take place on Tuesday, April 10 at 6 PM in the Dining Hall. The winner will receive half of the money collected, and the other half will go to Mindy. You do not need to be present to win.

OPINION

ISSUE: In terms of funding and faculty, is the administration living up to its committment to the arts in the best way that a small college can?

Fill the Arts Center with more faculty

Stephanie Hess

Here we are at the end of "the exciting Cater years." Changes on campus are evident. The Academic Resources Center has taken form, the Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center will be dedicated this weekend, the new walkway is almost complete, the front of the Gibson Fine Arts Center is under reconstruction, and workers are even tearing down that nasty water tower. To prospective students, Washington College is starting to look like a beautiful place to spend four years and 60,000 dollars.

As might be expected, there is trouble in paradise. Students and faculty are showing concern about the quality of certain academic departments, most recently, the Art Department. Is WC living up to its commitment to the fine arts in the best way a small college can? This is a difficult question to answer.

I am not an expert on the arts at WC, but I certainly have an interest in them, and I know what I want from Washington College in terms of my liberal arts education. At a small school that costs me roughly $15,000 a year, I don't want to have trouble getting into a course semester after semester because it is too full, and I want to have the opportunity to meet with my professors outside of class to discuss questions, projects and ideas. These concerns have been met for me in some departments and not in others.

Judging from my own experience and from what I read in The Elm last week, the Art Department cannot presently satisfy these concerns. It seems obvious to me that when two art history courses, Intro. to the History of Western Art and Italian Renaissance Art, are two of the first classes closed during registration every semester, the school needs more Art professors. Not only is WC not hiring an additional professor, it may be losing one of its three present professors. Is it just me, or is the new Arts Center starting to sound a bit empty?

With only two full time professors, the Art Department may only be able to open upper level classes to art majors, and even then they would be spreading themselves thin. This limits a non-major's opportunities for a broad education, and it limits the number of art students who will be drawn to Washington College. The number of art students grows smaller and smaller and the new building becomes emptier and emptier. What is the point of having lovely buildings if we don't have strong academic programs to fill them up? The beautiful setting of Washington College may successfully bring students to the College, but it will not keep them here.

I have to join The Elm in wondering why patrons "seem more eager to fund bricks and mortar than academia." A strong department must be built from the inside out. It must start with enough good professors and an eager group of students. We could have twelve Arts Centers, but without an adequate faculty, the College would still not be living up to its committment. Right now, even if we are lucky enough to keep Tex Andrews here, more money needs to be spent on the faculty and the programs of the fine arts rather than the places.

Stephanie Hess is a sophomore Humanities major. She was the Arts Editor of The Elm last semester.

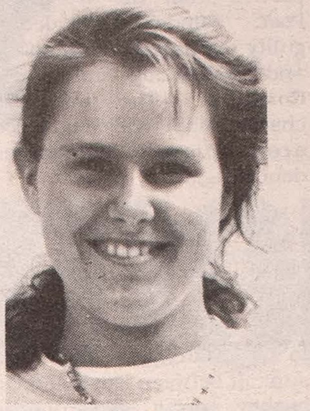
Though we may have a beautiful new arts center we don't have the faculty to go along with it! What's the point?



Laurie Paulsen

Marion, MA

The Larrrabee Art Center is a big improvement, and a needed addition to Washington College. However, more faculty and support from the College is needed. More courses could be offered with great faculty, especially since there is the new building. The faculty they have already give extra of their time for us, they need a break.

Becca Hutchinson
Junior
New Castle, DE

What is committment? As far as the Art Department at Washington College goes, it was the potential to be great, and certainly better than just an art school, for the entire liberal arts education that WC offers is what makes "art." However, with the lack of funds and faculty, we are in danger of becoming the rumored "program."

Brian Gimmelson
Doylestown, PA

The Art Department as it stands currently is violently understaffed. Not to say that it isn't strong; it is. However, the art department has been endowed with a Ferrari as far as facilities and current teachers are concerned, while the admininstration has been trying to give it Diesel fuel! All we need now is a little good gas to get it really started.

Dan Helgerman
Senior
Annapolis, MD

The new arts center is more than what I expected– it's got plenty of room and lots of equipment. However, the facility with all of its space needs additional faculty to support the classes that the new center can make available to the students.

Vicco von Voss
Junior
Birmingham, MI

The Art Department has come a long way since we now have an excellent facility. But with only one Studio Art Teacher and one Art History Teacher the program cannot really expand. What the department needs are teachers that are going to cover all the different art disaplinces.

Administration places aesthetics over substance in arts programs

Thomas Logan

The Fine Arts. Being a philosophy major–as well as the epitome of apathetic lethargy–I don't know a heck of a lot about the subject. However, I do have friends in artsy places. I also have a pair of eyes, which help me to see exactly where the college cash actually goes.

Bricks, lots of them. Sure, the campus is going to be beautiful, but what is the administration doing to enhance the curriculum in the arts? The Art Department in particular needs an increase in faculty, but apparently the College can not produce the funds. If the new Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center is intended to attract prospective art students, it will hardly be worthwhile without a correspondingly beautiful program of study.

As I see it, the administration is attempting to enhance the appearance of the campus and increase enrollment, but without simultaneously increasing the number and type of course offerings. I'm sorry to say that WC seems to have its priorities mixed up just a bit, and if the trend continues, there will be a greater number of disappointed freshmen in coming years. The growth of the College, ideally, should be equally distributed to prevent any one area from falling behind. Apparently, an aesthetic study environment is more important to the present administration than the substance of the courses offered.

What about student safety? Instead of constructing the new Academic Resource Center, maybe emphasis should have been placed on renovating existing structures. Tawes Theatre is a prime candidate. I am under the impression that Tawes is a fire hazard at least, if not a death trap waiting to be sprung. Of course, a beautified campus is much more important than student safety.

There is also a need for new equipment and supplies in all three departments. The new art building is a much needed addition, but at the same time, the drama and music departments are lacking in the areas of equipment and facilities. I don't mean to diminish in importance the strides made by the Cater administration–the changes made are needed.

However, I am looking forward to some less superficial alterations under the direction of our next president. It remains to be seen whether or not this naive dream will be realized. I understand that the administration can not force donations into areas for which they were not intended, and I commend the current administration for the amount of funding that has flowed into their hands. My question is, could they try seeking donations under more specific and more important headings? Of course, change comes slowly, piece by piece. The current administration has done a lot for the school; my qualm is not with its effort, but with the placement of its priorities.

PERSPECTIVES

News from around the world: Clean Air Act

UNITED STATES:

The Senate reached a compromise completing the first revisions of the Clean Air Act in 13 years. The new version of the bill calls for new limits on auto pollution, halving acid rain, cleaning up smog in US cities, and technological controls to protect against the accidental discharge of cancer-causing and toxic substances into the environment. The proposed bill would cost industry an estimated $20 billion. Most of the cost of acid rain clean-up will fall on mid-western and Appalachian states. Senator George Mitchell defended the cost of the bill saying, "There are no simple, inexpensive answers to these problems. But the cost of inaction will be higher than the cost of this bill."

A group of physicians in San Francisco are working to establish that city as a testing and eventual distribution site for the French abortion pill, RU-486. The pill, although widely available and used in France, is available in the US only for research. An American pharmaceutical firm hoping to distribute the pill would have to obtain a release from the French manufacturer. Many American firms have failed to do so for fear of a boycott by anti-abortion groups. The abortion pills has been found in tests to be as safe and effective as a surgical abortion.

In the trial of former Philippine first lady Imelda Marcos, the defense attorney for Marcos claimed that then Vice President George Bush suggested to the Marcoses they should invest in American real estate. Bush was apparently trying to prevent the Marcoses from making investment deals with Khadafi. The attorney also maintains that the money used by the Marcoses was part of a fund for the defense of the Philippines in case of a communist takeover.

The jury in the trial of John Poindexter was ordered sequestered after two jurors reported they had been contacted by reporters from the Washington Post. Poindexter pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiracy, and obstructing and lying to Congress. The prosecution charges that Poindexter directed a cover up to protect former President Reagan.

SOVIET UNION:

Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze arrived in Washington on Tuesday. The Bush Administration is hoping to set a date for a super power summit between Bush and Gorbachev during Shevardnadze's visit. But the Lithuanian question could stand in the way. The House Foreign Affairs Committee approved a resolution urging President Bush to formally recognize Lithuania and to normalize relations between the two countries as soon as possible.

Upon arriving in Washington, Shevardnadze spoke with reporters. He called the situation in Lithuania an internal matter for the Soviet Union to deal with, and said the most powerful weapon the Soviets possessed was dialogue.

CHINA:

As the traditional day for mourning the dead approaches, the Beijing city government has banned unauthorized displays of mourning. The leader of the student democracy movement, Chai Ling, appeared on Hong Kong television announcing her escape from China, and vowed to continue her struggle. Chai urged the Chinese people to wear the traditional white flowers as a gesture of mourning for the hundreds who were killed last June. Chai and her husband are believed to be in France currently.

Army, paramilitary and police forces were put on alert in and around Beijing last Sunday. Beijing's main cemeteries are also under close guard.

American students have a "Trivial Pursuit" grasp of history and civics, and gaps still exist between the test scores of white students and their black and Hispanic classmates, said the Nation's Report Card, issued Monday.

"This is, alas, no April Fool; it's real data about real American kids," said Chester Finn, chairman of the governing board of the National Assessment of Educational Progress.

Among the findings on this year's Report Card:

– More than three-fourths of eighth-graders could identify the Rev. Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech, but fewer than half knew he advocated non-violence.

– Nearly a third of eighth-graders and almost half of high school seniors did not recognize the presidential veto, congressional override and Supreme Court decisions as examples of the federal system of checks and balances.

– 68 percent of twelfth-graders identified the reasons for the Bill of Rights and 63 percent recognized a quote from the Monroe Doctrine. But only 38 percent recognized the opening statement of the Declaration of Independence.

About 27,000 fourth-, eighth- and 12th-graders were tested for the Report Card, which revealed that in general, the students have uneven, sometimes superficial understandings of history and civics.

Students were rated on a 0 to 500 scale, and white 12th-graders scored 22 points better on the civics test than Hispanics and 28 points better than blacks.

But separate comparisons of 13- and 17-year-olds found the gaps between whites and their black and Hispanic classmates has narrowed. There were significant gains by blacks and Hispanics in civics at 13, but the gap narrowed for 17-year-olds because of poorer performance of white students.

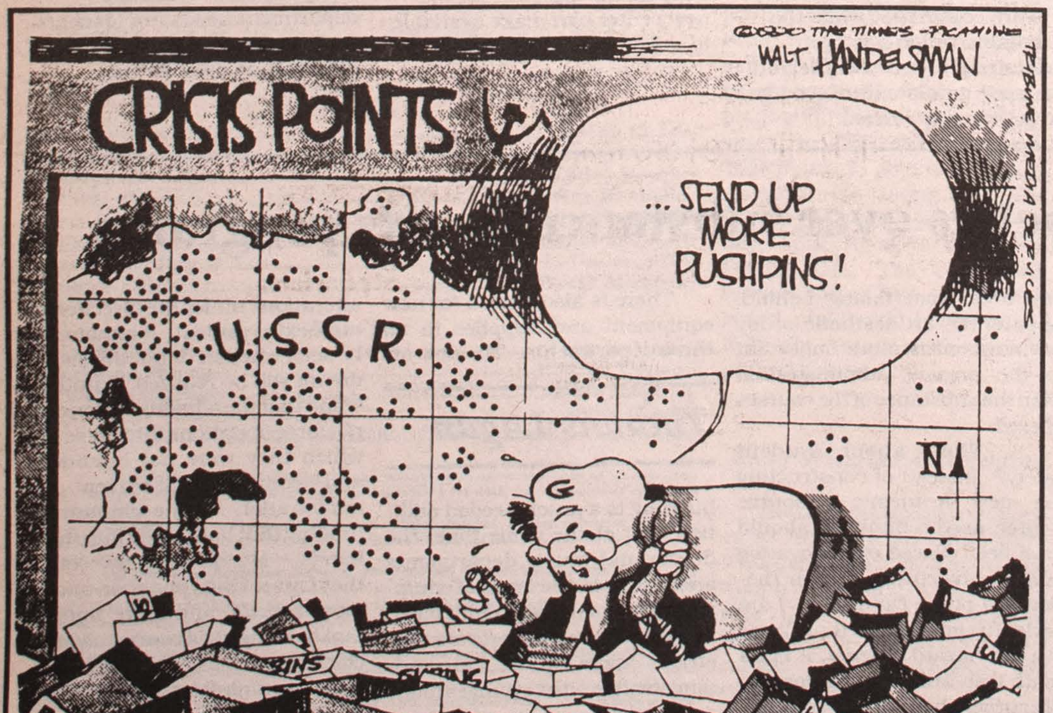
"If the report is accurate, our high school graduates, on the whole, lack the kind of understanding of the nation's heritage that is necessary to be an informed citizen in a democracy," says Mary Frances Berry, history professor at the University of Pennsylvania.

"At rudimentary levels of basic skills," students are doing well, Finn said. "I think we can say with some confidence we've gotten back to the basics."

The civics test scores also show that students in "advantaged urban" communities were 25 points better than those in "disadvantaged urban" communities.

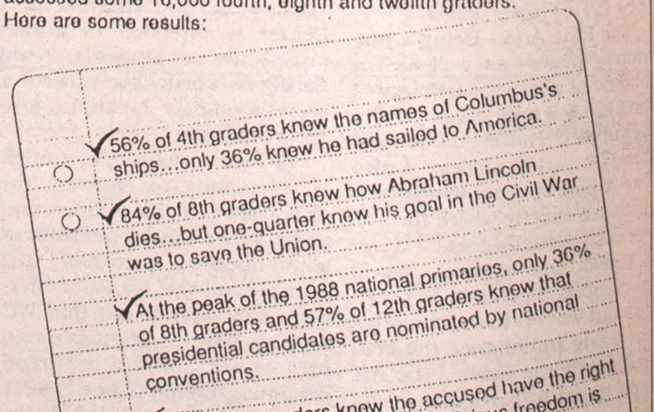
Advantaged urban schools were defined as those near cities with a "high proportion" of residents in professional or managerial jobs. Disadvantaged areas had a high proportion of residents on welfare or not regularly employed.

Dennis Kelly writes for USA TODAY



The nation's report card

The newest Nation's Report Card shows how well U.S. kids know their history and civics. The National Assessment of Educational Progress assessed some 16,000 fourth, eighth and twelfth graders. Here are some results:



✓56% of 4th graders knew the names of Columbus's ships...only 36% knew he had sailed to America.

✓84% of 8th graders knew how Abraham Lincoln dies...but one-quarter knew his goal in the Civil War was to save the Union.

✓At the peak of the 1988 national primaries, only 36% of 8th graders and 57% of 12th graders knew that presidential candidates are nominated by national conventions.

✓98% of 12th graders knew the accused have the right to a lawyer, but only 51% knew religious freedom is guaranteed by the Constitution.

Phi Delta Theta, a new addition to the Greeks

by Amy R. Caddle and Katherine Absher

Phi Delta Theta began as a group of ten friends holding informal meetings, and presently has twenty-two potential members. Last Saturday the group had its colony induction, and is striving for November 1990 as its charter date, just in time for Spring Rush.

The institution of Phi Delta Theta on the Washington College campus is the brainchild of freshman Chris Kleberg, whose father was a Phi Delta Theta. "We want to better the fraternity system by instituting a new brotherhood, as well as helping the existing fraternities," comments Kleberg.

But before a fraternity is chartered, it must undergo a trial period and meet certain requirements set by the national headquarters. Last week a Phi Delta Theta chapter consultant visited Washington College for a few days to help the colony establish themselves. The national organization of Phi Delta Theta demands a high record of scholastic achievement and community service from its fraternities.

Already the Delts are fulfilling their national requirements, "April is Phi Delta Theta Community Service Month, and we are currently making plans to participate in two service projects," says freshman Chris Vaughn.

Some hold the opinion, however, that Washington College is already overloaded with Greeks. Splitting their vote equally on the establishment of another fraternity, evidently half of the Administration felt this way. However, "Dean Maxcy was very helpful in aiding us with getting permission from the administration," says Kleberg. And Maxcy states that he does not see any reasons why the fraternity should be hindered by the administration: "I don't know why it shouldn't be done. So far the administration has recognized them as a colony." Linehan adds, "We are eager to show the faculty, administration and students the positive things the brothers of Phi Delta Theta can do. We want to earn their support." Chris Vaughn states that "responsibility will be our main focus."

Kleberg eagerily points out that Phi Delta Theta does not want to usurp Phi Sigma Kappa, whose charter was recently revoked. Yet, Dean Maxcy adds that the fraternity, "brings the number of organizations back to what it was a year ago" before the Sigs were disbanded and this "helps maintain the visibility of the Greeks on campus. If the Greek system gets too small, it will be hard for two or three organizations to stand alone."

Realizing this the other fraternities have responded to the advent of a new "brotherhood" on campus favorably. Kleburg states, "All the Greeks have been supportive of us," and he doesn't foresee any rivalry between his emerging fraternity and the other already established Greek organizations. "Washington College has the potential for a great Greek system. We want to get involved and bring all of the Greeks together in a positive way," comments freshman Charlie Linehan.

Alongside the Lambda Pi Deltas and the Theta Chi, The Phi Delta Theta colony has applied for special housing next semester in Talbot. It is as yet undecided whether the new fraternity or the AOπ sorority will receive Talbot as special interest housing next year. "We need specialized housing to bring us together. Putting the fraternities in the Quad will help us learn to deal with each other," stated Vaughn. Linehan agrees, and adds that "our first year on campus is an important one. Living together will certainly bring us together as a brotherhood."

The potential Phi Delta Theta brothers are well aware of the reputation fraternities have as exclusive partying clubs, and they are determined to break that stereotype. "There is a lot more to fraternity life than partying. We want people to feel welcome," said Vaughn. Linehan is determined to "resist any kind of stereotype," and Kleberg insists that Phi Delta Theta is striving to be a fraternity with options.

"We want to be seen as an interest group and a brotherhood, but not as a segregated group," stressed Kleberg. "We realize each fraternity has its own personality. We want everyone to work together despite our differences."

Earth Day 1990: Think Globally, Act Locally

In the home

Did You Know...

*Each Sunday, 500,000 trees are made into newpapers that are not recycled.

*Every two weeks we throw away enough glass to fill the 1,350-ft. twin towers of the World Trade Center in New York.

*The energy saved from one recycled aluminum can will operate a 75-watt light bulb for eight hours.

You Can Make A Difference...

*Set up an easy-to-remember, three-container system for household trash: a box for newspapers to be recycled, a sturdy second container for all other recyclables (aluminum, glass, tin cans, plastic bottles), and third for regular trash.

*Dispose of old batteries at a local hazardous waste center.

*Contact your utility companies for tips on how to save energy.

*Instead of using paper towels, use a sponge or cloth towel to clean up.

*Choose an all-natural hand and body soap without artificial scent or color.

*Try mixing peppermint extract with backing soda for a refreshing toothpaste.

*Mix borax with water for a good toxin-free cleaner. For a more abrasive, natural cleaner use equal parts baking soda and soap.

In your car

Did You Know...

*Industry produces 15% of the nations smog, cars contribute a staggering 40%.

*An average new American car driven 10,000 miles per year will releaw approximatley itw own weight—between one and two tons—in carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

*A major petroleum company has recently developed a gasoline that releases 15% less Carbon Dioxide pollutants than other unleaded gasolines.

You Can Make A Difference...

*Drive fewer miles by walking, riding a bike, taking a bus, or carpooling in a fuel-efficient vehicle to work or school.

*Have your car's air conditioner carefully serviced and any leaks repaired.

*Properly dispose of old tires, oil, and other toxic materials at your local service station or hazardous waste center.

*Wash your car on grass or dirt so the soap is absorbed rather than allowing it to flow freely into the sewer.

While shopping

Did You Know...

*One-half of the nation's paper, three-quarters of the glass produced, 40% of the aluminum, and 30% of the plastic produced is used for packaging.

*Every three months we throw away enough aluminum cans to rebuild our entire commerical air fleet.

*Recently, one of America's largest fast-food companies launched a voluntary recylcing program to recycle foam containers. The program will include 450 New England restaurants.

You Can Make A Difference...

*Suggest that your local supermarkets and fast food restaurants start a voluntary recylcing program to cut down on foam packaging manufactured with chlrofluorocarbons (CFC's).

*Buy pump sprays instead of aerosols.

*Look for recycled paper logo and avoid "disposable" products.

*Buy eggs and milk in cardboard, instead of plastic—50% of packages used in supermarkets are recycled paper.

*Ask for paper bags at the supermarket checkout counter and bring them back to carry groceries a second, third, or fourth time.

*Purchase rechargable batteries.

*Buy compact fluorescent light bulbs instead of incandescent ones—you'll save 50% on your lighting bill and because they produce half as much heat, you'll also save on your cooling bill.

In the community

Did You Know...

*Enough energy can be saved by recycling a case of soda cans to fill a car's gas tank with one and half gallons of gasoline.

*Americans produce more than one-fourth of the world's garbage, but comprise only 5% of the earth's population.

*In response to Earth Day 1990, as many as one billion trees will be planted around the world.

You Can Make A Difference...

*Plant trees to save energy required to heat and cool your house, to prevent soil erosion, and reduce air pollution. If you have no rooma local school, church or park would welcome your gift.

*Start a neighborhood clean-up committee that can organize activities like regular "disposal" days to have household toxic wastes (such as paint, oil, and furnace filters) picked up by a toxic waste management company.

*Set up a neighborhood recycling program with central pick-up points—this is a good opportunity to involve service groups such as the Boy or Girl Scouts.

Simply stated, the countless ways to get involved fall under three, easy-to-remember categories—reduce, reuse, recycle. Changing our ways may take an extra minute or a little bit of extra thinking, but our environment and our future are worth it.

By implementing ideas such as these, you can make a difference close to home—where the environment begins for all of us. And as family, friends, and others take notice, they will also get involved in bettering their environment.

Men's lacrosse loses close game in Hobart showdown

by Matt Giller

In last Saturday's showdown that hooked up the two top teams in Division III lacrosse, the Shoremen(4-3) were upended in one of the most exciting games in the long rivalry. The Hobart Statesmen(3-0) were able to overcome a 10-7 deficit late in the game and parlay 5 unanswered goals to lead them to a 12-10 victory.

After jumping on top early scoring the first goal, the Shoremen trailed for the rest of the first half. The WAC got within a single goal to make it 5-4 in the second quarter. But before the halftime horn could sound, the Geneva juggernauts were able to tally another goal and go into the locker room with a 6-4 advantage.

The Statesmen picked up the second half where they left off the first - with a goal - to increase their largest cushion to 3 goals. But the Shoremen, led by steady leadership and youthful enthusiasm, put together one of their most memorable runs. The Shoremen dominated the next twenty minutes of the second half by scoring six straight goals while senior Dave Slomkowski was perfect in between the pipes.

With about seven minutes left in the game and an upset within reach, the Statesmen made a rally only the #1 team in the country could have accomplished. The injury to All-American Defensemen Kevin Colbeck was most evident during this time, as Hobart was able to thwart the Shoremen's efforts by scoring five goals in the next four minutes to give them the lead for good 12-10.

The WAC had their chances late in the game but the Statesmen's goalie was able to turn each away - some with the help of the post. The majority of the Shoremen offense was supplied by freshmen attackman Jed Cronin and senior Tim Hormes, netting 4 and 3 goals respectively. Bob Martino had a goal and 2 assists, while long stickman Jason Scarborough and freshman attack Brian Johnson each added a goal. Living up to his All-American status, Slomkowski was outstanding in the goal, outsaving his counterpart 32-12.

Coach Corcoran was extremely pleased with the effort of his team whose constant pressure put Hobart's backs up against the wall. When asked about a rematch, Corcoran just smiled and said, "we've just got to get back there". Corcoran admits, though, that they must not look too far into the future, because they must come back and face a handful of top 10 teams that are all looking to defeat the Shoremen. He is hopeful Colbeck will be back in time for the team's home game this Saturday, when they face top 10 opponent Roanoke College.

Lacrosse remains undefeated

The Washington College women's lacrosse team continued to roll over Division III competition this week, winning two games and raising their record to 6-0. The Shorewomen overwhelmed Dickinson University and Western Maryland as they managed to maintain their undefeated record. The two wins were also the team's first two conference victories of this young season.

The team's first victory of the week came in a home game against Dickinson. The Shorewomen turned this game into a romp quickly, scoring seven goals in the first half while holding Dickinson scoreless. Dickinson only scored one goal in the game, and that came at the end of the second half. Sarah Coste scored early and often in the game. Coste got Washington College off to a flying start with the first two goals of the game. She scored four goals on the game and added two assists to lead the Shorewomen to victory.

The Washington College scoring was extremely well-distributed. Jenifer Blenckstone tallied four goals and added two assists, and Amy Tiehel added three goals of her own. Beth Matthews and Donna White registered one goal apiece to close the WC scoring. The Shorewomen outshot Dickinson 29-18 in the game, and the Shorewomen goalkeepers were only called upon to make six saves. Hilgartner's performance in goal was assisted by a superb effort from her defense.

Western Maryland was the next victim for the potent Shorewomen squad. This game was played at Westminster, and it was one of the closer games of this young season for the Washington College women. The Shorewomen still managed to win convincingly by a score of 12-7 to earn their second consecutive Middle Atlantice Conference victory.

The women played very well both offensively and defensively against Western Maryland. Six different Shorewomen scored in the contest, led by three goals apiece from Coste and Margaret Doyle. Carole Reece and Sam Clements each tallied two goals of their own, while Jenifer Blenckstone added a goal and two assists. Defensively, the Shorewomen were led by a stellar performance from Kristy Hilgartner in goal. She consistently frustrated Western Maryland's offense, and she was credited with ten saves for the game. Many of Hilgartner's saves came at crucial points of the game and enabled Washington College to maintain a comfortable lead.

The success of this year's team has mainly been an all-around effort. Coste and Blenckstone have been the offensive leaders for WC, while Beth Matthews and goalie Kristy Hilgartner have spearheaded the defense. Still, the team's strength is mostly their overall balance and their brilliant team play.

The Shorewomen have non-conference games scheduled against Salisbury State and Muhlenberg this week, then play an important home game against Johns Hopkins on Thursday, April 12 at 4:00. Hopkins should be Washington College's toughest conference opponent, and the winner of this game could very possibly take control of the Middle Atlantic Conference.

Tennis powerhouses prove too much for women's tennis

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The women's tennis team ran into a brick wall this past week, facing Division I opponent American and Division III powerhouse Trenton State. The two teams defeated the Shorewomen, who played good tennis but were no match for the more talented teams. The two losses dropped the Shorewomen's record to 4-6.

The trip to American University proved to be a frustrating one for the Shorewomen. The team managed only one singles victory, and they were swept in the doubles competition. Miriam Dittman captured the team's only win, a 6-4,6-0 victory from the #3 singles position. Top Shorewomen netter Tracy Peel lost to American's top seed, but played well in a grueling match. The first set went to a tiebreaker, which Peel lost 16-14. She bounced back to win a tiebreaker of her own in the next set, but she ran out of gas and dropped the last set 6-1. American thoroughly dominated the rest of the singles competition, giving up only four games in their other three wins.

The Shorewomen did not fare much better in doubles competition. Miriam Dittman/Rachael Rice lost their match in straight sets, while the tandem of Tina Lennon and Jennifer Sloan lost an 8-5 pro set in their match. Peel and Monica Blanco were unable to complete their match due to darkness.

This darkness remained over the Shorewomen in their next match against Trenton State. This was also a difficult match for the Washington College women. Trenton State's program was ranked fourth nationally in Division III, and they showed why on this day. The Shorewomen were swept in singles and earned only one victory in doubles as they went down to their second straight defeat.

All but one of the singles losses went in straight sets. Tracy Peel was once again a participant in an exciting three set match. This time, Peel was facing Juli Harvanik, the third ranked player in Division III tennis. It was Peel's victory over Harvanik in 1989 that catapulted the Shorewomen netter into the national rankings. Although Peel did not win this match, she did put up quite a fight. She captured the second set tiebreaker after losing the first set, but dropped the last set by a score of 6-2.

The team's only victory came from a very likely source - the tandem of Peel and Monica Blanco. The WC duo faced Harvanik and Tracy Prasa, the #8 ranked doubles team in Division III. Peel and Blanco had also defeated the Trenton State doubles team in 1989, and the victory had earned them both a national ranking and a berth in the national tournament. Lightning struck twice for the Shorewomen on this day, as the Peel/Blanco combination were able to take a three-set victory from the Trenton State duo.

Despite the two tough losses, coach Holly Bramble must have been pleased with her team's performance. At the same time, Bramble and her players developed an understanding of how far they will have to go before they can be considered a perennial national powerhouse. The team's past few matches have been postponed due to rain, but they head to Salisbury State on Monday for the first of three matches in four days. Home matches against Goucher and Elizabethtown follow on Tuesday and Thursday, respectively. The Shorewomen hope to be able to overcome their recent defeats and return to their winning ways.

Men's tennis continues to roll through spring season

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

Fred Wyman and his men's tennis team are on a roll. They have continued their winning ways, taking three straight matches to raise their record to 11-1. Their victories this week included a tight match against Division I foe American University. The Shoremen then proceeded to destroy Division III opponents Ursinus and Trenton State. Recently the team has fallen victim to bad weather, postponing their big home match with second-ranked Swarthmore.

The third-ranked Shoremen had their hands full on March 27 as they traveled to Washington D.C. for their match against American. Coach Wyman's netters worked themselves into a 4-2 deficit after the singles matches were completed, but then swept the doubles matches in impressive fashion to capture the victory.

Larry Gewer lost his singles match in three sets, dropping the final set to American's Jay Merchant by a score of 6-4. Scott Read supported his high singles ranking by overwhelming AU's #2 player 6-2,6-1. Unfortunately, the Shoremen only managed one other singles victory. Alberto Diaz was able to come back from a one set deficit to win 2-6,6-0,6-2.

The team's doubles play earned the netters their victory. The Shoremen won all three of their doubles matches in straight sets, led by Read and Gewer. WC's top ranked duo defeated American's top doubles team by a score of 6-2,6-1. Peter Maller and Roman Inochovsky combined to win their doubles match 6-2,6-4, while Diaz and Scott Shepherd only gave up two games in their win. The Shoremen's doubles accomplishments gave WC a 5-4 victory and improved their record to 9-1.

The next match for the Shoremen proved to be far uted singles victories to the team's cause. The Shoremen also dominated doubles play, giving up only five games on their way to a 9-0 victory over Ursinus.

The road trip continued the next day as the WC netters made their way up to Trenton State College. The Shoremen continued their impressive play against the Lions, dropping only one singles match on their win to their eleventh win. Gewer defeated Trenton State's top seed in straight sets, while Read took three sets to bump off the opponent's #2 seed. Diaz played the toughest and most exciting singles match of the day. While competing as the #5 seed, Diaz played an excruciating three set match. He managed to win the last set 12-10 in a tiebreaker to raise his singles record to 20-5.

Washington College also swept the doubles matches from Trenton State. Gewer and Read only lost five games in their straight set victory over the Lions' top ranked doubles team. Maller and Shepherd took three sets to earn their win, while Diaz and Bohutinsky also performed well in their victory.

The Shoremen netters now face the toughest part of their spring schedule. Their home match against Swarthmore could be the team's biggest challenge of the season. Swarthmore's team includes a powerful 1-2 combination that could cause problems for Gewer and Read. After this challenge, Washington College hosts a home match against Millersville and Rutgers-Newark this Saturday. Their week's activities continue with a match at West Chester on Wednesday, April 11. This series of matches could prove to be the big test for a very successful Shoremen tennis squad.

Baseball surprises their doubters

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

After finishing last season with a frustrating 7-14 record, the Washington College baseball team was not expected to be one of the top teams in their conference. Therefore, their 3-2 record early in the season has been a pleasant boost to Shoremen athletics and their supporters. The team has played excellent defense this season, and that was expected. The team's most pleasant surprise has been their .323 batting average. Three members of the WAC are presently hitting over .400, and the Shoremen have managed to draw an astounding 43 walks from opposing pitchers.

The Shoremen's season is presently being washed away by the lovely weather of Chestertown in April. Two doubleheaders have been postponed due to inclement weather, and the Shoremen have not played a game in over a week. As a result of this series of postponements, Washington College has yet to play a Middle Atlantic Conference opponent.

The team's last games came in a doubleheader against Western Maryland on March 28. The Shoremen managed to split the doubleheader and remain above .500. The first game of the doubleheader proved to be a high-scoring affair, with WC winning by a score of 16-10. Although he was pitching without his best stuff, Chris Long still ran his record to 2-0 with the win. Grame Wildman pitched the next game, and he was the hard luck loser in a 4-3 game. Wildman scattered five hits in seven innings and struck out three, but the offense was never able to get in gear. The Shoremen managed a threat in the bottom of the seventh, but they left the tying runner on third to end the game.

Along with his 2-0 record, Chris Long is also batting .455 for the Shoremen. Hal McBee and Matt Giller are both hitting at a .444 clip, and McBee leads the team with 9 runs batted in. Washington College baseball has outscored their opponents 50-33 so far this season. That statistic alone is an indication of the team's offensive firepower as well as their superior defensive ability.

This offensive explosion by the Shoremen has come as a surprise to most people. Before the season, coach Ed Athey said that the team's main strengths were defense and experienced pitching. Athey suggested that the team's suspect hitting would have to come through if the Shoremen were to make a big turnaround in the MAC standings. The team's offensive success could be an indication of good things yet to come for coach Athey's team.

The Shoremen have a doubleheader at Swarthmore this weekend, then begin to prepare for their showdown against perennial Division III baseball power Johns Hopkins. The two teams meet in a doubleheader on Saturday, April 14 at Washington College, in an important matchup for the Shoremen. Any victories in the Hopkins doubleheader would show just how Washington College baeball has progressed since last year.

O's have potential to relive '89

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

It's now officially major league baseball season. Despite obvious efforts by Donald Fehr and Chuck O'Connor to ruin April for baseball fans around the country, the national pastime has returned. The baseball gods have already granted us our first wish. Brent Musburger will not be doing play-by-play for CBS this summer. Brent has announced that he will take some time off and get away from the world of sports for a while. My guess is we'll see him at a ball game within a couple of weeks, wearing a "John 3:16" shirt and sitting next to Elvis.

At this time last year, most Oriole fans were almost dreading the start of the season. The question was not what place the Orioles would finish in, but if they would win a game in the month of April. Eddie Murray was gone, Rick Schu was still with the team, and the Orioles were hoping to scratch out a couple of wins with fundamentals and defense. Things looked bleak at Memorial Stadium.

What a difference a year makes. It's now 1990, and Oriole fans are springing up out of the woodworks. People are having to order tickets months in advance to even have a chance at getting seats behind a pole for a Thursday night game against the Seattle Mariners. Everyone is eating Froot Loops. Basically, Baltimore is going completely nuts. After the team's amazing performance last season, talk of a pennant is spreading through the area like wildfire.

Admittedly, last year's team put the fun back in Oriole baseball. The 1989 team played with more enthusiasm and heart than any other Baltimore ball club in recent memory. Who couldn't love the devastating curve ball and the clutch performances of Gregg Olson? Has anyone ever seen so many brilliant diving catches by a group of outfielders? What could this 1990 Oriole team possibly do for an encore? They have a tough act to follow.

Still, the team does have a shot at making a run for the American League East title. Their starting pitching is laced with promising, young talent. Bob Milacki was dazzling the last two months of the season, and he has pitched well so far this year. Pete Harnisch has slimmed down and is loaded with ability, and Ben McDonald is supposed to be this year's version of Gregg Olson. It will be difficult for Jeff Ballard to ever match his accomplishments from last year, especially after rotator cuff surgery. Dave Johnson and Jay Tibbs should battle for the fifth spot in the Oriole rotation. Olson will once again be the anchor for the bullpen. Mark Williamson will again be the setup man for Olson, although he may also have problems living up to last year's stats.

Once again, the team's fielding is expected to be a strong point. Phil Bradley, Steve Finley, Mike Devereaux and Brady Anderson are some of the best defensive outfielders this organization has ever seen. Cal Ripken should have won the Gold Glove last year, and he is the club's anchor up the middle. Bill Ripken can field, if nothing else, while Worthington and Milligan are excellent fielders on the corners.

Offense will continue to be the main concern. The team's hitting has not been pretty this spring, and one has to wonder if it is possible for the Orioles to scrap for as many runs and wins as last year. Can Mike Devereaux possibly hit more home runs directly down the left field line? The Orioles are without a left-handed power hitter, putting even more pressure on the likes of Cal Ripken and Mickey Tettleton. There will also be a lot of Birds trying to prove that last season wasn't a fluke. Hitting is the team's only real question mark.

Oriole fans will be expecting a lot from their Baltimore ballclub this season. This probably isn't fair, but it's only natural. After last year's excitement, people are hoping for a similar performance this year. Fans should try to remember that this is still a team in the process of rebuilding, regardless of last year's feats. The 1990 Orioles could make a run at the pennant, or they could finish somewhere in the middle of the pack. No matter what, things will be interesting at Baltimore's Memorial Stadium this summer.

Larrabee's WW II photos kick off dedication

Constance Stuart Larrabee's work, "World War II Photo Journal," will be on exhibit through April 19 in the new Creative Arts Center.
(photo by Constance Stuart Larrabee)

by Amy Klamberg

The Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center officially opens this Saturday, April 7 at 1 PM. The festivities will commence with remarks from several distinguished members of the Creative Arts Community: Dr. Anne-Imelda Radice, Chief of the Division of the Creative Arts for the US Information Agency; Jane Livingston, author and curator; and the Pulitzer Prize winning poet Richard Wilbur.

Members of the Washington College administration and major contributors to the remodeling project will participate in these opening statements as well.

After the subsequent presentation of the keys to the building by Christian Havemeyer, Chair of the Buildings and Grounds Committee, and after the ribbon cutting by President Douglass Cater, there will be a tour of the building and a reception immediately following.

The first exhibition to be hung on the walls of the new building is the "Constance Stuart Larrabee: World War II Photo Journal." The artist and the College have had a longstanding relationship, culminating in her founding of the Washington College Friends of the Arts in 1982, which has lasted for almost forty years. Larrabee, who has lived in Chestertown since 1950, has developed a special affinity for Washington College and its students over the years.

The dedicatory exhibit of Larrabee's captivating WW II photographs made its debut last fall at the National Museum of Women in the Arts in D.C.; after it leaves the campus on April 17, the Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Services (SITES) will circulate the exhibit nationally until 1995.

Larrabee's show depicts the range of human emotions experienced by the men and women behind the lines during WW II and captures the sense of "renewal and regeneration" with the subsequent liberation of Europe at the war's close.

In the preface of the exhibit catalog, Dr. Anne-Imelda Radice explains, "She relied on her camera, rationed film and her wits to produce a series of photographs that documents the suffering, as well as the humanity, she witnessed during her time with the allied armies."

The photographs displayed exemplify Larrabee's attention to detail and clarity in her composition, and her method of combining straight reporting with a psychological, humanistic approach, a bridging of the documentary and fine arts genres.

This special dedicatory exhibit, the opening day activities and the remodeling project itself would not have been made possible without the interaction of students, faculty and the Chestertown community. Larrabee, in reaction to this impressive cooperative effort, notes "This project shows what a generous-minded community is able to accomplish."

The chief benefactors of the building were Constance Stuart Larrabee, Lynette Morgan Nielson and Mrs. John Campbell White, whose gifts were matched by the State of Maryland. Mr. Ed Nielson, son of the late Lynette Morgan Nielson and co-chairman of the Friends of the Arts Committee, aided in raising money to equip the new building.

The committee played a major role in drawing support from across the Eastern Shore and from friends of the College in other states.

Substantial contributors, as Charter Members of the Larrabee Arts Center, will be commemorated by having their names engraved on a permanant plaque to be hung in the Center on April 17.

Students and faculty of WC have worked diligently to prepare the building and exhibit for opening day. The Art Department was responsible for attaining and setting up the new "state of the art" equipment that makes the Center distinctive, such as the new "central module" or studio. The Larrabee exhibit will be followed by the annual students art show.

Students like Dan Helgerman who helped hang much of the Larrabee exhibit, Deb Kulich, who repaired labels and text panels for the show and Vicco von Voss, who helped in much of the refurbishing of old equipment, have been crucial in preparing for opening day. Special Events Coordinator Marshall Williams expects a big turnout of students and alumni for this exciting ribbon cutting ceremony.

The effects of this new addition to the campus are already being felt with the increased enrollment in art classes since the beginning of the spring semester. "It is rewarding to see the building alive with enthusiastic students," says an excited Larrabee in reaction to this increased interest in the arts.

The Arts Center project marks the near completion of the administration's Master Plan for fundraising to increase student assistance and improve facilities.

Congressman Dyson on MD's First District:

confronting issues facing Eastern Shore farmers and watermen

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

Congressman Roy P. Dyson (D-MD), currently serving his fifth congressional term and enjoying a break from the headlines, visits Washington College's campus Tuesday night to discuss "Strategy for Success: Meeting the Challenges of Maryland's First District" in a lecture presented by the William James Forum.

Focusing on the plight of farmers in Maryland's First District, which includes the Eastern Shore and southern Maryland, Dyson explains that farming is "part of what makes this country great," adding, "it's time we start thinking about farming, particularly with the situation is Eastern Europe, which I believe directly relates to what could happen in our own country."

Presently, Dyson and the Agricultural Committee on which he serves is in the middle of putting together a farm bill. Emphasizing the volatility of the current farming situation, Dyson points out that the average farmer in the US is 55 and that less than 2 percent of the entire population is actually engaged in farming, according to his statistics. These figures, he believes, prove that farming is "an important issue that should be debated everywhere in our country."

In reference to the type of representation the First District requires, Dyson says what must be foremost in the delegate's mind is the "unique rural nature of the Eastern Shore. The fact should never be overlooked that the protectors of our environment are farmers and watermen."

According to Dyson, "We haven't paid enough attention to what they've [farmers and watermen] done," calling attention to the fact that these workers have been criticized for what some people deem the abuse of the environment.

As a member of Congress, Dyson's responsibilities include participation on committees. He chairs the Panama Canal Outer Continental Shelf Subcommittee, and regards the current situation as "probably one of the most volatile periods in the relationship between us and Panama."

Dyson, who is recognized as a conservative Democrat, also serves on the Armed Services Committee and has secured popularity on the shore by actively pursuing defense contracts for the First District, which is home to the Aberdeen weapons proving grounds and the Patuxent River Naval Air Test Center.

At one point, there was a move to close the proving grounds in Aberdeen, one of the state's largest employers, but Dyson and his committee fought to make sure that didn't happen and even upgraded the facility, an accomplishment of which Dyson says he is "justifiably proud."

Yet in the past there have been a number of incidents coloring Dyson's political career, most recently the suicide of his aide and long-time friend, Tom Pappas.

Hours after the Washington Post ran a front-page story charging Pappas with the misuse of campaign funds and the demanding of personal loyalty and time on male aides, Pappas jumped from the 24th story of the Helmsley Palace Hotel in New York to his death.

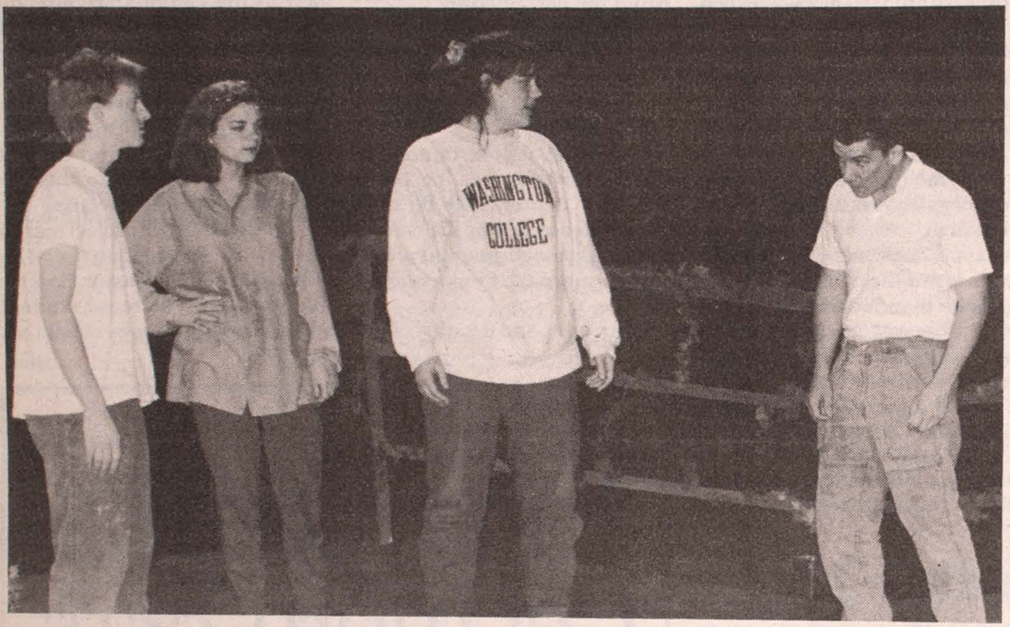
It was reported that Maryland Republicans had requested the Federal Election Commission to review Dyson's campaign finances after newspapers disclosed that money which was reported as payment to other aides actually went to Pappas.

Dyson's own actions were also investigated, along with William Chappell (D-FL), for accepting free flights on the Unisys plane by way of Charles Gardner in return for political favors involving defense contracting. Gardner controlled the airplane service used to fly Congress members to Great Neck, NY, the location of Unisys' Surveillance & Fire Control Division. It was suspected that the plane was used to transport members to other places around the nation besides Great Neck. Both men denied the charge, and nothing came of the investigation.

When the Baltimore Sun reported that he accepted a $2000 honorarium for speaking at an Oshkosh Corporation event, then on the same day voted in favor of requiring the Army to buy more Oshkosh trucks than it wanted, Dyson's ethics were again questioned. He denied any illegal activity.

Initially elected to Congress in 1980, Dyson began his political career in 1974 upon his election to the state legislature as a delegate. Before the onset of his political career, Dyson was a lumber company executive with a family-owned business in Great Falls, MD.

Dyson, who attended both the University of Baltimore and the University of Maryland and was awarded an honorary degree from the U. of MD, Eastern Shore in May of 1988, will begin his talk on Maryland's First District at 7:30 PM in the Norman James Theater. This event is free and open to the public.



WC's Drama Department presents Christopher Durang's Baby with the Bathwater tonight and Sat. night at 8 in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Admission is free, but seating is limited. Tickets can be reserved by phoning ext. 269. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

WC's Early Music Consort

by Bruce Hamilton

WC's Early Music Consort will give its last performance of the semester in the Norman James Theater Sunday at 4 PM. The Early Music Consort is led vocally by Music Department Chair Garry Clarke and musically by Associate Professor of Music Amzie Parcell.

The performance will begin and end with vocal pieces with the instrumentals mixed together in the middle.

Included in the vocal consort is the work of Richard Farrant. The instrumentalists will perform works by Claude LeJeune, Salamone Rossi and Handel.

Some of the students are taking other classes which require participation in a group, but many of them are just doing it, as Clarke says, "for fun." As one student says, "We don't really practice a whole lot, we're just well-trained. Clarke is a great conductor."

The students in the vocal consort are : Kate Bennett, Chris Bromer, Kim Buckheit, Cindy Croot, Jim Doran, Drew Elburn, Pam Flemke, Brent Hopkins, Laura Hopper, Karyn Iacangelo, Denise LaRue, Chris Martin, Jennifer Mauser, Kyndra Ponder, Justin Scout, Mike Sell, Mike Tyson, and John White.

The Instrumental Consort consists of: Jen Eisberg, Pat Koch, Jennifer Strickney, Sally McGee, Dianna Holden, Melissa Sirick, Greg Hickman, William and Elizabeth Parcell as well as Amzie Parcell, the director. The consort promises to be a good show, and attendance is encouraged. This event is free and open to the public.

How will Washington College do it?

One college's plan for increasing minority enrollment

By Jeanne DeQuine
©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

BOCA RATON, Fla. — In the student center at Florida Atlantic University, Gerolyn Shapiro leans against a post and contemplates the school's announcement this month that tuition will be free to any black student who is accepted.

"I think that it's derogatory toward both whites and blacks in general,"said Shapiro, a 1989 graduate who now teaches in an inner-city school. "I couldn't have gotten a scholarship."

In a fresh effort to increase enrollment at the little-known university just a sun-drenched mile from the ocean, FAU officials said they will offer free tuition to any black student enrolling in September.

Only the University of Maryland offers anything similar, and FAU's announcement this month won praise from the United Negro College Fund, the Education Department and the local community.

James Spear, special assistant to university President Anthony Catanese, said businesses in nearby Palm Beach and Broward counties volunteered money for a scholarship fund.

"The black community, the Chamber and the Urban League said, 'Don't be concerned about raising additional money,' " Spear said. "We were really pleased."

FAU, with 11,278 students, is trying to increase enrollment, particularly black enrollment.

This year's freshmen class of 359 has 28 black students. For this fall, FAU officials hope to attract 42 blacks in a projected freshman class of 550.

Tuition is $1,350 a year for state residents. The offer generated hundreds of phone calls to the university as well as a broad campus debate. Questions arose about the possibility that white students were suffering discrimination.

"It's obvious there are not black students here," said junior Amy Niergarth, 27, a communications major. "I think it's a great idea."

Junior Michael Jenkins, 22, an ocean engineering major, said the offer "will make a difference" on campus but, "it's probably a form of tokenism."

"There are students who see it as a free ride for (black) students," said senior Matt Hollander, 22. The communications major decried what he called misinformation. "The scholarship fund was set up so that more black students could come to the school."

To be admitted to FAU, students must carry a 3.0 high school grade average and score at least 1,000 total on the Scholastic Aptitude Test. FAU's current freshman class has a 3.5 grade average and 1,050 SAT score.

The sprawling flatlands on which FAU sits was once a World War II Army Air base. The state bought the land in the late 1950s, and FAU opened in 1964 following a large local fund-raising campaign. Most students commute; the average age is 26.

"We have a lot of 30-year-old students walking around here with outside jobs," said school spokesman Doug Applebaugh.

The school has basketball and baseball teams, a jai alai club and, naturally, a surf club — but no football.

Undergraduate studies are offered in 64 fields, master's degree programs in 44 areas and doctoral disciplines in 12 areas; its strengths are its engineering and business schools.

Scholarships are available for up to six years of study; FAU offers nearly $1 million in scholarships annually.

The latest offer "is an expansion of what we have been doing," said FAU spokesman Eddie Bartholomew. "It's not a totally new program."

"It's a tremendous program," said Education Department spokesman Rodger Murphey. "It helps some of the underprivileged citizens get an opportunity."

"We applaud the efforts," said Adrienne Rhodes of the United Negro College Fund.

Scholarships available to minority students include the Minority Educations Achievement Award, the Martin Luther King, Jr. Scholarship and the Minority Freshmen Students in Science and Engineering.

The Wittenberg Review gives WC a chance

Washington College is one of 87 leading liberal arts colleges and universities in the U.S. whose students will have the opportunity to be published in the first national, undergraduate, interdisciplinary journal of college writing.

The Wittenberg Review: An Undergraduate Journal of the Liberal Arts will be published twice each year by Wittenberg University. The journal will present some of the finest research and creative writing produced by students at many of the country's best liberal arts colleges.

Students at Washington may consult with department chairpersons about submissions to the journal.

Emphasis will be given to writing that displays knowledge of more than one academic discipline, and which deals with topics that are interdisciplinary.

In addition to research in the academic disciplines, some creative writing will be accepted, such as poems, short stories, one-act plays and librettos.

The journal is purposely being introduced at a time when undergraduate writing is being assailed by critics.

"This is an effort to show that something is being done to enhance the visibility of good writing by today's college students," said Wittenberg President William A. Kinnison.

Each issue will present approximately 12 works, and will run about 125 pages in length. A first issue printing will be 10 thousand copies.

Distribution will be mainly to university libraries and bookstores, university faculties and students, educational foundations, and high school counselors.

Editing the publication is Dr. Richard P. Veler, professor of English and university editor at Wittenberg. Dr. Barbara A. Flajnik, associate professor of mathematics, is business manager.

"We shall offer students the possibility to be published in a high-quality journal with a professional format and a nationally-recognized editorial board," Veler said.

A second objective is to influence students who could choose to become future writers, teachers of writing, and professors of literature and the humanities.

Serving as editorial board members are some of the nation's leading scholars and writers representing a variety of academic disciplines and careers.

They are David M. Bevington, Phyllis Fay Horton Professor in the Humanities at the University of Chicago; Eleanor Clift, Congressional and political correspondent for Newsweek magazine; Robert Coles, professor of psychiatry and medical humanities at Harvard University; Benjamin DeMott, professor of English at Amherst College; Gretchen M. Handwerger, special assistant to the senior vice president, policy planning and research, The World Bank.

Martin E. Marty, Fairfax M. Cone Distinguished Professor at the University of Chicago; Arthur E. Miller, Bruce Bromley Professor at Harvard Law School; Sheldon Rothblatt, professor of history and director of the center for the study of Higher Education at the University of California, Berkeley; Frank Tirro, professor of music at Yale University; and Lynn Arthur Steen, professor of mathematics at St. Olaf College.

Fifty professors around the country who are experts in their fields will serve as referees, joining Veler and editorial board members in judging submissions.

Over 80 leading liberal arts colleges, with geographic distribution across the country, have been solicited for manuscripts, along with some larger schools that are noted for outstanding liberal arts teaching.

West Hall dinner

by Patricia Karnes

To continue the festive atmosphere of the Celebration of the Sciences, the residents of West Hall recently planned and coordinated a dinner to do some celebrating of their own.

The informal dinner, attended by West Hall residents, science faculty, and administrators was held on March 7th in the basement of West Hall. At the dinner, the residents introduced their guests to their dorm library and proudly displayed its Wall of Fame.

The Wall of Fame is a dedicated to those alumni and past faculty who have contributed in one way or another to the College's science students and the science community. It includes portraits of Phil Wingate, Ted Kurze, Alonzo Decker, George Avery Bunting, Ralph Snyderman, Joseph McLain, Edward Schulman, William O. Baker, and Monica Jarmer.

By the end of the semester, a portrait of Dunning will also be placed on the Wall of Fame.

Dr. Kathleen Verville, who is West Hall's advisor said, "We are proud to have West Hall as part of our campus. It provides an atmosphere that is conducive to study and enhances the interactions between science students. The dinner was a great success, and I hope the first of many to come. We all felt as though we were part of a big family."

The most obvious difference between West Hall and other dorms is that the students who live in West Hall have different needs and priorities than students of other dorms.

According to Heather Scholtz, a resident of the building, "Living in West Hall is an invaluable experience. I find it advantageous living with people who are all striving for the same goal: to be successful in the final frontier. In other words, to pass organic!"

SAC reviews proposed Honor Code revisions

by Kyndra Ponder

The much-publicized Honor Code Committee has received the proposed Honor Code revisions from the Student Affairs Committee (SAC). The SAC has questions about two aspects of the new code.

The first point of the proposed honor code that the SAC would like to see change is enforcement. The proposed code, as it exist now, includes "first offense, social probation: second offense, suspension from the College: and third offense, expulsion from the College."

The SAC, according to Bill Kerbin, Chairman of the SGA's honor code committee, feels that enforcement should be more flexible.

The SAC also has serious reservations about the fact that students will be responsible for reporting the violations of other students under the proposed revisions. According to Kerbin, the SAC feels that the Honor Code "would put students in awkward positions."

Kerbin will be making revisions and will submit them to the SAC before the end of the school year. He welcomes input from the general student population.

Concerned students can feel free to contact him at 778-9176 or through Student Mail.

Special projects update

by Jennifer Gilday

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, has recently represented the student interests to the administration in advocating a resolution to the cable issue. However, he says, there is more involved than "wiring a few cables together."

Last year, students were outraged over the cable issue due to memos that posed the administration's "right" to decide what students should watch on television. Nevertheless, according to Baer, the deans still believe they will have to agree on whether or not they should even allow cable on campus.

In the meantime a task force, set up to investigate all concerned aspects, must decide if other various alternatives are worth the expense.

One of the alternatives is the satellite dish. It has been discovered that attaining the needed service is more complicated than previously thought. For example, the faculty wants a satellite dish that will enable them to pick up even more extensive programs such as German, Spanish or French programs.

Because of such complications, more reviews are needed before any decisions will be reached.

Whatever are the conclusions, says Baer, it will "most likely be next year before anything is chosen and it will be expensive."

The fire lane construction that was begun last semester has been completed, except for the staircase near the library. In two weeks, Baer stated, landscaping will begin and he requests that students stay off the muddy areas as new grass will be planted this month. New brick pathways should be adequate to assist the students.

The PCB leak that had students concerned earlier this school year is no longer a problem. Over spring break, transformers were cleaned. All violations have been corrected and the school is now in full compliance with EPA regulations.

The Student Union, included in the renovations of the Hodson Hall basement, will be completed on the outside by mid-April. Plans for the inside, however are not yet complete. For example, the snack bar designs still have to be finished and the decor remains a major decision.

SGA President Stuart Neiman will be taking a survey in the next few weeks to find out what the students want for the decor.

Clint Baer says that it is on a good schedule and will be completed next fall.

bill concerning the environment he is going to try to get passed through Congress.

He also has a population bill he wants to see passed. The population bill deals with planned parenthood. This type of bill has not been seriously introduced for quite a while, but now that the cold war is over he says we need to turn our attention to the population and the environment.

Population bills indirectly affect what has been the most controversial issue this past decade—abortion. Wirth hopes that with more planned parenting and professional guidance programs the rate of abortions will decrease. This decrease would not only be because of planned parenting, but also due to programs educating youth about birth control, which would decreaase the need for abortions considerably.

Senator Wirth is a graduate of Harvard and holds a Ph.D. degree from Stanford University. He served as a White House Fellow under President Lyndon Johnson, during which time he met and became friends with President Douglass Cater. Senator Wirth has been a US Congressman for six terms.

college systems. Computers are set up in the library and in the computing center for this purpose. Disinfecting prevents viruses that can damage the computers.

A Mac II has been placed in the library for the student assistants. There is also an ID card reader there so that track can be kept of disc circulation. The Mac II is reserved for the student assistants when they are in the library. During other times, any student may use it.

These two students will be employed for this semester. The administration will continue it next semester and onward if the program is successful.

"We needed someone knowledgeable available for the students who are working with the computers in the library. We can't expect the students who work at the front desk to be computer experts as well," stated Tubbs.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Here are a couple of fascinating facts I thought might interest you. Bananas are frequently mentioned as a food high in potassium, but potatoes actually contain nearly twice as much. One large banana has 450 milligrams of potassium, while a large baked potato with its skin contains about 850 milligrams. The skin of the potato alone has about 235 milligrams of potassium.

Saltwater fish are generally no higher in sodium than freshwater fish. Fish have an internal regulatory system that prevents their flesh from taking up sodium from the water. How about that?

Hoped you all enjoyed dinner Wednesday. I heard many favorable responses about the food show. The Italian Chicken Fingers seem to be a real favorite with everyone. Thanks to all of you who filled out the questionaire. And a special thanks to Mike Rogers and T. Furr & Company for all their assistance with the show.

Next Wednesday, April 4th, we will be featuring a Tyson Food Show. There will also be a Schwinn bicycle given away that evening, at 6:00P.M. More on how you can win the bicycle will appear in the Dining Hall beginning Sunday.

Congratulations to Mr. Howard Schultz for being selected W.C.D.S. EMPLOYEE OF THE MONTH for February. Way to go Mr. Howard!!!

A special note to the LAX team... if you are going to be late arriving for dinner, give us a call. I hate to see you guys come in after the meal has ended and not be able to get a hot meal. If you could give us some notice we would be more than glad to hold dinner for you.

Well, I guess that is it for another week. Until next time...................MOM

DO THE RIGHT THING

April 9, 1990
(2 hrs.)

Vibrant, skillful, humane and reckless, Spike Lee's third movie (after She's Gotta Have It and School Daze) is a charged account of the hottest day of the year on a block in Brooklyn's largely black Bedford-Stuyvesant section. As the neighborhood regulars surge forward, make jokes, blow off steam and recede into the background, Lee weaves the anecdotes together in a casual structure so that at any one moment we seem to be taking the pulse of the entire neighborhood. The movie's end is an open embrace of violence borne of futility; the detail is funny, moving and complexly imagined. An excellent performance by Danny Aiello as the white owner of the pizza shop on the corner, and memorable appearances by Bill Nunn, Ossie Davis, Ruby Dee and Lee himself playing a laid-back pizza delivery man.

Changes in housing policy implemented

Underclassmen required to live on campus

by Laura Hopper
Staff writer

In its annual letter on housing, the Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors unveiled a new housing policy which requires freshmen and sophomores to live on campus.

Dated April 6, the letter reads "based on the belief...that the quality of campus life contributes significantly to the total educational experience of our students...the Board affirms that all freshmen and sophomores be required to live on campus. Students, for reasons of primary residence within the greater Chestertown area or medical or other pressing reasons, may make application to the Office of Student Affairs for special exception to this policy."

The new policy came as a surprise to many students who remembered last spring's housing letter.

Last spring, students were warned that a large incoming freshmen class would cause a housing shortage, and that as a result the College would not be able guarantee housing to this years' sophomores and juniors.

The housing crunch never happened, because more students moved off campus than originally anticipated. The sharp decrease in students on campus alarmed the administration.

"We created part of the problem ourselves by anticipating a larger freshman class," admits Dean of Students Maureen McIntire. Fearing a shortage of housing, the deans allowed incoming students to live off campus.

According to McIntire, they were concerned about the numbers of sophomores who had moved off campus. Incoming freshmen who expected a totally residential college were disappointed to find the campus dead, since off campus students, in McIntire's view, tend not to be as involved in on campus activities.

The Board is hoping that having all freshmen and sophomores on campus will improve the quality of life at the College. Freshmen will still be permitted to keep cars on campus, since there is no public transportation from Chestertown to any major metropolitan area.

McIntire hopes that improvements in residence hall maintenance, some possible dorm renovations over the summer, and new meal plan options will make the College a more attractive residence option.

With most major construction projects, such as the College Walk and the Academic Resources Center, nearly completed and additional renovations underway, McIntire praised the patience of the students who have spent a year "living in the middle of a construction site."

While the Board encourages "upperclass students to continue their residential experience on campus," McIntire admits the new policy "may throw us into a situation we can't handle," but strongly believes "freshmen and sophomores are better served by a few years of on campus living." While McIntire expressed distaste for the idea of students being forced to live on campus, "we're not going to lock people into dormitories." She pointed out that if the entire student body wanted to live on campus, the College would be unable to house all of them.

Tuition increase announced

by Susie Mazzullo

Washington College's operating budget for the academic year 1990-91 has recently been approved. Chairman Goldstein and the Board of Visitors and Governors adopted the budget that includes an increase in tuition and room and board.

Tuition will increase $900 to a new total for the year of $11,400. Room rental will increase $100 and full board will increase $200 to bring the new total of room and board for the year up to $4,700. The total amount for students with on campus housing and a full board plan will be $16,100 for the year.

Though President Cater refused to comment in person, a letter from Cater was sent last week to both students and parents explaining the reasons for the tuition increase. While the College has been very successful in raising funds, he states in the letter that there are still a number of additional costs that need to be met. Costs of teaching, health benefits, and academic support programs are only a few.

"The quest for excellence represents a serious challenge," wrote President Cater in the letter.

The money raised from the students' tuition pays two out of every three dollars that is needed to fulfill the budget. The additional one third must be obtained from other sources. Such sources are federal and state grants, corporate and foundation grants, patrons, and a substantial amount from alumni gifts.

This increase in tuition comes directly after an increase for the 1989-90 academic year. Total increases for tuition plus room and board amounted to $1,260 after the operating budget was approved. The grand total for a student with on campus housing and a full meal plan for the 1989-90 academic year was $14,900.

RA salary increase proposal accepted

by Kyndra Ponder

Washington College senior and resident assistant Ryder Daniels has developed a new plan which will bring about "a multi-faceted scale that will eventually bring RA salaries up to a room and board waiver."

In 1982, the student resident assistants at Washington College received a $1000 salary, roughly 44% of the $2500 that it cost to pay for room and board, from the school. Today, RAs receive $1320—about 30% of the $4400 price of room and board.

While the cost of living at WC has risen over 75% over the last 7 years, the salaries for RA's has increased by only about %10, much less than the annual 5.5% increase that other staff members have received.

EDITORIAL

The 12 to 1 ratio is merely a myth

The 12 to 1 ratio. It's been praised and mythologized ad nauseum, but what does it mean? More importantly, why is it that students of history and English have failed to encounter this fabled and exalted ratio in their classes?

Bluntly put, the ratio is a crock. Oh sure, it looks good if faculty and students are placed on opposite sides of the room. Add them up, do a little division, and voilá—an impressive student-faculty ratio.

If you're looking to see that ratio translate into actual classroom situations, you're bound to be disappointed. In an English class, for example, the ratio is more likely to be 30 to 1.

The 12 to 1 ratio isn't exactly false advertising on the College's part, but it is at the very least misleading. The less popular majors—like physics, which will have only one major next year—are what keeps the ratio intact. How many tour guides and Admissions officers are quick to inform eager prospective English majors that classes in that branch of study will not only be enrolled to the hilt, but may actually turn away as many students as they enroll?

If the Celebration of the Sciences achieves its desired results, it will become a party without a host. That is, if the College attracts as many students as the new facilites can support, the acclaimed ratio will skyrocket, making the hiring of additional faculty the only alternative. Why put off the inevitable?

Of course, it's much easier to point out problems than to detail a solution. But the solution is obvious—hire more faculty. Don't create a different registration process. Don't appoint a committee. Don't—for heaven's sake—hire an outside source to study the problem; we could probably hire another faculty member for the the cost of hiring a professional problem solving service.

The number of high school seniors applying to colleges is projected to decrease over the next few years; this is the reason why we're not supposed to need more faculty. But students who are attending packed classes now aren't likely to be sympathetic to this kind of planning.

Douglass Cater is right: if I had big money to give, this college would hire more full-time and part-time faculty.

Letters to the Editor

Cater reiterates support for the fine arts

To the Editor:

It is gratifying to read the supportive commentary for the Fine Arts Major in the past two issues of The Elm even though it was triggered by idle rumor. The Arts Department is not in danger of transformation into a mere Program unless and until the faculty of Washington College determines that this would be the right way to organize the curriculum. No such proposal has ever reached my desk.

My own ambition has been to encourage and strengthen all the creative arts that enrich our campus—art, music, drama, creative writing—well beyond the head count of students who choose to major or even take a single course. Why else transform the O'Neill House and the old Boiler Plant? Why designate new merit scholarships for each of these disciplines?

To those, like the Editor, who grow exasperated over the limited number of courses and size of faculty, let me offer two reminders:

I. Our Trustees have mandated a student/faculty ratio of 12 to 1. I challenge anyone to locate another small liberal arts college with a better ratio or lower tuition.

II. Our fund raising successes prove conclusively that increased financial support for faculty salaries and student scholarships - and art supplies - goes hand in hand with bigger capital gifts that enhance the campus. The new College Walk helps swell Annual Giving for the College's operating budget. Replacing McAlpin House with the Larrabee Arts Center will help push the Alumni donations well past the fifty percentile mark - among the top twenty five colleges in the nation.

Perhaps the Editor and I might give our money differently if we had big money to give. But I exhort her to remember the ancient Chinese maxim: "He (or she) who tends to look the gift horse in the mouth too hard is apt to grow toothless."

Sincerely yours,
Douglass Cater

WC will not tolerate acts of hazing

To the Editor:

Attached is part of a letter I sent to three Washington College seniors whom I have placed on disciplinary probation for their participation in an act of hazing.

Sincerely,
Edward E. Maxcy
Associate Dean of Students

Word of the act of hazing was communicated to me by an officer from the national headquarters of the Theta Chi Fraternity, of which you were formerly a member. Washington College is extremely pleased that the national fraternities are working with colleges to stamp out all incidents of hazing on our campuses.

I remind you that according to Washington College policy, taken from that policy promulgated by the College Fraternity Executive Association, hazing is "an action taken or a situation created, intentionally, whether on or off fraternity premises, to produce mental or physical discomfort, embarrassment, harassment, or ridicule." This statement is found on p. 6 of the "Statement of Mutual Responsibility between Washington College and Its Social Fraternities and Sororities" signed by an officer of each Washington College fraternity and sorority.

The State of Maryland "Digest of Criminal Laws" states:

"Haze means doing any act or causing any situation which recklessly or intentionally subjects a student to the risk of serious bodily injury for the purpose of initiation into a student organization of a school, college, or university.

Conviction is subject to a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than 6 months, or both."

From our conversation, I think you already understand the potential danger in taking fellow students across the state line and leaving them to find their own way back to campus, and I am confident that you not only will avoid any similar actions but will work with your fellow students to prevent their participation in such behavior.

It is my sincere hope that you specifically, but also your friends associated with the fraternity chapters at Washington College, will get the message and know that acts of hazing will not be tolerated.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacations and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. OPINION

ISSUE: How will the removal of the water tower affect life at Washington College?

Tower loss indicates negative changes

Tracey Connell

The other day I met a prospective student and asked him how he liked Washington College. He replied innocently, "I think it's gonna look great!" Then he asked about academics.

I cringed.

Though I hate to admit it, the administration must be right after all, because the Master Plan isn't even complete yet and it's impressing these future freshmen.

The removal of the water tower is only one small part of all these grand changes being orchestrated around us (We do need the access to certain dorms its removal will allow). In addition, the tower issue alone is relatively insignificant as to whether or not I am getting a good education.

Maybe then the question "How will the removal of the water tower affect life at Washington College?" should be altered to "Is the removal of the water tower symptomatic of the changes in campus life?"

My answer to the latter question would be yes. The removal of the water tower means Master Plan and Master Plan leads us to various other issues: cable, the alcohol policy, tuition increase. They all reflect the administration's complete disregard for the students that are here NOW.

Most students actually LIKED the tower, and liked WC the way it used to be. But during the past few years it all seems to be disappearing around us, out of our control.

Did we find out that the administration thought better of cable on campus before or after the deed was done? After. Most students discovered the fact when they turned on their televisions and all they got was static.

The alcohol policy tightens year after year. In one way I understand the reasons why. The College certainly cannot afford the risk of alcohol related liabilities (though the administration sure seemed ready to run the risk of PCB related liabilities, didn't they?) In another I am simply a student looking for things to do on campus without having to walk home through a graveyard or drive drunk.

And finally, the tuition increase. Are we paying for improvements that will benefit us? Sometimes I wonder if money would be there for faculty and staff salaries, as well as faculty chairs etc., if the Master Plan were not so extensive and so concentrated on esthetics.

I am not writing this only to bitch and moan about Washington College. I came here because I like the school (and the water tower). There is an inordinate number of faculty and members of the administration that really do care about the student body. It's also true that the same changes are happening everywhere else. WC does not exist in a vacuum. It's just that sometimes the wonderful people are overshadowed by the ones that say, "Washington College would be great if it weren't for the students."

So, goodbye water tower.
Hello Master Plan.

Why? To meet the rigid aesthetics of the only campus that used to have its very own water? Doug, I loved that tower. It was like...the symbol of a struggling gerneration to me. Now it's gone. Thanks.

Sure, it was an ugly water tower, but it was our water tower. It was what first attracted me to this school, a steel billboard of free speech in the form of graffiti. It's fall fortells the collapse of all civilization.

Well, the campus is sure to be a lot less picturesque without Chas' love notes to Cathy Jewell. I myself will miss the looming edifice, and my life will never be the same. Can we have cable now?

Our sky is a little empty now. I'll miss my beacon in the air as I approach WC. In essence, one cannot truly say how drastically the removal of the water tower will affect the lives of this student body. Farewell.

The removal of the water tower is a blessing in disguise. It was an eye sore to look at and without it, the campus is much better off. I was so glad to see it come down and I'm sure I am not alone.

Well, actually I rather liked the water tower, and I'm sure anyone who knows the Chas. story agrees. It was a fitting monument to that former campus god. He's still with us in spirit, however.

Without the water tower, the Buntagon must become our billboard

As a freshman, my mom loaded me and my junk into the car and we went off to school where the brick bric-a-brac buildings, the smell of cross mixed agricultural tradition, and large silver water tower decorate C-town like a Spanish lowrider. After a while the unfamiliar became commonplace; the bricks propagated and created long walks of red-brown paths. In spring cow dung still smells, and the fields are British Isle green. But the water tower, now decapitated, was soon to go. The benign was deemed unacceptable.

The water tower was a small piece of urban landscape Chestertown supported, and canonized, though soon was leveled. In a school that is so pasteurized by white, upper-middle class students they have deconstructed another icon that fought the normative. Shall we replace it with a monument to industry such as a large BMW or Rolex watch?

Bland, safe, content; we are Washington College students.

Diversity may degrade us if it is inappropriate or enlightening, or if enlivening. Those students who ascended to the water tower to write their messages could look upon the silver-gray tower on rainy days and see the message painted across the sky. Granted, nothing was ever put there that was truly insightful, or clever, or poetic, but the medium (a diverse medium) was available. They posited their Kilroy upon metal.

What next? What's forbidden now? Entry to Minta Martin? These healthy activities must be continued on long nights of studying, drinking, and loneliness away from loved ones. The alternative is Bunting Hall—the Buntagon...HQ...class-conscience central. Those pillars, brick walls, doorways, and windows are the NEW canvas of self-expression. Strike! Strike! Strike!

To some the idea of self-expression is gross, disgusting, and a real bummer, eh? Well, your young and only going to live once. Is your life worth an expression and an idea?

Faulkner said the reason he wrote was to leave his "Kilroy." Our worth, our essence, our need revolves around our desire to create. Viva la Revolution! Avenge the water tower! Create art out of Bunting Hall!

The desire to do something different bothers the provincial; any new idea always meets resistance. But the axiom of "make it new", of invention and creation, a medium of courage and self-expression is the noblest of all callings. The examples of this are so numerous that they hardly need mentioning. They are the cultural icons we now replace with material garbage.

The water tower is a great loss for the diversity of our life and our studies. It's a public medium, a milepost of expression. The loss of the water tower should not be forgotten.

Instead, at the risk of being redundant, I implore you, spraypaint, destroy the Buntagon!

PERSPECTIVES

News from around the world; Lithuanian stalemate

UNITED STATES:

Exxon Shipping and its parent company Exxon pleaded innocent to breaking federal laws in connection with the Exxon Valdez oil spill last spring. If found guilty, the two companies face fines a minimum of $700 million. Exxon is currently involved in plea bargain negotiations with the Justice Department. The proposed plea bargain agreement would establish a $500 million fund to restore areas affected by the spill.

In Pittsburgh, the trial of 72 anti-abortion protesters began. The protesters were arrested after they charged police barricades outside a women's clinic (the Allegheny Reproductive Health Center). If convicted, the defendants could face a 2 year prison term and a fine of up to $2,500.

Following the visit of the Soviet Foreign minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, the White House is lessening its expectations about an arms control agreement coming out of next month's summit. President Bush's Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater told reporters there is a question whether disputes over the strategic arms reduction treaty (START) can be resolved. Secretary of State James Baker cited the cruise missile as a major stumbling block to START, and aircraft a point of dispute in a conventional arms reduction treaty. US officials say the Lithuanian situation is adding to the difficulties.

LITHUANIA:

In the war of nerves between Gorbachev and the Lithuanians, Gorbachev refused a Lithuanian proposal of negotiations over Lithuania's declaration of independence. He threaten to use economic, political and other, unnamed, measures unless the republic rescinds its declaration of independence. Gorbachev has demanded that the Lithuanian Supreme court rule the declaration of independence unconstitutional. He could, if he wanted to, set up an economic blockade of the republic, require payment in hard currency (dollars) for oil shipments, or dissolve the Lithuanian parliament and institute direct presidential rule. A various times since the republic split away from the Soviet Union, the Red Army has occupied buildings belonging to the Lithuanian Communist Party, the printing facilities for Lithuanian newspapers (the majority of the republics newspapers are printed at one location) and the prosecutor's office.

"...WE REALIZE THEY'RE COSTING YOU A BUNDLE. BUT YOU STILL CAN'T CLAIM EASTERN EUROPE, NICARAGUA, PANAMA AND THE SAVINGS AND LOAN INDUSTRY AS DEPENDENTS..."

A Soviet parliamentary group Soyuz called on Gorbachev to dissolve the Lithuanian parliament and call new elections. Soyuz's main goal is the preservation of the Soviet Union as one entity.

A Soviet law prohibits Gorbachev from using direct presidential rule except in the event of a natural disaster, a major accident, epidemics, and mass disorders. The Lithuanians are afraid the KGB will create disturbances and create a reason for Gorbachev to assume direct presidential power.

SOVIET UNION:

Deputy Prime Minister Leonid I. Abalkin, economic reform strategist warns the Soviet uSnion can not survive as a world power unless it switches to a market economy soon. Abalkin joined the government last year and is in favor of the adoption of a full western style economy, complete with price reform. Abalkin, in a statement to reporters, refers to his program, which includes references to money supply, banking systems, stock companies, inflation and currency convertibility (the rouble can not be exchanged for dollars currently), as a "regulated market economy" (this is how the US economy is described). Abalkin pointed out that the rouble can not be made convertible until the Soviet Union switches over to a full market economy, and prices are decentralized. This might not take place for many years.

NORTHERN IRELAND:

The Irish Republican Army claimed responsibility for the bombing that killed 4 soldiers in Northern Ireland. The soldiers were members of the Ulster Defense Regiment.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher linked the bombing to the refusal of the Irish Supreme Court to extradite "terrorists" to stand trial in Great Britain. The Irish court states that it recognizes that Irish defendants are not always guerrenteed a fair and impartial trail in British courts. The British government accuses Ireland of providing a haven for terrorists.

Win the computer you need to succeed in the real world and a chance to use it there.

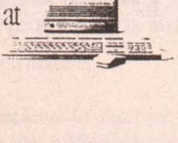
It's easy. Just try our Real World Demo on a Macintosh® computer to enter Apple's Real World Sweepstakes.

If you're one of 14 Grand Prize winners, you'll get to spend a week this summer at the organization of your choice listed below, where you'll see Macintosh computers hard at work. And when you get home, you can use your own new Macintosh SE/30 to write your resume and follow-up letters.

There will also be 20 First Prize winners who will receive Macintosh SE computers and 1,000 Second Prize winners who will get Apple® T-shirts.

You really can't lose if you come in and get your hands on a Macintosh today. Because once you do, you'll see how easy it is to use and how much one could do for you now.

You'll appreciate the value of a Macintosh computer after you leave campus and head out into the real world, too. But don't take our word for it. Come in and try a Macintosh and see for yourself. And if you win the Grand Prize, you'll be seeing the real world sooner than you think.



Enter Apple's Real World Sweepstakes and you could win a week at one of these leading organizations and a Macintosh computer.
